A renewed recognition of human dignity and freedom and of the salvific character of church law underlies the code's forceful emphasis on penalties only as a last resort when all other legal-pastoral measures have failed to deal with problematic behavior (c. 1341). The judicial or administrative discretion of ecclesiastical authorities in confronting various pastoral problems is notably enhanced. Appeal or recourse to a higher authority against a penal sentence or decree always suspends its effects until higher authority upholds the sentence or decree (c. 1353).

Penal discipline is simplified in several respects. The code notably reduces the number of penalties and simplifies the formerly complex system of reserving the remission of numerous penalties to the Holy See. Likewise, bishops may more easily remit penalties and thereby minister more effectively to their fellow believers (cc. 1354–1356).

Penal discipline is largely an external forum reality within the exclusive competence of bishops, other ordinaries, and judges. Confessors may remit only certain latae sententiae penalties if there has been no formal declaration that they have been incurred (c. 1357).

The 1983 code prefers judicial rather than administrative procedure in imposing penalties to protect better the rights of all concerned (c. 1342). Yet, the competent penal authority may generally impose penalties administratively for a just cause (c. 1720). However, the code explicitly requires judicial process for perpetual, or irrevocable, penalties such as deprivation of office (c. 1336, §1, 2°).

[10] T. Green, "Penal Law: A Review of Selected Themes," J 50 (1990) 221–256; E. McDonough, "A Novus Habitus Mentis for Sanctions in the Church," J 48 (1988) 727–746.

Finally, concerns about ensuring the personal involvement of church authorities in dealing with potential offenders account for the emphasis on ferendae sententiae penalties (c. 1314). These penalties can be imposed only after a formal procedure, unlike latae sententiae penalties, which an imputable offender incurs by the very commission of the delict. Presumably, these latter penalties are incurred only for the most serious delicts (c. 1318), and the legislator occasionally minimizes their practical effects, e.g., lack of operative force given mitigating circumstances (c. 1324, §3).[11] [11]For lists of penalties and corresponding delicts in the 1983 code, see CLSA Com, 932–940.

CANONS AND COMMENTARY

Part I
DELICTS AND PENALTIES IN GENERAL
[cc. 1311–1363][12]

TITLE I
THE PUNISHMENT OF DELICTS IN GENERAL
[cc. 1311–1312][13]

Church Penal Rights[14]

Canon 1311 — The Church has the innate and proper right to coerce offending members of the Christian faithful with penal sanctions.

Despite requests for a statement of the theological-canonical foundations of the Church's penal authority, the code simply affirms the Church's innate and proper right to penalize lawbreakers. Generally the code commission avoided dealing with foundational theological-canonical issues.

The Church presumably possesses an "innate" penal right, i.e., one based on its nature and not derivative from any human power such as the State.[15] This right is also "proper," i.e., exercised in its own name rather than for another higher authority (e.g., the State). This formulation reflects an overly institutional, perfect society ecclesiology, which highlights the Church's distinctive governmental competencies. Conciliar themes such as the Church as a divine-human mystery and a communion of believers seem not to have influenced this formulation.[16]

Unlike the 1917 code, the present code does not define terms such as ecclesiastical "delict" that prompt the exercise of such coercive power.[17] However, canon 1321 on penal imputability (to be

[12]For observations on this material in the CCEO, see Green, "Comparative Reflections," 429–435.

[13]Besides the Münster commentary, see Borras, 200–207; Green, in CLSA Com, 897–898; J. Martin, in CLSGBI Com, 749–750; Marzoa, in Com Ex, 246–257; W. Rees, Die Strafgewalt der Kirche (Berlin: Duncker & Humblot, 1993) 365–372.

[14]See CCEO 1401, highlighting the pastoral, reconciling spirit that should characterize penal law.

[15]For comparable formulations of ecclesiastical rights vis-à-vis the State, see cc. 232 (ministerial formation), 800, §1 and 807 (establishment of schools and universities), and 1254, §1 (disposition of temporal goods).

[16]For a more detailed exploration of these issues, see the Münster commentary on c. 1311.

[17]CIC 2195. Recourse to the former code and the canonical tradition occasionally helps to clarify the meaning of similar terms in the 1983 code (cf. c. 6, §2). However, the present code must always be interpreted primarily in light of Vatican II.

considered later) states that no one may be punished unless a sanctionable external violation of a law or precept[18] is gravely imputable because of malice or negligence.

In principle the "Christian faithful" liable to sanctions are baptized Latin Catholics with the sufficient use of reason (c. 11). However, canon 1323, 1° exempts those under sixteen from any ecclesiastical penalties.

While canon 1311 affirms the Church's penal competency, several canons call for penal restraint. For example, canon 1317 cautions legislators to establish penalties only if they are truly necessary to provide more suitably for ecclesiastical discipline. Canon 1318 advises against multiplying latae sententiae penalties, especially excommunications. Furthermore, canon 1341 warns ordinaries not to initiate penal processes unless there is no other way of repairing scandal, restoring justice, and reforming the alleged offender.

Types of Sanctions

Canon 1312 — §1. The following are penal sanctions in the Church:

1° medicinal penalties or censures, which are listed in cann. 1331–1333;

2° expiatory penalties mentioned in can. 1336.

§2. The law can establish other expiatory penalties which deprive a member of the Christian faithful of some spiritual or temporal good and which are consistent with the supernatural purpose of the Church.

§3. Penal remedies and penances are also used; the former especially to prevent delicts, the latter to substitute for or to increase a penalty.

The code here briefly deals with various sanctions geared to addressing problematic ecclesial behavior. The generic term "sanctions" encompasses both penalties in the strict sense and quasi-penal measures such as penal remedies and penances.

Paragraph one neither defines nor indicates the purpose of the various types of penalties but simply mentions them and refers to title IV on their effects. The primary, but not exclusive, purpose of medicinal penalties, or censures (e.g., excommunication), is breaking contumacy, or contempt of church authority, and reintegrating the offender within the community (cc. 1331–1335). In contrast, expiatory penalties such as deprivation of office primarily envision restoring justice and repairing the ecclesial damage done by the offender (cc. 1336–1338). Unlike the remission of a censure, their remission does not depend primarily on the offender's change of heart but rather on church authority's determination that such ecclesial damage has been repaired. Censures emphasize reforming the offender, whereas expiatory penalties more notably highlight protecting the Church's fundamental socio-juridical goods.[19]

While censures are exhaustively listed in canons 1331–1335, there may be expiatory penalties besides those enumerated in canon 1336 (§2). Such penalties are deprivations of a spiritual or temporal good, which are consistent with the Church's supernatural purpose. The Church's integrity is to be protected against breaches of its faith and order, but the human dignity and freedom of conscience even of offenders are to be respected.

Despite explicitly referring only to expiatory penalties, this description actually applies to all penalties. However, not every deprivation of an ecclesial good is a penalty, e.g., removal of a pastor (cc. 1740–1747). Rather, only those deprivations prompted by an ecclesiastical delict are technically penalties.

Penal remedies or external forum penances (cc. 1339–1340) may be employed in a somewhat ancillary fashion vis-à-vis penalties (§3). Since penalties are last resort provisions, such quasi-penal measures may help to preclude ecclesiastical delicts or address problematic, yet non-delictual disciplinary situations. Furthermore, after a delict has been proven, such measures may replace a penalty in cases of mitigated imputability (c. 1348) or increase the force of a latae sententiae penalty given aggravating circumstances (c. 1326, §2).

[18] Subsequently when the commentary refers to "penal law," the "penal precept" is also understood unless it is otherwise indicated.

[19] For more detailed reflections on various sanctions, see the Münster commentary on c. 1312.

TITLE II
PENAL LAW AND PENAL PRECEPT
[cc. 1313–1320][20]

Change of Law Situation[21]

Canon 1313 — §1. If a law is changed after a delict has been committed, the law more favorable to the accused is to be applied.

§2. If a later law abolishes a law or at least the penalty, the penalty immediately ceases.

A benign interpretation of penal law is pastorally necessary (CIC 2219, §1; CCEO 1404, §1). If the meaning of a text is doubtful, the interpretation favoring the alleged offender is preferable.[22] Furthermore, since penal law is always burdensome, it is always to be strictly interpreted (c. 18; CCEO 1500). Hence one should restrict rather than enlarge a canon's potential applicability.

The present canon exemplifies the aforementioned benign approach. If the law changes after a delict is committed but before the penalty is imposed, the law more favorable to the alleged offender at the time of the penal process is applicable (§1). This may mean a less severe penalty (a "just penalty" rather than an excommunication) or possibly a ferendae sententiae penalty requiring a process rather than a latae sententiae penalty incurred by the commission of the delict.[23]

This moderate approach is even more evident when the law or at least the penalty attached to its violation is repealed after a delict is committed and a latae sententiae penalty incurred or a ferendae sententiae penalty imposed. In this case the offender is no longer subject to the penalty even without a formal declaration of such although other pastoral measures may be warranted (§2; c. 1348).

This situation was verified when the present code took effect on November 27, 1983. Numerous 1917 code penalties lost their force (c. 6, §1, 3°), e.g., excommunication for fully imputable Masonic membership (CIC 2335).[24]

Ferendae Sententiae Orientation of Law

Canon 1314 — Generally, a penalty is ferendae sententiae, so that it does not bind the guilty party until after it has been imposed; if the law or precept expressly establishes it, however, a penalty is latae sententiae, so that it is incurred ipso facto when the delict is committed.

A significant postconciliar discussion has concerned the continuing viability of latae sententiae penalties, i.e., those incurred by committing a delict without any formal procedure.[25] This canon embodies a principal code commission concern: an emphasis on ferendae sententiae penalties as normative. A service-oriented exercise of authority requires that church authorities normally address the concrete circumstances of every alleged delict. Hence, before the exercise of rights is curtailed by a penalty, there must normally be a formal judicial or administrative process, usually after a preliminary inquiry (cc. 1717–1719).

[20] Besides the Münster commentary, see Borras, 50–62; Green, in CLSA Com, 898–901; Martin, in CLSGBI Com, 750–753; Rees, 371–377; J. Sanchis, in Com Ex, 258–281.

[21] Cf. CCEO 1412, §2–§3.

[22] This benign approach also prohibits recourse to the usual rules on supplying for a lack of penal legislation. In other words, if a specific legal norm is lacking when a church authority deals with a penal situation, he may not create such a norm in light of the provisions of c. 19.

[23] An exception to this benign approach are special norms governing prescription of penal actions for sexual abuse of minors in the United States. See commentary on cc. 1362 and 1395.

[24] See c. 1374.

[25] Green, "Future of Penal Law," 224–228; V. De Paolis, "De legitimitate et opportunitate poenarum latae sententiae in iure poenali canonico," P 63 (1974) 37–67.

By way of exception, latae sententiae penalties may be established in situations of grave scandal or when the public good cannot be adequately served by ferendae sententiae penalties (c. 1318). Presumably certain occult, or non-public, delicts, such as absolution of an accomplice (c. 1378, §1), might not be punished without latae sententiae penalties.

For the sake of legal precision, such uniquely Latin church penalties appealing to the offender's conscience must be expressly stated in the law threatening them. Furthermore, the code occasionally limits their impact on the person who must observe them. Actually, such an observance seems to presuppose a certain depth of spiritual motivation in the offender which may not always be verified.[26]

No explicit reference is made here to the declaration or official clarification that such penalties have been incurred. However, this is necessary to enforce their full effects.[27]

Competence to Establish Penal Law[28]

Canon 1315 — §1. A person who has legislative power can also issue penal laws; within the limits of his competence by reason of territory or of persons, moreover, he can by his own laws also strengthen with an appropriate penalty a divine law or an ecclesiastical law issued by a higher authority.

§2. The law itself can determine a penalty, or its determination can be left to the prudent appraisal of a judge.

§3. Particular law also can add other penalties to those established by universal law for some delict; however, this is not to be done except for very grave necessity. If universal law threatens an indeterminate or facultative penalty, particular law can also establish a determinate or obligatory one in its place.

The remaining canons in this title seem to refer primarily to infra-universal church authorities, particularly legislators. Such authorities enjoy expanded legislative and administrative penal discretion to be exercised with restraint according to the following canons.

Only those with legislative authority can establish their own penal laws or penalize violations of divine or higher level ecclesiastical laws lacking a distinctive sanction (c. 1315, §1). Such authority is exercised by individuals such as diocesan bishops (c. 391) and by corporate bodies, such as conferences of bishops, under certain conditions (c. 455). To preclude abuses, such authority is to be exercised only within the territorial or personal limits of the particular legislator's competence. Furthermore, neighboring diocesan bishops are normally to consult with one another before establishing penal laws (c. 1316). They are also to observe the principle of legislative restraint (cc. 1317–1318).

At times a ferendae sententiae penalty is determined in the law establishing it, e.g., c. 1395, §1. At other times, however, an indeterminate ferendae sententiae penalty must be determined by the competent penal authority after a formal process, e.g., c. 1365. However, latae sententiae penalties are always determinate (c. 1315, §2).

The preceding examples involve obligatory, or preceptive, ferendae sententiae penalties, which is generally the case in the code. However, occasionally it leaves the disposition of the matter up to the judge or ordinary (facultative, or discretionary, penalties), e.g., c. 1390, §3. The aforementioned obligatory-facultative distinction concerns the penal discretion exercised by the competent penal authority.[29] Such a distinction, however, is not relevant to latae sententiae penalties, which are incurred by an imputable offender upon committing the delict.

[26] See, for example, cc. 1318; 1324, §3; 1329, §2; 1335; 1338, §3. See also the Münster commentary on c. 1314.

[27] See, for example, c. 1331, §1–§2 on the different effects of a non-declared and declared excommunication.

[28] Cf. CCEO 1405, §1–§2.

[29] On such penal discretion, see especially cc. 1343–1346; 1349. Far from being a dereliction of duty, such discretion of the judge or ordinary is permissible and at times pastorally desirable even if penalties are theoretically obligatory (c. 1344).

The aforementioned principle of legislative restraint is also operative here (§3). Barring an extremely grave necessity, infra-universal legislators are not to add to those penalties specified in the code, since multiplying penalties may be pastorally detrimental. However, if the code does not specify a penalty for a delict or indicates that it is facultative, infra-universal legislators may impose a determinate penalty or require some type of penalty. This would probably be prompted by a particularly problematic legal-pastoral situation, e.g., serious human rights violations.

Desirable Penal Law Uniformity[30]

Canon 1316 — Insofar as possible, diocesan bishops are to take care that if penal laws must be issued, they are uniform in the same city or region.

The conciliar enhancing of episcopal pastoral governance authority implies that bishops should have a certain penal legislative discretion given their responsibility to see to the observance of the code in their dioceses (c. 392). The penal law committee rejected a proposal to limit infra-universal penal law initiatives to episcopal conferences, since this would unduly restrict the pastoral governance role of diocesan bishops.

However, while some penal law diversity might be justified, such expanded episcopal discretion might be a mixed blessing. Notable discrepancies among neighboring dioceses in punishing delicts might be ecclesially counterproductive and weaken the effectiveness of the penal system. Hence, neighboring bishops should strive for a uniform legislative approach to possible delicts. Hopefully this will check arbitrary episcopal discretion violating Christian dignity and freedom.[31]

Cautious Establishment of Penal Law

Canon 1317 — Penalties are to be established only insofar as they are truly necessary to provide more suitably for ecclesiastical discipline. Particular law, however, cannot establish a penalty of dismissal from the clerical state.

The next two canons wisely advise infra-universal legislators to establish new penal laws cautiously, especially those threatening latae sententiae penalties or censures such as excommunications. Since penalties are last resort measures (c. 1341), they should be limited to instances in which they are absolutely necessary from a disciplinary standpoint. The sharp reduction in penalties for specific delicts in the code might prompt lower level legislators to multiply particular penal laws.

To protect clerics against possibly arbitrary episcopal discretion, particular law may not determine additional grounds for dismissal from the clerical state (c. 1336, §1, 5°).[32] Such a last resort penalty is warranted only in those extremely serious cases of clerical intransigence expressly stated in the code.[33] The serious effects of dismissal for the cleric (c. 292) and the need to facilitate the exercise of his right of defense require special care in determining violations warranting dismissal and normally a collegiate tribunal of at least three judges in imposing it (c. 1425, §1, 2a). Somewhat surprisingly, however, during 1998 John Paul II, at the request of their bishops, administratively dismissed certain clerics for sexual abuse of minors. As problematic as such behavior

[30] Cf. CCEO 1405, §3.

[31] Such episcopal penal consultation seemed lacking in February 1996 when Bishop Fabian Bruskewitz of Lincoln, Nebraska forbade membership in twelve organizations under penalty of interdict (initially) and excommunication (subsequently). See Origins 25/42 (April 11, 1996) 725; G. Read, "Lincoln, Nebraska Excommunications," CLS-GBIN no. 107 (September 1996) 18–24.

[32] See also c. 1350 on support for even penalized clerics.

[33] See cc. 1364, §2 (heresy, apostasy, or schism); 1367 (violation of sacred species); 1370, §1 (physical attack on the pope); 1387 (confessional solicitation); 1394, §1 (attempted marriage); 1395 (various sexual offenses). Martin also includes violations of c. 1397 as a basis for dismissal (752, n. 2). However, a strict interpretation of law seems to preclude this, since c. 1397 speaks explicitly of the privations and prohibitions mentioned in c. 1336 (§1, 2°–3°) but not precisely of dismissal (§1, 5°).

may be, questions could possibly be raised about how well such an expeditious process honored the aforementioned right of defense which the pope has strongly and repeatedly emphasized, especially in marriage cases.

Caution Regarding Latae Sententiae Penalties

Canon 1318 — A legislator is not to threaten latae sententiae penalties except possibly for certain singularly malicious delicts which either can result in graver scandal or cannot be punished effectively by ferendae sententiae penalties; he is not, however, to establish censures, especially excommunication, except with the greatest moderation and only for graver delicts.

This canon's cautious approach to latae sententiae penalties in general and censures (especially excommunication) in particular continues the prior canon's emphasis on penal legislative restraint.[34] The present canon embodies the law's preference for ferendae sententiae penalties (c. 1314). The canon also reflects a penal hierarchy of values since latae sententiae penalties are among the most serious in the law. Such caution is probably related to the absence of a direct encounter between church authority and the offender before the penalty is incurred although it can later be formally declared judicially or administratively. Furthermore, the serious liturgical and governmental prohibitions resulting from excommunication (c. 1331) probably account for the legislator's special caution in that regard.

The seriousness of the penalty should be proportionate to the gravity of the delict. Hence, latae sententiae penalties are warranted only for extraordinary, singularly malicious delicts not arising from mere negligence. Such penalties are justified only if there is serious scandal[35] or the delict cannot be addressed adequately through a ferendae sententiae penalty.

Issuing of Penal Precepts

Canon 1319 — §1. Insofar as a person can impose precepts in the external forum in virtue of the power of governance, the person can also threaten determinate penalties by precept, except perpetual expiatory penalties.

§2. A penal precept is not to be issued unless the matter has been considered thoroughly and those things established in cann. 1317–1318 about particular laws have been observed.

This canon on penal precepts reflects this title's cautious approach to the establishment of penalties. Here the code refers to a more particularized situation than is envisioned by the law's more generalized focus. An administrative authority (c. 134) (e.g., a vicar general) may order an individual or a group to do or cease doing something under threat of a penalty for non-compliance (cc. 35; 49). For example, a bishop might threaten a priest with suspension for continuing partisan political activities (c. 287, §2). Generally speaking, a precept differs from a law by focusing somewhat more on the private rather than the common good and by being personal rather than territorial in character. Much more so than a law, a precept takes cognizance of the particular circumstances of the potential offender.

Administrative authorities should impose penal precepts cautiously and only after careful deliberation. The code explicitly refers to canons 1317–1318 on moderation in establishing any penalties and special care in threatening latae sententiae penalties, especially censures such as excommunication. This is because of their significant consequences for the exercise of Christian rights. The rules on individual administrative decrees[36] and administrative recourse (cc. 1732–1739) are relevant here.

[34] The 1983 code contains seventeen latae sententiae penalties. See CLSA Com, 937. Of nine possible excommunications, seven are latae sententiae. See CLSA Com, 932.

[35] Book VI speaks of "scandal" eleven times without defining it. See cc. 1318; 1328, §2; 1339, §2; 1341; 1344, §2; 1347, §2; 1352, §2; 1357, §2; 1364, §2; 1394, §1; and 1395, §1. In this regard see CCC 2284–2287. Such scandal probably refers to delicts significantly dishonoring the Church and its teachings and creating in the faithful an attitude conducive to delictual behavior. Such scandal is particularly grave if church authorities cause it or especially vulnerable persons are adversely influenced by them (c. 1326).

The code forbids precepts threatening indeterminate penalties because these depend too much on the will of the superior and hence may unduly jeopardize the rights of an alleged offender. Even more notably, the code prohibits precepts threatening perpetual expiatory penalties because of their irrevocable implications, e.g., deprivation of an office (c. 1336, §1, 2°).

Penalties for Religious

Canon 1320 — The local ordinary can coerce religious with penalties in all those matters in which they are subject to him.

The bishop is the primary moderator of the exercise of the apostolate in his diocese (c. 394). This has particular relevance to apostolic religious. With due regard for their legitimate autonomy (c. 586), such religious are subject to him regarding pastoral care, the exercise of divine worship, and other works of the apostolate.[37]

Accordingly, the bishop may visit various institutions of religious in the diocese although the scope of his visit is somewhat more restricted in dealing with pontifical institutes than with their diocesan counterparts (c. 397). During such a visitation or possibly in other circumstances, questions may arise about the compliance of religious with church discipline in the aforementioned apostolic areas.

The present canon must be situated in that larger context of the integration of religious into diocesan life. The canon explicitly accords the "local ordinary" (c. 134, §2: e.g., an episcopal vicar for religious) coercive power over religious in his diocese in those matters in which they are subject to him, especially the aforementioned apostolic concerns.

It is not entirely clear why the code needed to express this principle of coercive authority here. Perhaps it is because of the principle of exemption of institutes of consecrated life from the governance of the local ordinary (c. 591).[38] In any event, the principle of penal restraint suggests that every effort be made to minimize the need for recourse to penalties in bishop-religious relationships. Hopefully regular pastoral consultation between bishops and religious superiors may facilitate the achievement of this goal.[39]

Title III
The Subject Liable to Penal Sanctions
[cc. 1321–1330][40]

This significant title should be read in connection with canons 1341–1353 on applying penalties, for the current title articulates basic principles aiding penal authorities in determining whether a delict has been committed and what might be an appropriate penalty.[41]

After specifying the basis of penal imputability (c. 1321), the legislator indicates various factors affecting it (cc. 1322–1327). Subsequently, the canons consider an attempted delict (c. 1328), delictual collaboration (c. 1329), and delicts involving declaring one's mind or intent (c. 1330).

[36] Canons 48–58. See especially c. 50 on necessary consultation before issuing an administrative decree such as a precept. Furthermore, c. 51 requires a written decree giving the reasons for the precept at least in summary fashion.

[37] See especially the commentary on cc. 673–683.

[38] Borras, 61.

[39] Although it is not technically a penal canon, see c. 679 empowering the bishop, for a very serious reason, to prohibit a member of a religious institute from living in his diocese. However, if the religious superior fails to comply with the bishop's request, the latter cannot act on his own but must refer the matter to CICLSAL.

[40] Besides the Münster commentary, see also Borras, 13–44; Green, in CLSA Com, 901–906; Martin, in CLSGBI Com, 753–761; Marzoa, in Com Ex, 282–351; Rees, 377–385.

[41] For less detailed Eastern code provisions, see CCEO 1413–1418.

While these canons focus on individual offenders, a key penal law concern is protecting the integrity of the Church's faith and order and somewhat distancing the community from behavior patterns violating such integrity.[42]

Notion of Imputability[43]

Canon 1321 — §1. No one is punished unless the external violation of a law or precept, committed by the person, is gravely imputable by reason of malice or negligence.

§2. A penalty established by a law or precept binds the person who has deliberately violated the law or precept; however, a person who violated a law or precept by omitting necessary diligence is not punished unless the law or precept provides otherwise.

§3. When an external violation has occurred, imputability is presumed unless it is otherwise apparent.

It is a basic Christian right not to be punished except according to law (c. 221, §3). The exercise of one's rights cannot be curtailed by a penalty unless it is proven that a delict has been committed (§1). One may neither be penalized nor subjected to other disciplinary action merely because a delict has been alleged. Normally penalties are imposed through a judicial or administrative process (ferendae sententiae); however, latae sententiae penalties are incurred by the very commission of a delict.

A key penal consideration is the meaning of an ecclesiastical "delict," which is not defined here.[44] However, this initial canon can facilitate a working understanding of the concept. There are objective, subjective, and legal dimensions to any delict. First of all, there must be an external or perceivable violation of a law provable in the external forum (objective dimension). However, the violation need not be public, or known to many people; certain legal violations may be occult, or known only to a few people. Furthermore, the mere breaking of the law does not necessarily mean that a delict has been committed. There must also be grave juridical imputability, rooted primarily in a free and deliberate intent to violate the law or secondarily in culpable negligence (subjective dimension). Finally, prescinding from serious moral culpability, which must always be verified, not every legal violation constitutes a delict. The violation must normally be expressly sanctioned in universal or particular law (legal dimension).[45]

This title deals largely with the second element of a delict, i.e., grave imputability. Given its importance, the code provides detailed guidelines to assist judges and ordinaries in making prudent penal judgments after weighing the relevant factors. The code articulates various factors influencing imputability, some within an individual's control (e.g., culpable drunkenness) and others beyond such control (e.g., grave fear).

The significant notions here are dolus and culpa. Normally dolus, or a deliberate intent to violate the law, is necessary for penal imputability (criminal intent). Culpa, or culpable negligence in observing the law, normally does not give rise to such imputability (§2).[46] A certain penal proportionality is operative: one should normally not be punished except for a free and knowing violation of the law.

How does one assess penal imputability in particular cases, since various complex factors may influence a given legal violation? If there is an external violation of the law, imputability is presumed (§3). This seems to involve dolus, or crim-[42] For a more detailed discussion of penal imputability, see the Münster commentary's introduction to this title; also Marzoa, in Com Ex, 282–289.

[43] For detailed reflections on this canon see Marzoa, in Com Ex, 282–303.

[44] CIC 2195, §1.

[45] See especially cc. 1364–1398, most of the sanctionable violations in the code.

[46] The only canon in Book VI explicitly penalizing negligent behavior is c. 1389, §2, requiring a just penalty if one harms another through the culpably negligent exercise of ecclesiastical power, ministry, or function. Yet see also c. 1326, §1, 3°, indicating as a factor aggravating imputability a type of negligence hardly distinguishable from criminal intent. Culpa also may mean culpable ignorance of the law (CCEO 1414, §1).

inal intent; yet since culpa, or negligence, at times grounds imputability, this factor must also be considered. Presumably one violating the law acts in a human fashion with a certain freedom and knowledge. However, since penal law is to be interpreted benignly, the judge or ordinary should not too easily attribute criminal intent to the alleged offender. By contrast, the former code simply presumed criminal intent (dolus) if the law were broken (CIC 2200, §2).[47]

In short the present code requires the alleged offender to demonstrate that grave imputability is not verified in the case in question. However, the current burden of proof is less stringent than in the former code, which required that the presumption of criminal intent be overturned with moral certitude, i.e., beyond a reasonable doubt. The present code states simply that the presumption of imputability is verified unless the contrary is otherwise evident. Hence any evidence posing reasonable questions about such imputability suffices to overturn the presumption.

The retention of such a presumption of imputability still seems questionable, although it is less objectionable than the prior presumption of criminal intent. This legal change reflects the present code's somewhat more pastoral thrust, since it enhances the penal rights of alleged offenders and better protects their reputations by placing a more stringent burden of proof on the ordinary or promoter of justice (c. 1430).

However, the traditional Anglo-American presumption of innocence until one is proven guilty seems still more appropriate, since it better protects the reputation of alleged offenders by placing an even more stringent burden of proof on the institution. Church law should vindicate freedom, justice, and equity even more forcefully than civil law does. Accordingly, the code should presume purity of intent until the guilt of alleged offenders is formally demonstrated.[48]

Insanity and Imputability

Canon 1322 — Those who habitually lack the use of reason are considered to be incapable of a delict, even if they violated a law or precept while seemingly sane.

To assist the competent penal authorities, the next seven canons address various aspects of individual imputability in committing a delict. Separate canons indicate the various factors eliminating, diminishing, or increasing imputability or those factors not to be taken into account in assessing it. Limitations of space permit only brief comments on these factors.[49]

Imputability essentially presupposes a free, deliberate human act. Hence, whatever factors significantly impair one's ability to function freely and deliberately thereby affect imputability, or one's being held accountable for certain actions or omissions.

Such factors are similar to certain grounds for marital nullity (cc. 1095–1107)[50] since certain factors mentioned here which impair one's decisional integrity can affect one's ability to express free and deliberate marital consent.

Canon 1322 deals with the most radical situation, i.e., the insane person or one habitually deprived of the use of reason. The canon does not state a refutable legal presumption. Rather, the person habitually deprived of the use of reason is viewed as incapable of a delict despite appearing normal when breaking the law. Such an individual is not in possession of his or her faculties and

[47] For a comparable Eastern code presumption, see CCEO 1414, §2.

[48] See Green, "Penal Law: A Review of Selected Themes," 243–244; M. Hughes, "The Presumption of Imputability in Canon 1321, §3," Stud Can 21 (1987) 33–35; E. McDonough, "A Gloss on Canon 1321," Stud Can 21 (1987) 383–384.

[49] See also the commentaries on the 1983 code indicated earlier. Commentators on the 1917 code are also helpful given significant continuity between the two codes. For example, see T. L. Bouscaren, A. Ellis, and F. Korth, Canon Law, 4th ed. (Milwaukee: Bruce, 1962) 866–869; A. Vermeersch and I. Creusen, Epitome Iuris Canonici, 7th ed. (Malines-Rome: H. Dessain, 1956) 227–233.

[50] See also cc. 125 and 126 on various factors affecting the validity of a juridic act, e.g., force, fear, ignorance, or error.

hence cannot function freely and deliberately. Such a one is comparable to an infant and hence absolved of responsibility before the community, however serious the legal violation (c. 99).[51]

Factors Exempting from a Penalty[52]

Canon 1323 — The following are not subject to a penalty when they have violated a law or precept:

1° a person who has not yet completed the sixteenth year of age;

2° a person who without negligence was ignorant that he or she violated a law or precept; inadvertence and error are equivalent to ignorance;

3° a person who acted due to physical force or a chance occurrence which the person could not foresee or, if foreseen, avoid;

4° a person who acted coerced by grave fear, even if only relatively grave, or due to necessity or grave inconvenience unless the act is intrinsically evil or tends to the harm of souls;

5° a person who acted with due moderation against an unjust aggressor for the sake of legitimate self-defense or defense of another;

6° a person who lacked the use of reason, without prejudice to the prescripts of cann. 1324, §1, n. 2 and 1325;

7° a person who without negligence thought that one of the circumstances mentioned in nn. 4 or 5 was present.

In contrast to the preceding canon involving the radically impaired individual, the legislator here deals with various violators of a law who are normally in possession of their faculties. However, they are not penalized because of certain factors significantly diminishing their knowledge or freedom. Hence, there is generally no real penal imputability since there is neither criminal intent nor culpable negligence.

The canon lists different factors prompting the legislator to exempt one breaking the law from a penalty. Such factors will be briefly considered in terms of the aforementioned limitations of human awareness and freedom, which are less serious in some cases than others, e.g., age (1°). However, it may be difficult at times to differentiate sharply such imputability-exempting considerations in a given case.

Those under sixteen years of age are entirely exempt from penal imputability (1°).[53] This provision somewhat reflects the civil law tendency to treat juvenile offenders more leniently than other lawbreakers given the former's presumed lack of full maturity.

The impairment of one's understanding is a factor underlying several other numbers of the canon. First of all, inculpable ignorance of a law exempts one from penal imputability since it impairs the deliberateness of one's functioning (2°).[54] Such lack of knowledge about a law, penalty, or fact concerning oneself is not presumed (c. 15, §2) but must be proven if one claims such an exemption from penal imputability. Equally relevant factors exempting from imputability are error, or a false judgment about a given matter,[55] and inadvertence, or a lack of attentiveness to a given matter.

The legislator also exempts from penalties the individual erroneously yet inculpably believing that his or her behavior was attributable to the freedom-impairing circumstances of grave fear, serious inconvenience, necessity, or legitimate self-defense (7°). Likewise, such error is not presumed but must be demonstrated to exempt one from imputability.

The impairment of personal freedom is a key factor elsewhere in the canon. For example, one [51] See c. 1095, 1° on the marital incapacity of those lacking the sufficient use of reason.

[52] For helpful reflections see Marzoa, in Com Ex, 306–314.

[53] By contrast, the Eastern code speaks of fourteen years of age (CCEO 1413, §1).

[54] On ignorance invalidating marital consent, see c. 1096.

[55] On the effect of ignorance or error on the validity of juridic acts, see c. 126; on error invalidating marital consent, see c. 1097.

is exempt from all imputability if the law is violated in the circumstances of a purely unforeseeable accident. This exemption also applies if the legal violation could have been foreseen but not prevented or if one's actions result from irresistible external physical force (3°).[56]

A comparable pressure situation is one in which a person violates the law out of necessity. This means that one breaks the law to preclude the threat of some personal or social evil arising from its observance. Furthermore, while it may be burdensome to observe any law, serious inconvenience in observing positive ecclesiastical law possibly exempts one from a penalty. This is because such a law does not bind in circumstances in which there is no reasonable alternative to its violation. Likewise subject to coercion is one who acts out of grave fear, even if only relative, i.e., sufficient to intimidate the accused even if not necessarily all persons (4°).[57]

However, if the legal violations mentioned in the prior paragraph are intrinsically evil acts[58] or will cause significant pastoral damage, an offender is not exempt from all imputability. This is because certain significant ecclesial values to be fostered[59] are at stake, and their violation needs to be addressed by church authorities.

One violating a law in legitimate defense of self or another against an actual threat is likewise exempt from a penalty if the person used only that amount of force necessary to repel the unjust aggressor (5°). A certain moderation must be verified if the legal violation is not to reflect criminal intent.

Finally, the prior canon indicated that the person habitually lacking the use of reason was incapable of a delict. A somewhat comparable situation involves a person who temporarily but involuntarily lacks the use of reason and hence cannot place a human act, e.g., involuntary drunkenness, subjection to drugs or uncontrollable passion (6°). If this is the case when the law is violated, such a person is exempt from any penalty.

Factors Diminishing Imputability[60]

Canon 1324 — §1. The perpetrator of a violation is not exempt from a penalty, but the penalty established by law or precept must be tempered or a penance employed in its place if the delict was committed:

1° by a person who had only the imperfect use of reason;

2° by a person who lacked the use of reason because of drunkenness or another similar culpable disturbance of mind;

3° from grave heat of passion which did not precede and hinder all deliberation of mind and consent of will and provided that the passion itself had not been stimulated or fostered voluntarily;

4° by a minor who has completed the age of sixteen years;

5° by a person who was coerced by grave fear, even if only relatively grave, or due to necessity or grave inconvenience if the delict is intrinsically evil or tends to the harm of souls;

6° by a person who acted without due moderation against an unjust aggressor for the sake of legitimate self-defense or defense of another;

7° against someone who gravely and unjustly provokes the person;

8° by a person who thought in culpable error that one of the circumstances mentioned in can. 1323, nn. 4 or 5 was present;

[56] On the impact of force and grave fear on the validity of juridic acts, see c. 125, §1; on the invalidating effect of such factors on marital consent, see c. 1103.

[57] For a practical example, see the commentary on c. 1382.

[58] Certain acts are said to be seriously wrong in themselves prescinding from circumstances or the human agent's intention. See CCC, 1755–1756. For various positions in the contemporary Catholic discussion of this issue, see C. Curran and R. McCormick, eds., Readings in Moral Theology, No. 1: Moral Norms and Catholic Tradition (New York: Paulist, 1979).

[59] The headings of the first six titles of part two of Book VI (cc. 1364–1398) indicate some pertinent ecclesial values.

[60] For helpful reflections see Marzoa, in Com Ex, 316–324.

9° by a person who without negligence did not know that a penalty was attached to a law or precept;

10° by a person who acted without full imputability provided that the imputability was grave.

§2. A judge can act in the same manner if another circumstance is present which diminishes the gravity of a delict.

§3. In the circumstances mentioned in §1, the accused is not bound by a latae sententiae penalty.

Various factors do not exempt one breaking the law from a penalty but diminish imputability (§1). Hence, the judge or ordinary in a ferendae sententiae penalty situation must temper the penalty specified in law or substitute a lesser measure such as a penance (c. 1340). Since this canon largely restates the preceding factors, a briefer treatment of the pertinent issues should suffice.

Instead of the integrity of the alleged offender's decisional process being significantly, if not totally, impaired (c. 1323), here it is only partially impaired. Hence, the person functions somewhat freely and deliberately and accordingly is somewhat accountable for the legal violation. The graver the delict and the imputability, the graver the penalty; and the less serious the delict and the imputability, the less serious the penalty (principle of penal proportionality).

Such limited imputability is verified in the following cases in paragraph one: those without the full use of their faculties, e.g., those who are senile (1°); those culpably lacking the use of reason due to voluntary, yet not premeditated, drunkenness or another mental disturbance possibly caused by voluntarily using mind-altering drugs (2°); those driven by culpable, yet not premeditated, passion which does not totally deprive them of the use of their faculties (3°); the minor between sixteen and eighteen years of age (4°);[61] the person acting out of grave fear or other freedom-impairing factors if the legal violation is intrinsically evil or seriously pastorally detrimental (5°); the person using excessive force in self-defense or in defending another against an unjust attack (6°); the person breaking the law in resisting a serious and unjustified provocation by another (7°); the person erroneously but culpably thinking that the excusing causes of grave fear or legitimate self- defense are verified in a given situation (8°), the person aware of a law but inculpably unaware that its violation carries a sanction (9°).

Finally, besides the aforementioned specific factors mitigating imputability, the code states generically and logically that if one breaking the law were not fully imputable but at least gravely imputable, a diminished penalty is warranted (10°; CIC 2218, §2). The competent penal authority needs to assess not simply the offender's personal situation but also the ecclesial damage done by the delict.

Once again the code provides ample latitude for judicial or administrative discretion in dealing with legal violations. The present canon should be read in connection with canon 1345 empowering penal authorities to abstain from imposing any penalty in certain situations of mitigated imputability if the offender's spiritual well-being can be better served otherwise. The present canon also reflects the difficulty of comprehensively listing the factors that diminish imputability. Hence, it empowers, but does not require, the penal authority to consider other imputability-mitigating circumstances relevant to a particular case (§2).

Finally, if any of the imputability-mitigating factors mentioned in paragraph one are verified, a latae sententiae penalty is not incurred, e.g., the excommunication possibly warranted for a procured abortion (§3; c. 1398). This is another example of legislative caution regarding such penalties and an effort to preclude needless anxiety regarding the incurring of the penalty. This provision would probably be operative primarily during a process to declare, or formally confirm, the existence of such a penalty. The competent penal authority should weigh carefully the penal significance of those factors.

[61] Realistically speaking, few, if any, ecclesiastical penalties seem relevant to minors.

Factors Not Mitigating Imputability

Canon 1325 — Crass, supine, or affected ignorance can never be considered in applying the prescripts of cann. 1323 and 1324; likewise drunkenness or other disturbances of mind cannot be considered if they are sought deliberately in order to commit or excuse a delict, nor can passion which is voluntarily stimulated or fostered.

This canon precludes certain offenders from deliberately taking advantage of some of the previously mentioned imputability-exempting or mitigating factors to excuse themselves from penal imputability. First of all, it is not mitigated by crass, supine, or affected ignorance. Crass ignorance means gross ignorance about what a reasonable person should know. Supine ignorance means a careless indifference to knowing what other persons regard as necessary knowledge. Affected ignorance is deliberately cultivated to excuse a legal violation.

Furthermore, imputability is not mitigated by drunkenness or another mental disorder, such as a drug-induced stupor, deliberately sought to violate a law or excuse such a violation. This is also true for voluntarily stimulated or fostered passion. In such situations of premeditated behavior, the offender consciously and voluntarily precipitates certain factors subsequently impairing personal deliberation and freedom.

While acts influenced by such factors are not entirely deliberate or free, they reflect a certain bad faith and criminal intent. Hence, the offender is to be dealt with as if these ordinarily mitigating factors were not operative.

Factors Aggravating Imputability[62]

Canon 1326 — §1. A judge can punish the following more gravely than the law or precept has established:

1° a person who after a condemnation or after the declaration of a penalty continues so to offend that from the circumstances the obstinate ill will of the person can prudently be inferred;

2° a person who has been established in some dignity or who has abused a position of authority or office in order to commit the delict;

3° an accused person who, when a penalty has been established against a delict based on negligence, foresaw the event and nonetheless omitted precautions to avoid it, which any diligent person would have employed.

§2. If the penalty established in the cases mentioned in §1 is latae sententiae, another penalty or a penance can be added.

Besides the lengthy list of factors exempting one from a penalty or diminishing imputability, the code specifies a few factors aggravating imputability. In such cases, because of the seriousness of the delict, the offender might warrant a more severe penalty than that stated in the law. However, while canon 1324 requires the penal authority to temper the penalty given mitigated imputability, here the possible increasing of the penalty is left entirely to the discretion of that authority.

For example, after a ferendae sententiae penalty is imposed or a latae sententiae penalty declared, an offender may commit the same delict again so that continuing bad faith can reasonably be presumed (§1, 1°). Traditionally such bad faith has been viewed as a significant penal factor, especially in the case of censures, whose primary purpose is to break such bad faith and foster ecclesial reconciliation. In such cases of legal recidivism, the original penalty has not had the intended deterrent effect, and the legislator hopes that more severe penalties will facilitate the offender's conversion.

Penal imputability is also aggravated if one with an established ecclesiastical rank violates the law (§1, 2°). The precise meaning of the term dignitas here is not entirely clear. However, it probably refers to certain clerics who have received special honors.[63] Their dishonoring their significant ecclesial status seems to underlie this provision.

[62] Cf. CCEO 1416.

Yet not only such clerics may be punished more severely than other believers. The abuse of one's authority or office to break the law also aggravates imputability.[64] This applies to both clerics and laity in official ecclesiastical positions (§ 1, 2°). Such persons violate their institutional trust and significantly fail to exercise authority in a spirit of ecclesial service, e.g., the episcopal ordinations carried out by Archbishop Lefebvre in the early 1980s without a pontifical mandate (cc. 1382; 1013).

As noted earlier, imputability generally presupposes criminal intent, not negligence in observing the law. In fact, only one delict in Book VI arises from negligence, i.e., damage caused another by negligently positing or omitting an act of ecclesiastical power, ministry, or function (c. 1389, §2). Here or whenever particular law penalizes negligence, the imputability of the offender may be aggravated at times. This would be true if an offender foresaw the detrimental consequences of such negligence yet took no reasonable precautions to preclude them (§1, 3°). The presumably obstinate defiance of the law probably grounds the heightened imputability. There is only a very fine line between such negligence and genuine criminal intent.

The legislator's intention to deal severely with such heightened imputability is also evident in paragraph two, which permits an additional ferendae sententiae penalty or penance (c. 1340) in a latae sententiae penalty situation. Presumably this would occur when the latter penalty is formally declared. It is a rare exception to the code's general tendency to mitigate the force of such penalties.

Particular Law on Imputability

Canon 1327 — Particular law can establish other exempting, mitigating, or aggravating circumstances besides the cases in cann. 1323–1326, either by general norm or for individual delicts. Likewise, circumstances can be established in a precept which exempt from, mitigate, or increase a penalty established by the precept.

The enhancing of particular penal law options (c. 1315) explains this provision for particular law discretion in determining other factors affecting imputability (cc. 1323–1326) either as a general rule or regarding specific delicts. Such discretion may not be exercised often, but it enables diocesan bishops and other infra-universal penal legislators to adapt the code in dealing with distinctive local problems, e.g., clerical or lay financial malfeasance. Such penal discretion is also pertinent to precepts, which should be viewed in relationship to the laws they are intended to enforce (c. 1319).

Attempted Delict[65]

Canon 1328 — §1. A person who has done or omitted something in order to commit a delict and yet, contrary to his or her intent, did not commit the delict is not bound by the penalty established for a completed delict unless the law or precept provides otherwise.

§2. If the acts or omissions are by their nature conducive to the execution of the delict, however, their perpetrator can be subjected to a penance or penal remedy unless the perpetrator voluntarily ceased from carrying out the delict which had been initiated. If scandal or some other grave damage or danger resulted, however, the perpetrator, even if he or she voluntarily desisted, can [63] For example, on the episcopal dignitas, see cc. 339, §2 and 481, §2; on the cardinalatial dignitas, see cc. 351, §3 and 833, §2. The 1917 code, unlike the 1983 code, used this term to designate certain significant figures in chapters of canons. See CIC 391–422 passim. One might also note that occasionally in cc. 1364–1398 clerics are subject to additional penalties besides those envisioned for the laity, e.g., a suspension as well as an interdict for the cleric falsely accusing a confessor of confessional solicitation (c. 1390, §1).

[64] This provision seems unnecessary given c. 1389, §1 on punishment of abuse of ecclesiastical power or function unless the code otherwise penalizes such an abuse.

[65] Cf. CCEO 1418.

be punished with a just penalty, although one lesser than that established for a completed delict.

This canon deals with a somewhat complex issue, i.e., the implications for penal imputability of situations in which a delict is not actually committed, or completed, after being initiated.[66] Paragraph one envisions a situation in which a person does or omits something to commit a delict. However, the individual's delictual purpose is not achieved because of circumstances beyond his or her control or intent. Normally the penalty specified in law is not warranted if the delict has not been completed because of the lack of ecclesial damage (cf. c. 1321, §1). However, a law could penalize even an attempt at breaking the law, e.g., the attempted marriage of certain clerics and religious (c. 1394).

Nevertheless, merely because the penalty specified for the completed delict is not incurred does not prevent church authorities from employing certain legal-pastoral measures to deal with the situation. Paragraph two envisions a situation in which the aforementioned action or omission is naturally conducive to the commission of the delict. A quasi-penal measure such as a penal remedy or a penance (cc. 1339–1340) might still be imposed to highlight the ecclesial seriousness of the issue. However, if the person involved has a change of heart after initiating the delict, no such measure is normally warranted because of the lack of contempt of church authority. By way of exception, if even the attempted delict causes great ecclesial scandal or damage, an indeterminate just penalty may be imposed on such an individual. Yet it is to be less than that determined for the completed delict since penalties normally presuppose completed delicts (penal proportionality). There is ample room here for penal discretion in assessing the relevant ecclesial values (c. 1349).

[66] For a more detailed discussion of this canon, see Borras, 34–38; Marzoa, in Com Ex, 334–341.

Collaboration in Delict[67]

Canon 1329 — §1. If ferendae sententiae penalties are established for the principal perpetrator, those who conspire together to commit a delict and are not expressly named in a law or precept are subject to the same penalties or to others of the same or lesser gravity.

§2. Accomplices who are not named in a law or precept incur a latae sententiae penalty attached to a delict if without their assistance the delict would not have been committed, and the penalty is of such a nature that it can affect them; otherwise, they can be punished by ferendae sententiae penalties.

Thus far the discussion of imputability has focused largely on individual offenders. Yet at times a law may be broken by several people acting together, e.g., procuring an abortion (c. 1398).[68] This canon presupposes a distinction between so-called necessary and secondary collaborators despite the absence of such terminology.

Necessary collaborators are those without whose cooperation the delict could not have been committed, e.g., persons living in concubinage with a cleric (c. 1395, §1). Such collaborators are normally punished as severely as the principal offender given their significant delictual involvement. The involvement of secondary collaborators, on the other hand, is not essential to the commission of the delict, e.g., the co-consecrating bishop during an illicit episcopal consecration (c. 1382). Given their lesser delictual involvement, such secondary collaborators are correspondingly punished less severely than the principal offender.

The canon deals with the frequent situation in which such collaborators are not expressly named in the penal law that has been violated. Paragraph one on ferendae sententiae penalties states that such collaborators are subject to the same penalties as the principal offender or to other similar or lesser penalties. Understandably, the penalties for necessary collaborators will be the same or at least similar to those for the principal offender. However, the penalties for secondary collaborators will be less serious. In all such instances the penal authority must assess the relevance of the aforementioned circumstances affecting imputability. This is also true for the following paragraph.

[67] Cf. CCEO 1417.

[68] For a thoughtful examination of such collaboration, see J. Coriden, "Canon 1398: Canonical Penalty for Abortion as Applicable to Administrators of Clinics and Hospitals," in RRAO 1986, 80–85.

Paragraph two on latae sententiae penalties somewhat more explicitly differentiates between necessary collaborators (accomplices strictly speaking) and secondary collaborators. Necessary collaborators are liable to the same penalty as the principal offender if it can affect them. However, at times this is impossible; for example, a layperson collaborating with a cleric in a delict cannot be suspended. However, such a layperson (e.g., the partner of the cleric attempting marriage—c. 1394, §1) could be liable to a comparable ferendae sententiae penalty, e.g., interdict. In a latae sententiae context so-called secondary collaborators could also be liable to less severe ferendae sententiae penalties given the principle of penal proportionality.[69] Here is another area characterized by ample penal discretion options.

Declaration of Mind or Intent

Canon 1330 — A delict which consists in a declaration or in another manifestation of will, doctrine, or knowledge must not be considered completed if no one perceives the declaration or manifestation.

The final canon in this title is similar to canon 1328 on the attempted delict. The present canon clarifies what is meant by a completed delict whenever a person expresses his or her mind or intent verbally or in writing presumably in a fashion contrary to ecclesial values. The necessary "externalization factor" characterizing any delict (c. 1321, §1) is important here.

For example, whatever may be one's moral culpability, it is not a delict technically simply to hold heretical views. Someone must perceive the expression of such views if it is to be penally imputable. The implications of such a perception ideally should be clarified during the penal process. For example, such a perception might refer to the reaction of a class listening to a lecturer espousing allegedly heretical views (c. 1364). Another example of such a perception might be that of a church authority figure who initiates a preliminary penal investigation based on what turns out to be a false denunciation of a priest for confessional solicitation or some other delict (c. 1390, §1–§2).[70]

TITLE IV
PENALTIES AND OTHER PUNISHMENTS[71]
[cc. 1331–1340]

The present title does not describe the various penalties in detail; rather, it simply clarifies their principal effects for those breaking the law. Separate chapters consider censures and expiatory penalties (penalties) and penal remedies and penances (other punishments). This is a distinctly Latin code phenomenon. The Eastern code contains numerous similar provisions but does not explicitate the aforementioned distinction.[72]

[69] Martin seems incorrect in asserting that this part of the canon deals solely with necessary collaborators (761). So-called secondary collaborators are also "accomplices" but are understandably treated less severely than necessary collaborators because of the former's lesser delictual involvement. Here again the code mitigates the force of latae sententiae penalties.

[70] The following other delicts might exemplify the aforementioned declaration or manifestation: perjury (c. 1368), blasphemy (c. 1369), or teaching a condemned but not heretical doctrine (c. 1371, 1°).

[71] Besides the Münster commentary, see Borras, 45–50; 62–100; Green, in CLSA Com, 906–911; Martin, in CLSGBI Com, 762–770; Rees, 385–398; various authors in Com Ex, 352–388.

[72] Cf. CCEO 1426–1435.

CHAPTER I
CENSURES
[cc. 1331–1335]

The first chapter of the title deals with various censures, i.e., medicinal penalties depriving obstinate offenders of access to various ecclesiastical goods, such as the sacraments or church offices, until they are restored to full ecclesial communion. Such a restoration is a basic Christian obligation (c. 209).

Unlike expiatory penalties, censures focus more sharply on the offender's reform and reintegration within the community. Ferendae sententiae censures require a formal warning by a competent penal authority, usually an ordinary, before being imposed validly (c. 1347, §1). However, for latae sententiae censures the warning is presumably given by the law itself.

Censures are always indefinite in duration, since they must be remitted when the offender ceases being contumacious and is willing to be reintegrated within the communion (cc. 1358, §1; 1347, §2; cf. c. 980). Such censures include excommunication, interdict, and suspension; the first two can be incurred by any believer, while the last one is reserved to clerics. Unlike the subsequent illustrative listing of expiatory penalties, this listing of censures is comprehensive. The following reflections highlight key features of such censures.

Effects of Excommunication[73]

Canon 1331 — §1. An excommunicated person is forbidden:

1° to have any ministerial participation in celebrating the sacrifice of the Eucharist or any other ceremonies of worship whatsoever;

2° to celebrate the sacraments or sacramentals and to receive the sacraments;

3° to exercise any ecclesiastical offices, ministries, or functions whatsoever or to place acts of governance.

§2. If the excommunication has been imposed or declared, the offender:

1° who wishes to act against the prescript of §1, n. 1 must be prevented from doing so, or the liturgical action must be stopped unless a grave cause precludes this;

2° invalidly places acts of governance which are illicit according to the norm of §1, n. 3;

3° is forbidden to benefit from privileges previously granted;

4° cannot acquire validly a dignity, office, or other function in the Church;

5° does not appropriate the benefits of a dignity, office, any function, or pension, which the offender has in the Church.

The present code does not define excommunication (CIC 2257, §1), which prohibits the exercise of certain subjective spiritual rights rooted primarily in one's irrevocable baptismal incorporation in the Church (c. 96). However, the excommunicated person remains a member of the Church and subject to its legislation unless the delict prompting the penalty entails a formal leaving of the Church, e.g., schism (cc. 751; 1364). Even such persons remain subject to most church laws but need not observe the canonical form for marriage (c. 1117) or obtain a permission or dispensation to marry a non-Catholic (cc. 1124; 1086, §1–§2).

Interestingly enough, the degree to which an excommunicated person is separated from the Catholic communion varies greatly depending on the nature of the delict. For example, one is excommunicated for heresy, schism, or apostasy (c. 1364, §1), which significantly alienate a person from the Church. However, a confessor is also excommunicated for directly violating the seal of confession (c. 1388, §1). Such a breach of the priest-penitent relationship, however morally culpable, hardly constitutes the same ecclesial alienation as the prior delicts.

[73] Cf. CCEO 1434. For a detailed discussion of the effects of excommunication, see Borras, 69–77; J. Bernal, in Com Ex, 354–360. For a list of Latin code excommunications, see CLSA Com, 932.

Nevertheless, in all instances of excommunication, like interdict (c. 1332), all of its effects are operative. This is not true for suspension (c. 1333), whose potential effects can be adapted by the competent penal authority to fit different legal-pastoral situations.

Canon 1331 distinguishes between a non-declared latae sententiae excommunication and a declared latae sententiae or a ferendae sententiae excommunication. The formal church intervention in the latter two instances entails more extensive legal restrictions for the excommunicated person than were operative before such intervention.[74] For example, the confessor may not remit a declared latae sententiae excommunication in certain situations of pastoral urgency outside of danger of death (c. 1357).

Some effects of excommunication are liturgical in character, e.g., prohibition of active ministerial participation[75] in the Eucharist and other acts of public worship (§1, 1°) and prohibition of celebrating the sacraments or sacramentals or receiving the sacraments (§1, 2°).[76] These prohibitions do not simply reflect the will of the legislator but rather flow from the nature of the ecclesial alienation underlying the delict warranting excommunication.

Such prohibitions affect the liceity but not the validity of such acts. Furthermore, the penalty does not prevent such persons from attending the Eucharist or other liturgical services, much less prohibit private prayers or devotions. Such participation may actually prompt conversion of heart and lead to full reintegration into ecclesial communion.

The second set of restrictions affects the excommunicated person's participation in church governance. Such a one is not deprived of any ecclesiastical offices, ministries, or functions (c. 1336, §1, 2°), but may neither licitly exercise them nor posit acts of legislative, executive, or judicial power, ordinary or delegated (§1, 3°). However, in the case of a ferendae sententiae or declared latae sententiae excommunication, such acts of governance are invalid and not simply illicit (§2, 2°).

The third set of restrictions concerns the eligibility of the excommunicated individual to receive certain ecclesiastical benefits. Declaration of a latae sententiae penalty or imposition of a ferendae sententiae penalty prohibits one from: (a) enjoying privileges (c. 76, §1) already acquired (§2, 3°); (b) validly acquiring any ecclesiastical dignity, office, or function (§2, 4°); and (c) receiving the income from any ecclesiastical dignity, office, function, or pension (§2, 5°). In the case of clerics, however, this last provision must be interpreted in light of canon 1350, §1 on the basic right to support of even the excommunicated cleric.[77] Furthermore, the civil law implications of possible deprivations of income must be considered in preparing contracts for church employees.

The most significant revision process issue regarding excommunication was whether it should continue to preclude access to all the sacraments. The original schema would have permitted the excommunicated (or interdicted) individual to receive penance and anointing for peace of conscience even prior to formal external forum remission of the penalty.

Sharp criticism of this innovation undoubtedly influenced a special May 1977 code commission meeting to vote to maintain the traditional prohi-[74] Comparable restrictions are also operative for interdicts and suspensions.

[75] This refers to either formally installed lay ministries (c. 230, §1) or ordained ministry (cc. 1008–1009).

[76] Theoretically, after the excommunication is declared or imposed, the excommunicated individual challenging this prohibition is to be ejected from the sacred place and the liturgical action discontinued barring a grave reason for continuing it. This seems true for most liturgical celebrations, hence this part of the canon seems unrealistic (§2, 1°). On not admitting to Holy Communion those whose excommunication has been declared or imposed, see c. 915.

[77] For examples of other canonical restrictions on those who are excommunicated, see c. 171, §1, 3° on voting in canonical elections, c. 316 on membership in public associations of the faithful, and c. 1109 on officially assisting at a marriage.

bition on such persons' receiving any sacraments. The original schema presumably failed to take adequate cognizance of the ecclesial implications of sacramental reconciliation and of the interrelationship between excommunication and the sacrament of penance. It seemed somewhat incongruous to the commission that one could be absolved from sins yet still be subject to a censure indicating an irregular ecclesial status.[78]

Effects of Interdict[79]

Canon 1332 — The prohibitions mentioned in can. 1331, §1, nn. 1 and 2 bind an interdicted person. If the interdict has been imposed or declared, however, the prescript of can. 1331, §2, n. 1 must be observed.

The current notion of interdict simplifies the 1917 code, which envisioned personal or local interdicts, depending on whether the penalty affected individuals or a group of believers directly or rather indirectly because they lived in a certain territory (CIC 2268). In the latter instance even individuals not technically guilty of a delict might have been deprived of certain ecclesial goods such as access to some liturgical ministries.

Despite criticism of this penalty, the code reaffirms the personal interdict while not retaining local interdicts, reflecting a pastoral concern that penalties not be imposed indiscriminately on the guilty and innocent alike.

The interdict entails the same liturgical restrictions as excommunication. However, the interdict does not affect any governmental functions or personal prerogatives, such as privileges, eligibility for various offices, or the reception of income.[80]

Effects of Suspension[81]

Canon 1333 — §1. Suspension, which can affect only clerics, prohibits:

1° either all or some acts of the power of orders;

2° either all or some acts of the power of governance;

3° the exercise of either all or some of the rights or functions attached to an office.

§2. A law or precept can establish that a suspended person cannot place acts of governance validly after a condemnatory or declaratory sentence.

§3. A prohibition never affects:

1° the offices or the power of governance which are not under the power of the superior who establishes the penalty;

2° the right of residence which the offender may have by reason of office;

3° the right to administer goods which may pertain to the office of the person suspended if the penalty is latae sententiae.

§4. A suspension prohibiting a person from receiving benefits, a stipend, pensions, or any other such thing entails the obligation of making restitution for whatever has been received illegitimately, even if in good faith.

Unlike excommunication and interdict, which all believers may incur, only clerics may incur a suspension, which totally or partially restricts their liturgical and governmental functioning. However, unlike the expiatory privation of office (c. 1336, §1, 2°), the suspended cleric does not lose his office. Suspensions also differ from the preceding censures since their effects are separa-

[78] See T. Green, "Penal Law Revisited: The Revision of the Penal Law Schema," Stud Can 15 (1981) 155–156.

[79] Cf. CCEO 1431. The Eastern code actually speaks not of "interdict" but of "minor excommunication." For a helpful discussion of interdicts in the Latin code, see Borras, 80–84. For a list of such interdicts, see CLSA Com, 932.

[80] For some effects of interdict indicated elsewhere in the code, see cc. 874, §1, 4° and 893, §1 prohibiting the interdicted person from being a baptism or confirmation sponsor, 1071, 1, 5° requiring the local ordinary's permission for an interdicted person to marry, and 1109 prohibiting a local ordinary or pastor from validly assisting at the marriages of their subjects after the interdict has been declared or imposed.

[81] Cf. CCEO 1432. For some helpful reflections on suspension, see Borras, 84–87; Bernal in Com Ex, 364–369. For a list of Latin code suspensions, see CLSA Com, 933.

ble and more or less comprehensive depending on the penal authority's assessment of the seriousness of the offense. Like any censure, such restrictions seek to motivate the cleric to be reintegrated into ecclesial communion and restored to full ministerial functioning.

Unlike the prior two canons, which clarify precisely the inseparable effects of excommunication and interdict, the first two paragraphs of this canon are rather open-ended in specifying the effects of suspension. Its precise scope is clarified in the next canon, permitting significant discretion for the competent penal authority.

Paragraph one of this initial canon on suspension differentiates between total or partial (a) prohibitions of the exercise of the power of orders, e.g., celebration of Eucharist, (b) restrictions on the power of governance, e.g., deciding a marriage case, and (c) limitations of the exercise of various rights or responsibilities related to an office, e.g., rights and duties of pastors (cc. 528–538).

Unlike the Eastern code (CCEO 1432, §3), paragraph two provides for the possible invalidity of governmental acts of the suspended cleric, which are otherwise only illicit without formal church intervention. However, the pertinent law (e.g., c. 1109) must indicate that such an invalidating effect follows the judicial sentence or administrative decree. The law seeks to protect the faithful's access even to such suspended clerics for various governmental acts.

The code's intent to circumscribe the effects of suspension is clear in its limiting the power of ecclesiastical superiors to penalize clerics (§3). This protection of clerics is somewhat comparable to canon 1317 limiting causes of dismissal to those delicts mentioned in the code.

Particular law suspensions, unlike those specified in the code, affect only those offices or aspects of the power of governance under the authority of the penalizing superior. Hence, if a cleric's office were conferred by an authority other than his own bishop, he could still exercise it even if he were suspended in his own diocese due to particular law (§3, 1°).

Another protection of the suspended cleric is the humanitarian provision that he still enjoys the right of residence connected with his office, e.g., the suspended pastor living in his rectory (§3, 2°; c. 533). If the suspension were latae sententiae, he would also have the right to administer the goods pertaining to his office, e.g., parish property (§3, 3°; cc. 532; 1281–1288). The code intends to protect the parish financial patrimony and assure its continuing administration. In a ferendae sententiae situation, the competent penal authority presumably would address this significant administrative issue, e.g., by appointing a temporary parish financial administrator.

If the suspended cleric profits illegitimately from the income related to his office, he is to make restitution to the Church in justice even if he acted in good faith (§4). However, even the suspended cleric has a right to decent support (cc. 281; 1350, §1).

Scope of Suspension

Canon 1334 — §1. Within the limits established by the preceding canon, either the law or precept itself or the sentence or decree which imposes the penalty defines the extent of a suspension.

§2. A law, but not a precept, can establish a latae sententiae suspension without additional determination or limitation; such a penalty has all the effects listed in can. 1333, §1.

Since the effects of suspension vary notably, its exact scope must be determined in the law establishing it or the sentence or decree imposing it (§1).[82] Presumably the suspension is generalized in focus unless it is explicitly limited to certain acts of orders or governance or the exercise of certain rights or office-related functions (c. 1333, §1, 3°).

However, the legislator cautions against the indiscriminate use of a general latae sententiae suspension (§2). Only the law (universal or particular) but not a precept may establish such with the corresponding liturgical, governmental, and office restrictions (c. 1333, §1). This is another example of administrative restraint regarding penal precepts (c. 1319, §2).

[82] The former suspension ex informata conscientia (from an informed conscience) not requiring a process has been abolished (CIC 2186–2194). Every ferendae sententiae suspension must be imposed pursuant to a formal process.

Suspension of Prohibition[83]

Canon 1335 — If a censure prohibits the celebration of sacraments or sacramentals or the placing of an act of governance, the prohibition is suspended whenever it is necessary to care for the faithful in danger of death. If a latae sententiae censure has not been declared, the prohibition is also suspended whenever a member of the faithful requests a sacrament or sacramental or an act of governance; a person is permitted to request this for any just cause.

The code recognizes a need to provide for the spiritual welfare of the faithful, particularly but not exclusively in certain extreme pastoral situations (c. 1752). Hence, this exceptional measure temporarily suspends the liturgical-governmental prohibitions affecting any censured cleric even if another cleric is available. Quite secondarily there is a concern to protect the penalized cleric's reputation (c. 220) if his irregular status is unknown to the faithful. Once again the degree of authoritative penal intervention notably qualifies the types of situations in which the censured cleric may respond to the sacramental or governmental requests of the faithful.

In danger of death the censured cleric's activity is not restricted, whatever the nature of the censure. However, outside of this extreme pastoral situation, the same ministerial options are generally[84] available only to the cleric whose latae sententiae censure has not been formally declared by church authority. In such situations the faithful may generally seek such ministry for any just cause, e.g., deepening one's spiritual life.

In contrast, the cleric subject to a declared latae sententiae or a ferendae sententiae censure may not minister to the faithful outside of danger of death, whether they legitimately seek a sacrament, sacramental, or act of governance. If he attempts to do so, acts of the power of orders are valid but illicit. Furthermore, governmental acts are valid or not depending on whether the declaratory or condemnatory sentence invalidates such acts.

This canon exemplifies the less stringent canonical effects of the non-declared latae sententiae penalty. Similar pastoral provisions also govern the observance of expiatory penalties (c. 1338, §3; cf. also c. 1352 on observing penalties). In such situations the penalty is not remitted; its observance is temporarily suspended because of prevailing community pastoral interests.

CHAPTER II
EXPIATORY PENALTIES
[cc. 1336–1338]

Despite criticism that expiatory penalties seem overly punitive and inadequately pastoral, the Latin code maintains them,[85] specifying some general principles regarding them and especially their effects. These penalties certainly envision the offender's spiritual well-being. However, more forcefully than censures, "expiatory" penalties emphasize remedying the societal damage done by the delict and deterring others from similar behavior. Besides this difference in orientation, expiatory penalties do not require a warning before being imposed. They may be imposed perpetually, or forever (e.g., clerical dismissal), indefinitely, or for a definite period of time (e.g., c. 1383 prohibiting a bishop from conferring a sacred order for a year). The rules on their cessation, which differ somewhat from the rules on the cessation of censures, will be addressed later.

[83] Cf. CCEO 1435.

[84] The term "generally" is used because of a May 19, 1997 PCILT declaration that clerics attempting marriage and thereby incurring a latae sententiae suspension (c. 1394, §1) may normally not licitly minister to the faithful according to this canon even if their suspension is undeclared. Although certain married clerics may legitimately function in the Latin church, the attempted marriage of clerics not so authorized allegedly entails an objective ministerial unfitness. Hence the faithful may not legitimately seek the ministry of such clerics. No other cleric whose censure is undeclared is subject to such restrictions. However, even such "married clerics" may minister to the faithful in danger of death (e.g., c. 976). See PCILT, "Declaration on Married Priests and Sacramental Ministry," Origins 27/4 (June 12, 1997) 64.

[85] The Eastern code stresses the medicinal character of penalties and does not explicitly distinguish between censures and expiatory penalties. However, it provides in practice for "expiatory" penalties (CCEO 1429–1430).

Various Expiatory Penalties

Canon 1336 — §1. In addition to other penalties which the law may have established, the following are expiatory penalties which can affect an offender either perpetually, for a prescribed time, or for an indeterminate time:

1° a prohibition or an order concerning residence in a certain place or territory;

2° privation of a power, office, function, right, privilege, faculty, favor, title, or insignia, even merely honorary;

3° a prohibition against exercising those things listed under n. 2, or a prohibition against exercising them in a certain place or outside a certain place; these prohibitions are never under pain of nullity;

4° a penal transfer to another office;

5° dismissal from the clerical state.

§2. Only those expiatory penalties listed in §1, n. 3 can be latae sententiae.

As in the case of censures, the code does not define expiatory penalties but simply lists some of them, yet not in an exhaustive fashion. Hence, additional ones may be established in universal or particular law.[86]

Some penalties affect only religious according to their constitutions (residence restrictions in §1, 1°) or clerics (e.g., residence restrictions in §1, 1° or dismissal in §1, 5°). Others, however rarely, may possibly affect the laity, especially those holding ecclesiastical office, who are not subject to suspension (e.g., privations in §1, 2° or prohibitions in §1, 3°).

Several penalties are irrevocable in character, e.g., various privations of the power of governance (not orders), office, function, etc. (§1, 2°) and penal transfer to another office (§1, 4°),[87] all of which require a formal judicial process (c. 1342, §2).

The most serious perpetual expiatory penalty is dismissal from the clerical state, whose comprehensive effects are specified in canons 291–293, e.g., loss of all clerical rights (§1, 5°).[88] Dismissal can be imposed only for the delicts specifically mentioned in the code.[89] It is a last resort provision after other measures to deal with an intransigent cleric have failed. Furthermore, to protect his rights adequately, it can normally be imposed only after a formal judicial process involving a collegiate tribunal of three judges.

The other expiatory penalties do not have such an irrevocable character, e.g., the restrictions on residence in §1, 1° and various prohibitions of the exercise of the power of governance, office, or function in §1, 3°. Such temporary expiatory penalties never affect the valid exercise of such competencies. The list is not exhaustive to permit legislators to determine other expiatory penalties corresponding to differing pastoral situations.

[86] For a detailed discussion of expiatory penalties in the code, see Borras, 89–95; G. Di Mattia, in Com Ex, 372–383.

[87] On the general provisions for a non-penal transfer of an officeholder, see cc. 190–191. On the transfer of an unwilling pastor, which primarily envisions enhancing the spiritual welfare of the faithful rather than punishing him, see cc. 1748–1752. In expediting a penal transfer, however, the judge should consult with the pertinent ordinary regarding the penalized individual's eligibility to assume the new office.

[88] Cf. CCEO 1433, §2 (deposition). Unlike the Latin code, the Eastern code also envisions demoting a cleric to a lower grade (CCEO 1433, §1).

[89] See commentary on c. 1317, n. 33.

The code's tendency to restrict the scope of latae sententiae penalties is also evident here, since only the prohibitions of §1, 3° may be used as latae sententiae penalties (§2). For example, one could be prohibited from exercising a certain office but not deprived of it, e.g., diocesan finance officer (c. 494). Furthermore, such prohibitions never invalidate acts performed contrary to such restrictions. A concern to protect the ministerial rights of the faithful underlies this provision. Apparently, if the delict were serious enough, ecclesiastical authority should judicially deprive the offender of a certain power, office, function, etc. (§1, 2°).

Territorial Restrictions[90]

Canon 1337 — §1. A prohibition against residing in a certain place or territory can affect both clerics and religious; however, the order to reside in a certain place or territory can affect secular clerics and, within the limits of the constitutions, religious.

§2. To impose an order to reside in a certain place or territory requires the consent of the ordinary of that place unless it is a question of a house designated for clerics doing penance or being rehabilitated even from outside the diocese.

The next two canons specify the practical implications of certain penalties in canon 1336. Canon 1337 regarding a prohibited or prescribed residence (c. 1336, §1, 1°) affects only clerics and religious,[91] not lay persons who are not religious. Paragraph one differentiates between a prohibition against living in a certain place, which affects clerics and religious, and a prescription to live in a certain place, which affects secular clerics and religious in accord with their constitutions. This restrictive provision should be viewed in terms of the residence obligation of secular clerics (c. 283) and religious (c. 665). Furthermore, while this measure is similar to possible non-penal restrictions on the accused during the penal process (c. 1722: so-called "administrative leave"),[92] here it is a penalty presupposing the commission of a delict.

If the penalizing authority is not the proper ordinary of the one penalized, the former should consult the latter before imposing such a restriction on residence to ascertain its practical implications for the diocese or religious institute. Furthermore, the local ordinary of the place of confinement normally must consent, presumably because of the potentially disruptive behavior of the penalized cleric or religious. However, such consent is not required if a house is specifically established to rehabilitate clerics (c. 1337, §2).

What explains such possible restrictions on freedom of movement, which may be difficult to enforce in practice? Certain delicts may cause particularly serious damage to a community, e.g., sexual abuse of minors in a parish or school. This may require the offender's having no further contact with such a community both for its protection and his rehabilitation. Furthermore, at times medical reasons may require an offender to reside in a certain place for a specified time, e.g., a recognized treatment center for sex offenders or substance abusers.

Such restrictions of personal mobility are justified only for very serious reasons, e.g., reparation of scandal and reform of the offender. This is especially true if they are imposed for a long time. Furthermore, a cleric can be prevented from living in his diocese of incardination only as long as the continuance of the penalty is clearly warranted.[93]

[90] Cf. CCEO 1429.

[91] Strictly speaking (c. 18), this provision affects only members of religious institutes, not members of secular institutes or societies of apostolic life.

[92] For a somewhat comparable non-penal administrative disciplinary measure, see c. 679.

[93] For various reasons a formerly penalized diocesan cleric may not be able to be assigned even if he is dedicated to ministry. However, he is at least entitled to decent support (c. 281) and is to be enabled to fulfill his obligation to reside in his diocese of incardination (c. 283). See J. Provost, "Effects of Incardination," in Clergy Procedural

Limitations on Prohibitions[94]

Canon 1338 — §1. The privations and prohibitions listed in can. 1336, §1, nn. 2 and 3, never affect powers, offices, functions, rights, privileges, faculties, favors, titles, or insignia which are not subject to the power of the superior who establishes the penalty.

§2. Privation of the power of orders is not possible but only a prohibition against exercising it or some of its acts; likewise, privation of academic degrees is not possible.

§3. The norm given in can. 1335 for censures must be observed for the prohibitions listed in can. 1336, §1, n. 3.

The code limits the force of certain penalties. Only those powers of governance and offices subject to the authority of the penalizing superior are affected by the penalty (§1; c. 1333, §3, 1°).

Once the power of orders has been conferred, it cannot be taken away; only its exercise may be limited. For example, a priest may be forbidden to celebrate the Eucharist licitly in a particular parish. There is also a certain irrevocability about the granting of an academic degree. Nevertheless, the exercise of an office presupposing such a degree may be restricted. Furthermore, attempting to deprive a penalized person of such a degree would raise civil law problems (§2).

Finally paragraph three embodies a certain penal hierarchy of values. In principle the penalty should normally be observed. However, certain pressing pastoral considerations may suggest otherwise, e.g., primarily the spiritual welfare of the faithful (c. 1752) but secondarily the penalized cleric's reputation (c. 220). Accordingly, the code suspends the expiatory sacramental and governmental prohibitions on him in various situations of pastoral need. This is especially true if a latae sententiae expiatory penalty has not been declared (cf. c. 1335). However, the penalty still must be remitted subsequently.

CHAPTER III
PENAL REMEDIES AND PENANCES[95]
[cc. 1339–1340]

We can briefly consider these quasi-penal measures designed to protect the community against illegal behavior. They may preclude possible delicts[96] (penal remedies), replace a penalty in a case of diminished imputability,[97] or increase a penalty[98] in a case of aggravated imputability (penances) (c. 1312, §3). Furthermore, an additional corrective measure may occasionally be required even after a penalty has been remitted.[99]

Penal Remedies

Canon 1339 — §1. An ordinary, personally or through another, can warn a person who is in the proximate occasion of committing a delict or upon whom, after investigation, grave suspicion of having committed a delict has fallen.

§2. He can also rebuke a person whose behavior causes scandal or a grave disturbance of order, in a manner accommodated to the special conditions of the person and the deed.

Handbook, ed. R. Calvo and N. Klinger (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1992) 38–49.

[94] Cf. CCEO 1430.

[95] For a helpful discussion of these canonical institutes, see Borras, 95–100; Sanchis, in Com Ex, 384–388.

[96] See c. 1328 on an attempted delict and c. 1348 regarding an accused person who has been acquitted of an accusation or upon whom no penalty has been imposed. The protection of the public good may still warrant such penal remedies.

[97] See cc. 1324, §1 on diminished imputability, 1328 on an attempted delict, 1343 on facultative penalties, and 1344, §2 on preceptive penalties. In such instances a penance rather than a penalty may be warranted.

[98] See c. 1326, §2 on situations of aggravated imputability involving latae sententiae penalties.

[99] For instance, c. 1357, §2 requires the confessor remitting a non-declared latae sententiae excommunication or interdict to impose a penance. Canon 1358 enables the authority figure remitting any censure to impose such a penance.

§3. The warning or rebuke must always be established at least by some document which is to be kept in the secret archive of the curia.

The revised code speaks only of warnings and rebukes as penal remedies. This formal canonical warning may be appropriate if one is in the proximate occasion of committing a delict or if a preliminary investigation (c. 1717) raises grave suspicion about its already being committed (§1). Such an investigation seems necessary to protect the reputation of the one warned and preclude frivolous penal processes. For example, legitimate questions may be raised about whether certain relationships of a cleric may jeopardize his observance of continence (c. 277).

The somewhat more severe measure called a rebuke[100] may be required if an individual causes scandal or gravely disturbs church order (§2). This is true although a penal process may be impossible due to significant imputability-mitigating circumstances or evidentiary problems in proving a delict. While no explicit reference is made to an investigation as in the prior paragraph, this seems presupposed for the same reasons. Such a rebuke is to be tailored to the specifics of a given situation, e.g., the individual's ecclesial status and the ecclesial damage.

The need to prove that such legal-pastoral steps have been taken explains the requirement that they be recorded in writing (§3). Such warnings or rebukes must follow the normal rules on administrative decrees, e.g., canons 35–58. Such a record is to be retained in the secret curial archive (c. 489, §1).[101] Later such information may be needed in a penal process, e.g., to prove aggravated imputability (c. 1719).

The imposition of such measures is a rather delicate issue. Hence the alleged delict is to be carefully investigated, and the rights of the alleged offender are to be duly protected, especially the right to reputation (cc. 220; 1717, §2). This is true even given the equally legitimate right of the community to protect itself against serious violations of its integrity and mission and damage to its most vulnerable members, such as minors.

[100] Cf. CCEO 1427.
[101] Ibid.

Penances

Canon 1340 — §1. A penance, which can be imposed in the external forum, is the performance of some work of religion, piety, or charity.

§2. A public penance is never to be imposed for an occult transgression.

§3. According to his own prudent judgment, an ordinary can add penances to the penal remedy of warning or rebuke.

This canon speaks generically of a work of religion, piety, or charity without listing such works (CIC 2313) or indicating their purpose (§1). Such external forum penances may help to preclude the need for a penalty or complete the steps necessary for its remission. There should be a proportion between the penance and the transgression; therefore, no public penance may be imposed for an occult transgression out of respect for the reputation of the offender (§2).[102] Where appropriate, penances, such as prayers, fasting, almsgiving, a retreat, or community service,[103] may be added to the above-mentioned penal remedies (§3). These provisions are administrative acts, hence they follow the normal rules on such acts. They should enable church authorities to deal sensitively with problematic disciplinary situations and thereby preclude penal processes except as a last resort.

[102] While the present code does not define the terms "public" or "occult," see CIC 2196. A public delict was commonly known or committed in such circumstances that it would likely become known. Otherwise it was occult.

[103] Unlike the Latin code, the Eastern code views penalties more as a positive imposition of a good work than as the privation of some good, while providing for the latter. Hence the Eastern code envisions as possible penalties certain prayers, a pious pilgrimage, a special fast, alms, or spiritual retreats (CCEO 1426, §1).

Title V
The Application of Penalties[104]
[cc. 1341–1353]

This significant title expresses some fundamental principles regarding a judicious pastoral approach in imposing ferendae sententiae penalties.[105] The judge or ordinary may not simply determine that a law has been broken before penalizing someone; rather, he must weigh carefully the relevant factors that put the violation in perspective, e.g., the factors affecting imputability (cc. 1322–1327). This is because only a seriously imputable violation of a law to which a sanction is attached is penalizable as a delict (c. 1321, §1–§2).

At times an examination of such factors may indicate that a delict has not been committed, and hence a penalty may not be imposed. At other times a delict may have been committed, but mitigating circumstances suggest that no penalty be imposed, that it be deferred, or that a penal remedy (c. 1339) or a lesser penalty than that specified in law be imposed. However, at certain times the damage done to the Church's integrity and mission may require a heavier penalty than that specified in law. In short, both judges and ordinaries have ample discretion in realizing the Church's penal goals and delineating the boundaries of tolerable behavior and possible transgressions.

Most canons in this title govern the conducting of the penal process,[106] especially the judicial or administrative discretion to be exercised at the end of the process. However, the last canon (c. 1353) governs the appeal of a penal sentence or recourse against a penal decree. Furthermore, several canons deal with the post-process observance of the penalty by the offender (cc. 1350–1352).

Penalties as a Last Resort

Canon 1341 — An ordinary is to take care to initiate a judicial or administrative process to impose or declare penalties only after he has ascertained that fraternal correction or rebuke or other means of pastoral solicitude cannot sufficiently repair the scandal, restore justice, reform the offender.

This very significant canon should be read together with the next one to understand the appropriate procedure to be used in imposing ferendae sententiae penalties or declaring latae sententiae penalties. The present canon reflects a principal pastoral concern underlying penal law interpretation. Penalties are never ends in themselves but should be employed only as a last resort after all other pastoral measures have failed to deal with a problematic situation. Church authorities should normally not impose penalties too quickly but rather use all available non-penal legal-pastoral options before imposing penalties. Among such options are penal remedies (c. 1339) and penances (c. 1340), traditional moral measures such as retreats or fraternal correction, or possibly treatment at a specialized rehabilitation center. While procedural considerations are important in such matters, a concern for the spiritual good of all persons, alleged victims and offenders, should be a key pastoral priority (c. 1752).

Canon 1341 is the only provision in Book VI expressing the key purposes of penal discipline: the repairing of scandal, the restoring of justice, and the reform of the offender.[107] The first two interrelated purposes, which emphasize the protection of certain institutional values, especially characterize expiatory penalties while the last one on the offender's conversion especially characterizes censures. However, unduly sharp distinctions between such purposes and penalties should be avoided.

[104] Besides the Münster commentary, see Borras, 101–124; V. De Paolis, in Com Ex, 389–429; Green, in CLSA Com, 911–915; Martin, in CLSGBI Com, 770–777; Rees, 398–407.

[105] Some of these principles are also relevant in declaring latae sententiae penalties.

[106] This title constantly needs to be interpreted in relationship to cc. 1717–1731 on the penal process.

[107] Within the context of consecrated life see c. 695, §1 on the mandatory dismissal of a religious. See also CCEO 1401 and CIC 2214, §2.

Another noteworthy point in canons 1341–1342 is the emphasis on the discretion of the ordinary or superior (usually the diocesan bishop). He may determine not only whether there will be a penal procedure, usually after a preliminary investigation (c. 1717), but also whether to follow a judicial or administrative procedure (c. 1718). This latter type of discretion is qualified, however, by the code's preference for judicial procedure to protect better the right of defense (cc. 1342, §1; 221, §3).

If the ordinary decides on a penal process, his administrative decree (c. 1718) should indicate at least briefly what non-penal measures were employed and why they failed to achieve the aforementioned penal purposes, or it should note why non-penal measures were judged insufficient and not used.

Penal Procedure To Be Used[108]

Canon 1342 — §1. Whenever just causes preclude a judicial process, a penalty can be imposed or declared by extrajudicial decree; penal remedies and penances, however, can be applied by decree in any case whatsoever.

§2. Perpetual penalties cannot be imposed or declared by decree, nor can penalties be so applied when the law or precept establishing them prohibits their application by decree.

§3. What a law or precept states about the imposition or declaration of a penalty by a judge in a trial must be applied to a superior who imposes or declares a penalty by extrajudicial decree unless it is otherwise evident or unless it concerns prescripts which pertain only to procedural matters.

A basic canonical question confronting an ordinary who has decided that a penal process is appropriate is whether to follow a judicial or administrative process (c. 1718). The present canon answers that question.

There is ample room for the ordinary's discretion. Yet the legislator implicitly prefers judicial procedure since just (iustae) causes are necessary to use administrative procedure.[109]

The canon does not indicate the reasons for not using judicial procedure, which unfortunately do not have to be especially compelling.[110] For example, at times the tribunal staff may be unduly burdened with marriage cases and hence ill-equipped to conduct a formal penal procedure. It might be necessary to proceed expeditiously in certain scandalous situations, e.g., serious financial malfeasance by a church administrator. Yet, such a situation might precisely require a somewhat more formal process if an overemphasis on expediting the case might undercut the proper vindication of the substantive and procedural rights of all concerned.

According to canon 1341 the ordinary decides whether such reasons for an administrative procedure exist even if that is not explicitly stated here (see c. 1718, §1, 3°). In such a serious matter, consultation at least with the judicial vicar, other legal experts, or some other significant diocesan official is appropriate even if not strictly required (c. 1718, §3).

Penal remedies (c. 1339) or penances (c. 1340) may always be applied by decree, or administratively. Since they do not have especially weighty consequences, judicial formalities are not required (c. 1342, §1).

On the contrary, certain serious penalties such as those of a perpetual, or irrevocable, character (e.g., privation of office—c. 1336, §1, 2°) can be imposed only through formal judicial procedure. There is a proportion between the seriousness of the penalty and the seriousness of the procedure imposing it. When the consequences of a penalty are so weighty, the accused should enjoy maximal

[108] Cf. CCEO 1402.

[109] Wisely, the Eastern code more strongly emphasizes the need for judicial penal procedure while admitting administrative procedure for weighty (graves) reasons if proofs of the delict are certain. Besides the perpetual penalties mentioned in canon 1342, §2, that code also requires judicial penal procedure to impose a major excommunication and a suspension for more than one year (CCEO 1402, §1–§2).

[110] For the discussion of this issue by the penal law committee, see Comm 9 (1977) 161–162.

legal protection, e.g., services of an advocate, access to all relevant documentation for self-defense purposes, possible appeal of an adverse decision to a higher court. Furthermore, the law establishing a penalty, universal or particular, may require its being imposed judicially (c. 1342, §2).

Paragraph three indicates the equivalence of a judge (judicial procedure) and a superior or ordinary (administrative procedure)[111] relative to the subsequent canons on applying penalties. Such equivalence is particularly relevant to the broad discretion enjoyed by the one presiding over the penal procedure. When the canons refer to the judge, they also apply to the ordinary unless judicial procedure is clearly envisioned, e.g., the detailed provisions on examining witnesses (cc. 1558–1571).

Facultative Penalties

Canon 1343 — If the law or precept gives the judge the power to apply or not apply a penalty, the judge can also temper the penalty or impose a penance in its place, according to his own conscience and prudence.

Numerous canons in this title stress the prudent discretion of the judge in applying ferendae sententiae penalties. Such discretion is to be exercised after it is judged that a delict has been committed, even given certain mitigating circumstances. The penal authority must then decide how to deal with the guilty party. Presumably such discretion is an appropriate way of realizing the law's pastoral purposes and dealing sensitively with the specifics of each case.[112] While fostering the offender's conversion, the judge must also consider legitimate community concerns, especially those persons whose rights have been violated by the delict.

Canon 1343 states that if a ferendae sententiae penalty is facultative, or discretionary[113] (e.g., c. 1391), the judge may either not impose a penalty at all, lighten the specified penalty, or substitute a penance (c. 1340).[114] Generally speaking, when a canon mentions only such a facultative penalty, the delict is viewed as less significant than other delicts. However, at times when a preceptive penalty is specified for a given delict, the code also mentions possible additional facultative penalties, even dismissal from the clerical state (e.g., c. 1395, §2). This happens when delicts are particularly serious or clerics continue to scandalize the community.

Preceptive Penalties[115]

Canon 1344 — Even if the law uses preceptive words, the judge can, according to his own conscience and prudence:

1° defer the imposition of the penalty to a more opportune time if it is foreseen that greater evils will result from an overly hasty punishment of the offender;

2° abstain from imposing a penalty, impose a lighter penalty, or employ a penance if the offender has reformed and repaired the scandal or if the offender has been or, it is foreseen, will be punished sufficiently by civil authority;

3° suspend the obligation of observing an expiatory penalty if it is the first offense

[111] Despite this canon's use of the term "superior," the canons and this commentary normally refer to the "ordinary" (c. 134) to describe the significant administrative figure before, during, and after the penal procedure. Subsequent procedural references to the "judge" alone also generally envision the "ordinary."

[112] Such authoritative discretion is not operative in marriage nullity cases in which the judge must decide solely whether the nullity of the marriage has been proven or not.

[113] See the list of such penalties in CLSA Com, 940.

[114] In this instance and in the circumstances addressed in the next two canons, the accused can still appeal or take recourse against the judge's action (cc. 1727, §1; 1353). Although the judge may treat the accused rather benignly, a declaration of innocence (c. 1726) by the higher authority would more effectively vindicate such a party's reputation.

[115] Cf. CCEO 1409, §1, 1°–2° and 4°.

of an offender who has lived a praiseworthy life and if the need to repair scandal is not pressing, but in such a way that if the offender commits an offense again within the time determined by the judge, the person is to pay the penalty due for each delict unless in the interim the time for the prescription of a penal action has elapsed for the first delict.

Normally, rather serious delicts, such as teaching a condemned doctrine, call for a preceptive, or obligatory, ferendae sententiae penalty (c. 1371, 1°).[116] In those instances the judge must generally impose some penalty if a delict has been committed although the present canon permits responsible penal discretion even there.

For example, the imposition of the penalty may be deferred if prompt penal action would cause more pastoral problems than prudently delaying such. For example, the faithful in a parish might be notably "scandalized" as well as deprived of access to sacramental ministry if their pastor were penalized and there were a shortage of clergy (1°). However, the penalty is only temporarily waived, not technically remitted.

Another option is somewhat comparable to the preceding canon. Perhaps occasionally no penalty need be imposed; possibly the prescribed penalty may be tempered (e.g., a suspension from preaching in a given church instead of a total suspension from preaching); or perhaps a penance (c. 1340) may be imposed (2°). Here the judge must weigh carefully the twin values of reforming the offender and repairing scandal to the community. This option seems to presuppose that the offender has reformed and the scandal caused by the delict has been repaired after the penal process has been initiated.

The possible civil law implications of an ecclesiastical delict must also be considered at times.[117] The offender may have been punished civilly to repair the societal damage caused by the delict. If so, an ecclesiastical penalty may be inappropriate even given the different penal objectives of Church and State. The legislator attempts to prevent the penal system from being overly punitive and overwhelming the offender rather than fostering ecclesial reconciliation; yet legitimate community concerns also must be addressed (2°; cf. also c. 1346).

Finally, canon 1344 deals with the effects of expiatory penalties (c. 1336) on first offenders who have otherwise led a praiseworthy life (3°). The judge may suspend the obligation of observing such a penalty provided no serious scandal still needs to be repaired.[118] An equitable concern for the offender's spiritual well-being presumably outweighs the institutional interest in repairing societal damage, normally the primary focus of such penalties.

However, this arrangement is provisional since the offender may be penalized if another delict is committed during a probationary period specified by the judge. In fact the offender may be penalized for both delicts unless the statute of limitations (prescription) has run out for enforcing the punishment of the first delict (c. 1363). After the probationary period has elapsed without a new delict and the aforementioned penal action has been prescribed, the expiatory penalty whose observance has been suspended definitively ceases.

This canon embodies the pastoral purposes of the Church's penal order. Penalties, even preceptive in character, are not simply to be applied mechanically. Rather equity demands that church authority consider their rationale and use them if necessary to foster the good of both the community and the individual offender (principle of penal proportionality).

[116] For a listing of such preceptive penalties, see CLSA Com, 938–939. While the current title focuses on ferendae sententiae penalties, the most serious delicts are actually punished by latae sententiae penalties listed in CLSA Com, 937.

[117] For ecclesiastical delicts with possible civil law ramifications, see cc. 1370; 1395; 1397; 1398.

[118] On suspending the observance of censures and expiatory penalties in critical pastoral situations, see cc. 1335, 1338, §3 and 1352.

Waiving of Penalty

Canon 1345 — Whenever the offender had only the imperfect use of reason or committed the delict from fear, necessity, the heat of passion, or mental disturbance from drunkenness or something similar, the judge can also abstain from imposing any penalty if he thinks that reform of the person can be better accomplished in another way.

This somewhat open-ended and pastorally inspired canon envisions judicial or administrative discretion in dealing with offenders whose imputability is notably diminished. Without mentioning canon 1324, the present canon notes certain factors in that canon mitigating penal imputability.[119] However, the present canon views the issue from the judge's standpoint rather than from that of the offender. Furthermore, the present canon goes beyond that earlier formulation, which required tempering a penalty or imposing a penance in such circumstances. Here the judge may abstain from imposing any penalty if the offender can be rehabilitated better otherwise. At times fraternal correction, rebuke, or other means of pastoral care might reflect the Church's reconciling nature better than properly punitive measures. This canon, unlike the preceding one, focuses explicitly only on the reform-of-the-offender dimension of the penal system.

Multiple Delicts[120]

Canon 1346 — Whenever the offender has committed several delicts, it is left to the prudent decision of the judge to moderate the penalties within equitable limits if the sum of the ferendae sententiae penalties appears excessive.

Technically if several delicts have been committed, several penalties may be warranted, especially if such penalties are different, e.g., suspension and certain expiatory penalties. For example, a soliciting confessor (c. 1387) may also engage in prohibited sexual activity (c. 1395). Both the offender's spiritual welfare and the good of the community may justify such a cumulation of penalties. However, even here the penal authority may exercise a certain discretion.

It may be pastorally counterproductive to burden the penalized individual, however guilty, with various ferendae sententiae penalties although they may be canonically justified. In other words, a benign interpretation of penal law (CCEO 1404, §1) might militate against "penal overkill" and suggest an equitable imposition of penalties reflecting a responsible pastoral approach to this issue. However, a concern for the integrity of the community suggests caution in exercising such discretion. No such discretion, however, is operative for latae sententiae penalties, which bind the imputable offender upon commission of the delict.

Conditions for a Censure[121]

Canon 1347 — §1. A censure cannot be imposed validly unless the offender has been warned at least once beforehand to withdraw from contumacy and has been given a suitable time for repentance.

§2. An offender who has truly repented of the delict and has also made suitable reparation for damages and scandal or at least has seriously promised to do so must be considered to have withdrawn from contumacy.

This canon on imposing censures should be read in conjunction with canons 1331–1335 on specific censures. It illustrates a key feature of such penalties: the offender is to be formally warned to withdraw from contumacy, or contempt [119] The present canon explicitly mentions only certain factors in c. 1324, §1 mitigating imputability, i.e., an imperfect use of reason (1°), fear or necessity (5°), passion (3°), or drunkenness or another similar mental disturbance (2°).

[120] Cf. CCEO 1409, §1, 3°.

[121] While the Eastern code technically does not differentiate between censures and expiatory penalties, see CCEO 1407, §1–§2.

of church authority, within a certain period of time (§1).[122] The mere fact that a law has been broken does not necessarily mean that the offender is contumacious. Only if this is true can such a penalty be validly inflicted since its primary rationale is breaking such contumacy and reintegrating the offender within the community.[123] In contrast, no such warning normally must be given to impose expiatory penalties.[124]

The criteria for determining when such contumacy has ceased are genuine repentance for the delict and an effort, or at least a serious promise, to repair the damage or scandal it causes, e.g., making a public retraction for damaging another's reputation (c. 1390, §2). The focus is not simply on the offender's personal conversion of heart; rather any societal damage is to be remedied as much as possible.

The pre-process determination whether contumacy has ceased is made by the ordinary competent to initiate the penal process (cc. 1341; 1718). The judge conducting the penal process also must consider this factor before imposing or declaring the censure. Subsequently such a determination rests with the authority competent to remit the penalty (cc. 1354–1358).

Quasi-Penal Options

Canon 1348 — When an accused is acquitted of an accusation or when no penalty is imposed, the ordinary can provide for the welfare of the person and for the public good through appropriate warnings and other means of pastoral solicitude or even through penal remedies if the matter warrants it.

The issue of administrative discretion surfaces again here. This canon focuses not on the one conducting the penal process but on the ordinary alone exercising his oversight role relative to the welfare of the community.

The penal process may end with the judgment that the charges against the accused are unfounded, hence he or she is declared innocent (c. 1726). In such instances this canon is inapplicable. At other times, however, the accused may be acquitted because the alleged delict could not be proven, e.g., lack of criminal intent or the presence of significant imputability-mitigating factors (c. 1324). Furthermore, occasionally the accused may be guilty; however, no penalty is imposed because penal discretion is exercised (cc. 1343–1346). Perhaps the offender has reformed and the societal damage has been repaired, or the goals of the penal system can be better achieved in a non-penal fashion.

In such circumstances institutional or personal pastoral considerations may still require the ordinary's warning the individual, imposing a penal remedy (c. 1339), or providing some other pastoral measure such as appropriate counseling. Why is this so? The fact that no penalty is imposed does not necessarily mean that all is in order ecclesially or personally. The public order may have been seriously disturbed by the accused even if there has technically been no delict. Furthermore, the accused person who has not been totally exonerated may benefit spiritually from such pastoral measures.

However, this somewhat extraordinary administrative measure presupposes hearing the person in question whose rights may be jeopardized (c. 50). Furthermore, administrative recourse to higher authority is available under the usual conditions (cc. 1732–1739).

Judicious Application of Penalties[125]

Canon 1349 — If a penalty is indeterminate and the law does not provide otherwise, the judge is not to impose graver penalties, especially censures, [122] Such a formal warning, normally by the ordinary or his delegate, applies only to ferendae sententiae censures. In latae sententiae censures the warning is presumably contained in the law threatening the penalty.

[123] This warning is similar to, yet technically different from, the penal remedy mentioned in c. 1339, §1. The warning to cease contumacy is likewise to be confirmed by a document to be kept in the secret archive (c. 1339, §3).

[124] By way of exception, a warning may sometimes be required for an expiatory penalty, e.g., c. 1395, §1.

[125] Cf. CCEO 1409, §2.

unless the seriousness of the case clearly demands it; he cannot, however, impose perpetual penalties.

This title constantly stresses judicial or administrative discretion in dealing with individual penal situations. However, this canon introduces a prudent restriction on such discretion. It is comparable to the principle of legislative penal restraint affirmed in canons 1317–1318.

At times the law (not a precept) specifies a possible penalty in indeterminate terms, e.g., a "just penalty." Then the judge is normally to refrain from imposing particularly serious penalties such as censures, probably because they frequently preclude access to the sacraments. Generally the legislator does not view a legal violation quite as seriously as other delicts if the corresponding penalty is formulated in indeterminate terms.[126]

At times, however, a censure may be appropriate even in such indeterminate penalty circumstances, e.g., c. 1388, §2. Furthermore, the seriousness of the delict may require heavier penalties; for example, imputability-aggravating circumstances may be operative in situations of persistent disobedience to one's ecclesiastical superiors (cc. 1326; 1371, 2°).

With due regard for such provisions, however, perpetual penalties, such as privation of office or dismissal from the clerical state, may never be imposed in an indeterminate penalty situation. Given their irrevocable implications, the code must specify them explicitly as an appropriate punishment of very serious delicts.

Support of Penalized Cleric[127]

Canon 1350 — §1. Unless it concerns dismissal from the clerical state, when penalties are imposed on a cleric, provision must always be made so that he does not lack those things necessary for his decent support.

§2. In the best manner possible, however, the ordinary is to take care to provide for a person dismissed from the clerical state who is truly in need because of the penalty.

There is an institutional responsibility to support the penalized yet non-dismissed cleric (§1). While the original schema referred only to clerics subject to expiatory penalties and not to those under censure, the code makes no such distinction. Although the cleric has seriously violated the law, his basic right to appropriate support is to be honored by the institution (c. 281).[128]

Obviously the ecclesial status of the penalized cleric differs from that of his peers in good standing who discharge their ministerial obligations and deserve an appropriate remuneration. However, the ordinary must respect the penalized cleric's right to support, whose specific implications must be assessed in light of the penalty to which he is subject.[129] Diocesan or possibly provincial personnel norms might appropriately address this issue and its implications for lay persons in full-time church service (c. 231, §2).

Only dismissal from the clerical state technically extinguishes such a right in strict justice (c. 292). However, even the dismissed cleric is not totally beyond his ordinary's pastoral care and charity. While charity is the motivating factor here, the ordinary is juridically obliged (providere curet) to provide as best he can for the dismissed cleric who is truly needy because of the penalty (§2). Even after being dismissed, the cleric maintains a certain relationship to the institution in which he has been incardinated (c. 266). The code [126] Because of their vague formulation, one may wonder how effectively such penalties foster the goals of the penal system. Such penalties seem to be conducive to an arbitrary exercise of authority, yet they do permit the penal authority to take cognizance of differing degrees of imputability. De facto numerous penalties are indeterminate in character. See CLSA Com, 935–936.

[127] Cf. CCEO 1410.

[128] See c. 384 on the bishop's obligation to be solicitous for his priests, including providing for their decent support and social assistance. See also c. 195.

[129] For examples of clerical penalties with possible financial implications, see cc. 1331, §2, 5°; 1333, §4; and 1336, §1, 2°. Such ecclesiastical penalties, however, must take cognizance of legitimate civil law claims of such individuals, e.g., regarding pensions.

here also seems to recognize his service to the aforementioned institution.[130]

Territorial Scope of Penalty[131]

Canon 1351 — Unless other provision is expressly made, a penalty binds the offender everywhere, even when the authority of the one who established or imposed the penalty has lapsed.

This canon notes the universally binding force of a penalty even if the ecclesiastical authority establishing (legislator) or imposing it (judge or ordinary) no longer holds office (cc. 184–196). A concern to ensure the proper enforcement of the law and protect the public good underlies this provision. The penalty is related primarily to non-territorial factors, i.e., the ecclesial damage and/or problematic dispositions of the offender. Hence, his or her mobility should not affect the impact of the penalty.

Although this broad territorial scope of the penalty is the general rule, the penal law might provide otherwise. For example, the penalty might cease at the death of the ordinary who imposed it. Or a cleric might be prohibited from functioning only in a certain place where his continued ministry might be pastorally detrimental (c. 1336, §1, 2°). Furthermore, certain expiatory penalties specifically affect one's residence, e.g., canon 1336, §1, 1° on prohibited or prescribed residence. Finally, at times the observance of various penalties is temporarily suspended (cc. 1335; 1338, §3; 1344, 3°; 1352).

Observance of Penalty Suspended

Canon 1352 — §1. If a penalty prohibits the reception of the sacraments or sacramentals, the prohibition is suspended as long as the offender is in danger of death.

§2. The obligation to observe an undeclared latae sententiae penalty which is not notorious in the place where the offender is present, is suspended totally or partially whenever the offender cannot observe it without danger of grave scandal or infamy.

The code here also deals with the practical impact of a penalty on the guilty party. It addresses two particularly urgent situations in which observing a penalty might be pastorally harmful, i.e., danger of death or danger of infamy or scandal.[132] Once this pastoral contingency has passed, the penalty must be observed.

Under certain conditions the personal spiritual needs of the individual offender prevail over considerations of good ecclesial order. Certain penalties such as excommunication (c. 1331, §1, 2°) and interdict (c. 1332) normally forbid the reception of the sacraments. However, this prohibition is suspended in danger of death (§1).[133] The present canon should be read in connection with canon 976, another emergency provision empowering any priest[134] to absolve the faithful in danger of death from any sins or censures. However, unless the censure were unreserved and undeclared, the recovering offender must make recourse to a competent penal authority (c. 1357, §3).

The code also addresses significant problems arising in a less critical pastoral situation than danger of death (§2). If certain penalties were observed, the individual offender might suffer personal infamy or serious loss of reputation (c. 220), or the community might be gravely scandalized. Either condition suffices to justify suspending the observance of the penalty.

[130] See c. 702, §2 for an analogous provision regarding those who legitimately leave or are dismissed from a religious institute. See also CCEO 1410 explicitating the cleric's vested right to insurance and social security as well as health insurance for himself and his family if he is married.

[131] Cf. CCEO 1412, §4.

[132] See also cc. 1335 and 1338, §3 enabling penalized church ministers to serve the faithful in various pastoral contingencies.

[133] Cf. CCEO 1435, §1.

[134] Even priests without confessional faculties or subject to an ecclesiastical penalty or laicized may absolve the penitent in such circumstances.

For example, a priest might commit an occult[135] delict, or one known only to a few persons, e.g., absolution of an accomplice (cc. 977; 1378, §1). Observing the excommunication would prevent his performing certain spiritual functions for a particular community, such as a parish. Although this canon was originally formulated fairly broadly, the present text limits such non-observance of penalties to undeclared latae sententiae penalties even if reserved. This is another example of the legislator's mitigating their impact. However, if a latae sententiae penalty has been declared or a ferendae sententiae penalty imposed, the competent penal authority would presumably consider the offender's existential situation. This would preclude the need for recourse to this extraordinary measure of non-observance (not remission) of the penalty.

Suspensive Effect of Appeal or Recourse against Penalty[136]

Canon 1353 — An appeal or recourse from judicial sentences or from decrees, which impose or declare a penalty, has a suspensive effect.

In the 1917 code, unlike the rules on vindictive (now expiatory) penalties (CIC 2287), appeals against sentences imposing censures or recourses against decrees imposing them were without suspensive effect. Hence, the declared or imposed censure had to be observed immediately although an appeal or recourse was pending (CIC 2243).

Now, however, such a suspensive effect is operative for both censures and expiatory penalties. This change reflects a benign interpretation of penal law (CCEO 1404, 1). It embodies the legislator's concern to foster the pastoral purposes of penal law and respect the dignity and basic rights of the offender, e.g., reputation (c. 220).

Another such right is challenging an adverse penal sentence (cc. 1628–1640; 1727, §1) or decree (cc. 1732–1739). The defendant's exercise of basic Christian rights should normally not be restricted until the original sentence is confirmed by the ordinary appellate court or by the Rota, a concurrent appellate court (c. 1444, §1, 1°). Likewise the defendant's ecclesial status should normally not be jeopardized until the original administrative decree is confirmed by the penal authority's hierarchic superior, usually a Roman congregation, e.g., the Congregation for the Clergy in most cases involving clerics.

In short, the pre-penalty status quo is maintained during the appeal or recourse. However, certain non-penal disciplinary measures possibly taken against the defendant during the process remain in effect if still warranted, e.g., prohibition from exercising a certain office such as the pastorate (c. 1722). This restriction, however, is not technically a privation of office (c. 1336, §1, 2°), which is an expiatory penalty requiring a judicial process.

TITLE VI
THE CESSATION OF PENALTIES[137]
[cc. 1354–1363]

Thus far the code has discussed the meaning of delicts and penalties (titles I–IV) and the practical [135] Such a suspension of the observance of an undeclared latae sententiae penalty is operative only if the penalty is not "notorious" in the place where the offender is actually present. Unfortunately the 1983 code does not define the term "notorious." The 1917 code spoke not of penalties but of certain delicts as being "notorious in fact" if they had been committed in circumstances in which there were no mitigating factors (CIC 2197, 3°). In short, a notorious penalty likely means a situation of reasonably broad public awareness of the gravity of a delict despite no formal penal process. See also the commentary on c. 1335 regarding "married priests."

[136] See CCEO 1319 regarding a judicial appeal and CCEO 1487, §2 regarding administrative recourse in penal processes.

[137] Besides the Münster commentary, see Borras, 124–150; idem, in Com Ex, 430–460; Green, in CLSA Com, 915–919; Martin, in CLSGBI Com, 777–784; Rees, 407–414.

application of the latter (title V). This final title of part one of Book VI indicates the various ways in which penalties cease once they have been incurred (latae sententiae) or imposed (ferendae sententiae).

The generic term "cessation" in the title encompasses the different ways in which an offender is released from a penalty, e.g., death, expiation of expiatory penalty, remission of penalty. However, de facto this chapter exclusively considers the "remission" of penalties by a church authority figure usually in the external forum (cc. 1355–1356), but sometimes in the internal sacramental forum of confession (c. 1357).

The code normally uses only the generic term "remission" for all types of penalties.[138] However, the remission of censures and expiatory penalties differs somewhat. Censures, which are always indefinite in duration, are to be remitted when the guilty party is properly disposed (c. 1358, §1). This is somewhat comparable to the penitential context: the absolution of the disposed penitent is neither to be refused nor deferred (c. 980). In other words, the discretion of the competent authority is somewhat restricted since such a remission is a matter of justice. Finally, censures may sometimes be remitted in the internal forum.

Expiatory penalties, on the other hand, may be imposed for a certain period of time and cease once it elapses, e.g., loss of salary for three months (expiation of penalty). If they are imposed for an indefinite period, they cease only at the discretion of the competent authority, who technically grants a favor and is not bound to remit the penalty merely because the offender is contrite, for institutional concerns may still preclude such a remission, e.g., long-term damage experienced by victims of notable financial malfeasance. Furthermore, certain perpetual expiatory penalties such as deprivation of office and dismissal from the clerical state are not remitted (c. 1336, §1, 2° and 5°). Finally, there are generally no internal forum remissions of such penalties.

[138] By way of exception certain canons refer to "absolution" of censures as in the 1917 code. See cc. 508, §1; 566, §2; and 976.

Power of Remitting Penalties[139]

Canon 1354 — §1. In addition to the persons listed in cann. 1355–1356, all who can dispense from a law which includes a penalty or who can exempt from a precept which threatens a penalty can also remit that penalty.

§2. Moreover, a law or precept which establishes a penalty can also give the power of remission to others.

§3. If the Apostolic See has reserved the remission of a penalty to itself or to others, the reservation must be interpreted strictly.

Title II on the penal law/precept deals largely with the exercise of legislative power (penal law: cc. 1313–1318) and relatively minimally with executive power (penal precept: c. 1319). The previous title V on applying penalties deals with either executive or judicial power (cc. 1341–1353).

However, title VI deals solely with executive power since the remission of a penalty is viewed implicitly as an act of executive power, somewhat like a dispensation from a law (§1; c. 85). The competent authority figure "dispenses" or releases the guilty party from the obligation of observing the penalty for due cause, somewhat comparable to releasing one from the obligation of observing the law. Such executive authority figures are spelled out more precisely in the subsequent canons 1355–1356.[140] The present canon should probably also have explicitly referred to canon 1357 enabling confessors to remit certain censures under specific conditions; however, the external forum focus of the code here is quite clear.

A penal law or precept may permit broader remission options than those specified in paragraph one (§2). However, a broad delegation of such power has not been common in the past given the seriousness of penal discipline. In such instances the general rules on delegated power are operative, e.g., canon 137.[141] The penal authority of those who are simply judges, e.g., judicial vicar, and not ordinaries (c. 134) is rather limited. Those possessing only judicial authority may only apply an established penal law in a given case. This is an example of a generally strict judicial-executive power differentiation for authority figures other than the pope and the diocesan bishop.

[139] Cf. CCEO 1419.

[140] While it is not stated explicitly here, obviously those competent to establish penal laws may also dispense from them and remit penalties flowing from their violation.

A noteworthy change from the prior code is the significant reduction of the number of penalties whose remission was reserved to the Holy See.[142] Lower level authorities such as ordinaries could not remit them presumably because of the particular seriousness of the delict, the exigencies of ecclesiastical discipline, and the need to foster more effectively the spiritual welfare of offenders (CIC 2246, §1). Such reservations made the former penal discipline overly complex and burdensome, especially for confessors, who were more frequently involved in such remissions than currently.

The Holy See theoretically may reserve the remission of certain penalties to itself[143] or to another authority. However, only five latae sententiae excommunications are actually reserved: canon 1367 (violation of sacred species); canon 1370, §l (physical attack on pope); canon 1378, §l (absolution of accomplice); canon 1382 (unauthorized episcopal consecration); and canon 1388, §l (direct violation of confessional seal by confessor). Hence generally any ordinary and exceptionally any confessor may remit penalties under specific conditions.

This simplification of the law enhances the options for remission of penalties for properly disposed offenders. Furthermore, such reservations must be strictly interpreted since they limit the free exercise of remitting power by ordinaries (c. 18).

[141] Occasionally a diocesan bishop will delegate the priests of the diocese the faculty to remit certain penalties, e.g., the excommunication resulting from an abortion (c. 1398).

[142] In the external forum this means the appropriate Roman congregation, depending on the nature of the issue (see PB 48–116); in the internal forum this means the ApPen (see PB 117–120).

[143] Cf. CCEO 1423.

Remitting Penalties Established by Law

Canon 1355 — §1. Provided that the penalty has not been reserved to the Apostolic See, the following can remit an imposed or declared penalty established by law:

1° the ordinary who initiated the trial to impose or declare a penalty or who personally or through another imposed or declared it by decree;

2° the ordinary of the place where the offender is present, after the ordinary mentioned under n. 1 has been consulted unless this is impossible because of extraordinary circumstances.

§2. If the penalty has not been reserved to the Apostolic See, an ordinary can remit a latae sententiae penalty established by law but not yet declared for his subjects and those who are present in his territory or who committed the offense there; any bishop can also do this in the act of sacramental confession.

Canons 1355 and 1356 reflect the enhanced postconciliar legal-pastoral authority of bishops although the code speaks more broadly of "ordinaries" (c. 134). The two canons exemplify the generally external forum focus of penal discipline. Canon 1355 deals with unreserved penalties established by law, while canon 1356 treats of unreserved penalties established by precept. No distinction is made between censures and expiatory penalties; however, the ferendae sententiae–latae sententiae distinction is relevant.

The code provides broad penalty-remitting options, both for the ordinary of the place where the offender is actually present and for the ordinary who initiated the judicial penal process or declared or imposed the penalty administratively (the penalizing ordinary). The options for the former ordinary take special cognizance of increased societal mobility. However, canon 1355 also refers generically to penalties reserved to the Holy See, and here the aforementioned ordinaries may not remit the penalty.

Paragraph one[144] deals with declared latae sententiae and ferendae sententiae penalties. The penalty-remitting options are somewhat more restricted here than in paragraph two on non-declared latae sententiae penalties, probably because of the formal ecclesiastical intervention in the prior instance. Both the penalizing ordinary and the offender's local ordinary may remit such penalties. Yet, barring extraordinary circumstances, the latter is normally to contact the former before remitting the penalty. Presumably the penalizing ordinary can clarify the possibly complex legal-pastoral circumstances surrounding the imposition or declaration of the penalty and any continuing detrimental ecclesial impact of the delict. A pastorally responsible remission of a penalty normally presupposes access to such information; however, the penalizing ordinary does not have to approve the remission of the penalty.

Paragraph two of the canon concerns the undeclared, unreserved latae sententiae penalty. Remitting options are broader here than in paragraph one, presumably since no authority figure has been directly involved in the case, prescinding from the legislator's establishing the penalty. Hence no reference is made to consultation with the penalizing ordinary. The focus is on the local ordinary's power vis-à-vis his subjects, those actually in his territory even if they are not his subjects, and those who committed a delict in his territory (c. 136).

Furthermore, besides the aforementioned external forum option, any bishop, diocesan or titular (c. 376), may remit such undeclared latae sententiae penalties, yet only in sacramental confession and for the internal forum. The rationale for introducing this exceptional internal forum dimension in the otherwise external forum remission process is not entirely clear; however, it parallels the comparable role of confessors (c. 1357). It is another example of the pastoral thrust of penal law and its limiting the impact of latae sententiae penalties.

[144]Cf. CCEO 1420, §1.

Remitting Penalties Established by Precept

Canon 1356 — §1. The following can remit a ferendae sententiae or latae sententiae penalty established by a precept not issued by the Apostolic See:

1° the ordinary of the place where the offender is present;

2° if the penalty has been imposed or declared, the ordinary who initiated the trial to impose or declare the penalty or who personally or through another imposed or declared it by decree.

§2. The author of the precept must be consulted before remission is made unless this is impossible because of extraordinary circumstances.

Contrary to the more generalized situation of a penal law (c. 1355), this canon deals with the more individualized penal precept issued by an executive authority other than the Holy See. The remitting options are more limited than in the preceding canon. No reference is made to internal forum remissions, and the canon does not differentiate between declared and undeclared latae sententiae penalties.

Either the offender's local ordinary or the penalizing ordinary can remit the penalty (§l).[145] However, the need to consider the circumstances surrounding the issuing of the penal precept underlies the requirement that its author be consulted before the penalty is remitted unless this is impossible for some extraordinary reason (§2). Such a burden of consultation makes sense for the offender's local ordinary but not so much for the penalizing ordinary, who should be familiar with the case. In any event, the author of the precept does not have to approve the remission of the penalty.

Power of Confessors[146]

Canon 1357 — §1. Without prejudice to the prescripts of cann. 508 and 976, a confessor can remit in the internal sacramental forum an undeclared latae sententiae censure of excommunication or interdict if it is burdensome for the penitent to remain in the state of grave sin during the time necessary for the competent superior to make provision.

[145]Cf. CCEO 1420, §2.

[146]For a thoughtful discussion of this issue, see Borras, 136–145.

§2. In granting the remission, the confessor is to impose on the penitent, under the penalty of reincidence, the obligation of making recourse within a month to the competent superior or to a priest endowed with the faculty and the obligation of obeying his mandates; in the meantime he is to impose a suitable penance and, insofar as it is demanded, reparation of any scandal and damage; however, recourse can also be made through the confessor, without mention of the name.

§3. After they have recovered, those for whom an imposed or declared censure or one reserved to the Apostolic See has been remitted according to the norm of can. 976 are also obliged to make recourse.

The present canon reflects the 1977 code commission decision generally not to permit excommunicated or interdicted persons to receive penance and anointing before remission of the censure. However, for pressing pastoral reasons limited provisions should be made for the remission of certain censures in the internal sacramental forum.

The confessor may remit undeclared latae sententiae excommunications or interdicts even if they are reserved to the Apostolic See. Accordingly he may not remit undeclared latae sententiae suspensions, ferendae sententiae censures, or expiatory penalties. In practice, however, there may be significant options for confessors since numerous latae sententiae excommunications and interdicts may never be declared, especially those affecting the laity, e.g., the excommunication for a procured abortion (c. 1398).

When is such an option available? It must be hard for a penitent to remain in serious sin until a competent superior remits the penalty (§1). Actually, if a penitent finds it burdensome to remain in mortal sin for only one day, this canon is relevant. The "competent superior" refers to those authorized to remit penalties in canons 1355–1356, another authorized priest, or the appropriate Holy See dicastery.

Canon 1357 also mentions the canon penitentiary, who ex officio may remit in confession any unreserved and undeclared latae sententiae censures (c. 508, §1).[147] This official functions only in dioceses with chapters of canons (cc. 503–510). Yet technically a comparable internal forum official must be appointed even by bishops without such chapters (c. 508, §2). The present canon also alludes to the broad powers of remitting sins and censures enjoyed by any priest in a danger-of-death situation even if he is laicized or otherwise unauthorized to hear confessions (c. 976).

The confessor's special penalty-remitting powers are not unqualified. Hence, he must impose on the penitent the burden of making recourse within a month to the competent penal superior or to an authorized priest and observing such an authority's mandates or instructions (§2).[148] Should such recourse not be made, the censure technically recurs (reincidence), presumably because of the penitent's obstinate refusal to follow the confessor's directions.

Does the censure also recur if the penitent makes such recourse yet does not observe the aforementioned mandates? The phrase "under the penalty of reincidence" directly qualifies the recourse obligation but not the obligation to obey such mandates. The censure probably is incurred again since the penitent's disobedience seemingly reflects contempt of church authority. However, the structure of the canon might suggest that non-compliance with such mandates does not entail reincidence of the censure. Furthermore, a strict interpretation requires that such reincidence be proven conclusively. Just as serious imputability is necessary if one is to be penalized initially, similar imputability seems necessary for the reincidence of the censure.

[147] Certain chaplains may also absolve penitents from undeclared, unreserved latae sententiae censures wherever they minister (e.g., in hospitals and prisons and on sea journeys) with due regard for c. 976 in a danger-of-death situation in such settings (c. 566, §2).

[148] Such a recourse obligation is operative neither in the case of the canon penitentiary (c. 508, §1) nor the chaplain (c. 566, §2).

Besides informing the penitent of the recourse obligation, the confessor must also impose a suitable penance (c. 1340) and require the repairing of any damage or scandal, if necessary, as an integral part of remitting the censure.[149] The offender's willingness to accept such a penance and make a reasonable effort to repair any damage caused by the delict is a significant sign of the cessation of contumacy necessary to remit a censure (c. 1347, §2; 1358, §1).

Realistically many penitents may find the required recourse difficult given their unfamiliarity with the law. In such instances the confessor may fulfill this duty without mentioning any names to protect the penitent's reputation.

A comparable but different recourse obligation binds those for whom censures are remitted in danger of death (§3; c. 976). Only those subject to unreserved, undeclared latae sententiae censures are exempt from such a recourse obligation after recovering from the crisis. The pastoral urgency of this situation warrants broader faculties for any priest than is envisioned for confessors in the present canon. However, the principally external forum thrust of penal discipline is still exemplified by the post-recovery recourse obligation, which may also be fulfilled by the confessor.

Remission of Censure[150]

Canon 1358 — §1. Remission of a censure cannot be granted unless the offender has withdrawn from contumacy according to the norm of can. 1347, §2; it cannot be denied, however, to a person who withdraws from contumacy.

§2. The person who remits a censure can make provision according to the norm of can. 1348 or can even impose a penance.

The cessation of contumacy is indispensable for the remission of a censure. If such a disposition is verified (c. 1347, §2), the offender has a certain claim to its remission (§1). Such a cessation of contumacy, however, involves both the offender's conversion of heart and serious efforts at remedying any ecclesial damage or scandal. Should such a remission be denied, the offender could take appropriate hierarchic recourse (cc. 1732–1739). This provision notably differentiates censures from expiatory penalties, whose remission is not exclusively related to the cessation of contumacy. Restoring justice and repairing scandal are even more relevant considerations in that context.

The remission of the censure, however, does not necessarily preclude the competent authority from employing certain non-penal legal-pastoral measures (e.g., warning) or imposing a penance (c. 1340). According to canon 1348 the offender may be subject to such measures at the ordinary's discretion (§2). Some detrimental ecclesial effects of the delict may need to be addressed even after the cessation of contumacy, e.g., notable parish divisions occasioned by illegitimate protests against episcopal restructuring of parishes (c. 1373). However, no new penalties may be imposed unless a new penal process indicates that a new delict has been committed.

Remission of Multiple Penalties[151]

Canon 1359 — If several penalties bind a person, a remission is valid only for the penalties expressed in it; a general remission, however, takes away all penalties except those which the offender in bad faith omitted in the petition.

An offender committing several delicts may be liable to multiple penalties although a sense of equity might suggest moderation in their application lest the offender be unduly burdened (c. 1346). One must examine the rescript (c. 59) of remission to see which penalties are remitted since, unlike the sacramental remission of sins, which is total, the remission of penalties may be partial. Such a rescript may be specific or general in character. If it is specific, it is valid only for the penalties expressly mentioned. On the contrary, if it is general, it covers all penalties except those concealed in bad faith when the offender sought such a remission.[152]

[149] See c. 981 on a penance to be imposed by a confessor in a regular penitential context.
[150] Cf. CCEO 1424.
[151] Cf. CCEO 1425.

This canon emphasizes the offender's good faith in acknowledging honestly whatever penalties have been incurred. Such good faith indicates a spirit of conversion, a primary concern in remitting censures (c. 1358) but also pertinent to remitting expiatory penalties.

Coerced Remission of Penalty

Canon 1360 — The remission of a penalty extorted by grave fear is invalid.

This provision invalidating a coerced remission of a penalty illustrates the general principle that legal acts posited through grave fear unjustly induced or through deceit are valid unless the law provides otherwise (c. 125, §2). Here the law provides otherwise regarding grave fear because of the serious ecclesial threat posed by the possible intimidation of church authorities to remit penalties.[153] In such a situation one may question the genuineness of the cessation of contumacy. The canon's legal history and interpretation and the use of the term extorta qualifying the fear seem to indicate that the fear must be unjust in itself or in the manner of its application.

[152] On the relevance of concealing the truth or lying in seeking rescripts, see c. 63.

[153] Interestingly the Eastern code states that, besides grave fear, force or fraud also invalidates the remission of a penalty (CCEO 1421). Although the Latin code does not explicitly state it here, irresistible extrinsic force prompting grave fear also invalidates a remission of a penalty (c. 125, §1).

Format of Remission[154]

Canon 1361 — §1. A remission can also be given conditionally or to a person who is absent.

§2. A remission in the external forum is to be given in writing unless a grave cause suggests otherwise.

§3. Care is to be taken that the petition of remission or the remission itself is not divulged except insofar as it is either useful to protect the reputation of the offender or necessary to repair scandal.

In principle the remission of a penalty is an external forum act of executive power not per se sacramental (cc. 1354–1356). Hence it can technically be expedited without the offender's being present, however desirable that may be (§1). However, the various exceptional internal forum remissions of certain censures[155] obviously presuppose the presence of the penitent.

The remission of a penalty, like other acts of executive governance in the external forum, can be expedited absolutely or conditionally. The condition (e.g., making appropriate restitution) may concern the past, present, or future. However, that conditional factor is also operative in certain internal forum remissions requiring recourse to a competent superior under penalty of reincidence of the censure (c. 1357, §2–§3).

Barring a serious reason for not doing so, an external forum remission is normally to be put in writing like any other administrative act (cc. 37 and 51) so that it can be proved easily (§ 2). However, such a written instrument is not necessary for validity.

The remission should be publicized only if necessary to protect the offender's reputation (c. 220) or to repair damage to the community. The remission of the penalty should be no more public than the delict and the corresponding penalty. The concern about protecting the offender's reputation might be especially valid for one occupying a position of public ecclesial trust, e.g., vicar, pastor, school principal, etc. (§3). However, one must proceed very carefully here.

[154] Cf. CCEO 1422.

[155] See cc. 508, §1; 566, §2; 976; 1355, §2; and 1357.

Prescription of Criminal Action[156]

Canon 1362 — §1. Prescription extinguishes a criminal action after three years unless it concerns:

1° delicts reserved to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith;

2° an action arising from the delicts mentioned in cann. 1394, 1395, 1397, and 1398, which have a prescription of five years;

3° delicts which are not punished in the common law if particular law has established another period for prescription.

§2. Prescription runs from the day on which the delict was committed or, if the delict is continuous or habitual, from the day on which it ceased.

Somewhat surprisingly the next two canons on prescription (c. 197) of criminal and penal actions are not placed in Book VII on procedural law. They may have been placed here because such canons presumably are best situated in the section of the law dealing with the matter subject to prescription. While this may be true, it would have been systematically more appropriate to situate at least the present canon in connection with canon 1718 on the factors an ordinary considers in determining whether to initiate a penal process.[157]

Prescription in Book VI means a statute of limitations or a prohibition of pursuing a criminal action to impose or declare a penalty or a penal action to enforce a penalty after a certain period of time. A concern for the public good requires that criminal actions be pursued expeditiously. The evidence may become stale if too long a time lags between the commission of an alleged delict and its formal prosecution. Furthermore, the legal security of the accused is unduly jeopardized if church authorities do not pursue potential criminal actions with reasonable expeditiousness.

Generally speaking, criminal actions are subject to prescription three years after the commission of the delict or the cessation of a so-called continuing or habitual delict, e.g., membership in a forbidden society plotting against the Church (c. 1374).

However, a different period of time is pertinent for the prosecution of certain delicts. For example, one needs to consult CDF rules for delicts of faith or morals referred to it (PB 52). A five-year period of prescription is envisioned for certain serious moral delicts of clerics or religious (cc. 1394–1395) and certain serious violations of persons, i.e., abduction, mutilation, homicide, and abortion (cc. 1397–1398).

Furthermore, particular law might prescribe a longer or shorter period of prescription for certain delicts it punishes.[158] The specification of a longer period of time to pursue a criminal action indicates that certain delicts are viewed as more destructive of ecclesial values than others.

Prescription of Penal Action[159]

Canon 1363 — §1. Prescription extinguishes an action to execute a penalty if the offender is not notified of the executive decree of the judge mentioned in can. 1651 within the time limits mentioned in can. 1362; these limits are to be computed from the day on which the condemnatory sentence became a res iudicata.

[156] Cf. CCEO 1152. Unlike the Latin code, which deals explicitly only with prescription, the Eastern code also refers to the extinction of the penal action by the death of the accused or by an authoritative pardon (§1). Rather than referring specifically to the CDF, the Eastern code refers generically to delicts reserved to the Apostolic See (§2).

[157] This is true although technically c. 1363 on the prescription of an action to execute a penalty presupposes that the penalty has already been imposed after a process. The prescription of such an action is one way in which a penalty ceases.

[158] See commentary on c. 1395, §2 for special particular law provisions in clerical sexual abuse of minors cases in the United States.

[159] Cf. CCEO 1153.

§2. Having observed what is required, the same is valid if the penalty was imposed by extrajudicial decree.

This final canon deals with a complex canonical point warranting only a brief consideration given its lack of relevance in practice. One may distinguish between initiating 1) a criminal action leading to a decree or sentence penalizing an offender (c. 1362) and 2) a penal action to enforce the penalty determined in the criminal action (c. 1363).

Although an offender might be condemned for committing a delict, the judge may defer enforcing the penalty if certain pastoral goals can better be achieved otherwise. Furthermore, the observance of an expiatory penalty for a first offender might be suspended for the same reasons (c. 1344, 1° and 3°). When the penalty is deferred or its observance is suspended, the institute of prescription is also operative from the time the penal sentence is technically a definitively adjudged matter (res iudicata, c. 1641, §1). The same holds true for an administrative penal decree with due regard for the fact that the code does not explicitly envision such a decree's becoming technically a definitively adjudged matter (§2).

In other words, if three (or possibly five) years elapse after a penal sentence becomes a definitively adjudged matter and no judge has ordered the enforcement of the penalty (c. 1651), then no one can press the issue further. Such a provision is to ensure the legal security of the offender, who otherwise would be indefinitely liable to the penalty in question.

The present canon refers explicitly only to ferendae sententiae penalties since it mentions the condemnatory sentence. Technically there is no executory decree for latae sententiae penalties, which take effect upon commission of the delict, barring mitigating circumstances (c. 1324, §3). However, additional legal effects follow the formal declaration of such penalties (e.g., c. 1331, §2). Hence an executory decree seems warranted in such cases, and the ordinary rules on prescription also seem applicable there.

Part II
PENALTIES FOR INDIVIDUAL DELICTS
[cc. 1364–1399][160]

This second part of Book VI lists various delicts deemed serious enough to require similar treatment throughout the Church if its penal purposes are to be achieved, i.e., repairing scandal, restoring justice, and reforming the offender (c. 1341).[161] Instead of 101 canons on specific delicts (CIC 2314–2414), the present code contains only 35 canons organized under six titles as well as a concluding general norm penalizing legal violations not specifically sanctioned in the code.[162] Such titles reflect various values to be promoted in fostering the Church's mission. These values will be clarified when we examine individual delicts.

This part of the commentary will be briefer than part one, which seems somewhat more significant since it clarifies basic penal principles. We will briefly introduce the seven titles, comment on the relevant canons, and refer to pertinent canons elsewhere in the revised code or in its 1917 predecessor.[163]

This part of the code can be properly appreciated only by regularly referring to the commen-[160] See the helpful reflections of Marzoa, in Com Ex, 461–467.

[161] Furthermore, infra-universal legislators such as bishops and episcopal conferences can penalize specific delicts other than those indicated here under certain conditions (e.g., cc. 1315–1318).

[162] The Eastern code contains slightly fewer delicts (CCEO 1436–1467). It neither systematically lists them under certain titles nor penalizes otherwise unsanctioned legal violations. The text will be referred to solely for comparison purposes. See Green, "Comparative Reflections," 435–441.

[163] The 1917 code will be considered in detail only if necessary to explain the current law or clarify significant differences from it.

tary on the substantive law contained elsewhere in the code. However, some brief reflections on that substantive law are necessary in explaining the penal canons addressing serious violations of that law.[164]

The commentary will briefly clarify the nature of the delict, indicate possible offenders, and note the pertinent penalties. As frequently noted, penal law must be interpreted strictly; hence, in doubt, the strictest possible understanding of a delict is to be followed (c. 18). Furthermore, the factors affecting imputability (cc. 1321–1330) and options for exercising penal discretion (cc. 1343–1346; 1349)[165] are constantly to be considered.

Individual delicts should be defined precisely so that the faithful are clear about the legislator's expectations regarding the observance of the law. This is important to protect the right of believers not to be deprived of their freedom except according to law (c. 221, §3). Generally the canons in this part of the code precisely define sanctionable behavior. However, occasionally this is not true, which makes legal interpretation somewhat difficult.[166]

[164] Not all penalties for specific delicts are found in Book VI. For example, see cc. 1457 and 1489 on penalties for tribunal personnel, advocates, and procurators. Furthermore, penalties are specified for certain violations of papal election norms. See John Paul II, apconst Universi dominici gregis, February 22, 1996, nn. 55; 58; 78, Origins 25/37 (March 7, 1996) 626; 628.

[165] For example, the penal authority need not necessarily impose even obligatory ferendae sententiae penalties (c. 1344). Furthermore, if penalties are indeterminate, only relatively light penalties are generally in order; and perpetual penalties are prohibited (c. 1349). These observations will not be repeated throughout the commentary, which simply refers to these canons as appropriate.

[166] See, for example, cc. 1384 on illegitimately performing a priestly function or another sacred ministry and 1389 on abusing power and negligently harming another through an official ecclesiastical act.

Title I
Delicts against Religion and the Unity of the Church
[cc. 1364–1369][167]

Apostasy, Heresy, and Schism[168]

Canon 1364 — §1. Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 194, §1, n. 2, an apostate from the faith, a heretic, or a schismatic incurs a latae sententiae excommunication; in addition, a cleric can be punished with the penalties mentioned in can. 1336, §1, nn. 1, 2, and 3.

§2. If contumacy of long duration or the gravity of scandal demands it, other penalties can be added, including dismissal from the clerical state.

Canon 751, not the present canon, defines heresy, apostasy, and schism, three different yet at times interrelated delicts. Heresy is an obstinate post-baptismal denial of or doubt concerning some truth which must be believed with divine and catholic faith. Apostasy means a total repudiation of the Catholic faith. Schism is the refusal of submission to the Supreme Pontiff or of communion with those subject to him (c. 209).

These very serious violations of ecclesial faith and communion warrant a latae sententiae excommunication.[169] The present formulation of the canon surfaced late in the revision process,[170] during most of which a ferendae sententiae excommunication had been envisioned. Although a latae

[167] Besides the Münster commentary, see Borras, 159–172; Green, in CLSA Com, 920–921; Martin, in CLSGBI Com, 785–789; Rees, 426–439; various authors in Com Ex, 461–494.

[168] See CCEO 1436, 1 (heretic and apostate) and 1437 (schismatic).

[169] The penalty does not bind non-Catholics, whatever their doctrinal positions, since they are generally not bound by church law (c. 11). See numbers 19–20 of the May 14, 1967 SPCU ecumenical directory.

[170] For thoughtful reflections on this process, see Marzoa, in Com Ex, 470–474.

sententiae excommunication is presumably incurred for such delicts, church authorities must be sensitive to the complex theological-pastoral issues raised by these delicts.

At times it is difficult to determine precisely when an individual or group is canonically guilty of apostasy, heresy, or schism. This is especially true given increased theological pluralism, expanded contacts with other Christians and members of other religious traditions, and confessional boundaries not as sharply defined as formerly. Furthermore, penal measures may be inappropriate in dealing responsibly with persons so distancing themselves from the Church. It might be better simply to declare formally an incompatibility between their faith and that of the Church.

In any event, juridical certainty about such delicts presupposes a careful inquiry into the pertinent facts, especially the obstinate, external (c. 1330) rejection of a doctrine of faith (c. 750, §1) or ecclesial communion (c. 209). This is certainly warranted before any formal declaration of the penalty, only after which are all the effects of the excommunication verified (c. 1331, §2).[171]

On balance, the penalty should have remained ferendae sententiae in character as initially proposed, for the determination of doctrinal orthodoxy is a delicate enterprise, which has been publicized occasionally during the past decade due to formal investigations of various theologians, e.g., Boff, Curran, Drewermann. Yet, interestingly enough, such theologians were not declared heretics although administrative measures were taken against them, e.g., withdrawal of mandate/ canonical mission to teach theology.

The most notable recent declaration of heresy involved the Sri Lankan theologian Tissa Balasuriya. This controversial CDF action in January 1997 raised various questions about the appropriate procedure in such doctrinal matters, the significance of the profession of faith, and the ecumenical appropriateness of such penal measures.[172] The relevant doctrinal issues can be dealt with constructively and various ecclesial values preserved only through workable procedures for regular informal, and perhaps formal, dialogue between the magisterium and various scholars.[173]

Occasionally special penalties bind clerics committing particularly serious delicts. Here additional expiatory prohibitions or privations (c. 1336, §1, 1°–3°) may be imposed on them besides the aforementioned excommunication (§1). Despite the basic equality of believers (c. 208), clerics have special institutional responsibilities; hence, their legal violations are especially serious delicts.

Furthermore, long-standing contumacy, or contempt for the law, or serious scandal undercutting the faith of believers may justify additional penalties for clerics including the last resort measure of dismissal from the clerical state (c. 1364, §2). The seriousness of the penalty is proportionate to the obstinacy of the offender and the seriousness of the ecclesial damage. The dismissal reflects the radical incompatibility between one's public ministerial commitment (c. 1008) and the notable and obstinate distancing of self from the Catholic communion.

[171] See Doctrinal Congregation, "Regulations for Doctrinal Examination," June 29, 1997, Origins 27/13 (September 11, 1997) 221–224. These CDF regulations on reviewing possibly erroneous theological writings were specifically approved by the pope, which is necessary for a congregation to issue legislation. Article 28 provides for the congregation's declaration of a latae sententiae excommunication for heresy, apostasy, or schism after reviewing writings said to be "clearly and certainly erroneous," whose dissemination could gravely harm the faithful. Somewhat surprisingly, recourse against such a declaration is prohibited, contrary to the usual rule to protect the right of defense (c. 1353). Presumably the involvement of the pope, congregation officials and advisors, the author, and the author's ordinary precludes the need for such recourse. See Regulations, 23–24.

[172] For some pertinent documentation on the case see Origins 26/32 (January 30, 1997) 528–536. See also L. Örsy, "A Profession of Faith and an Excommunication in Ecumenical Perspective," America (February 22, 1997) 6–8; G. Read, "The Excommunication of Fr. Balasuriya, O.M.I.," CLS-GBIN no. 109 (March 1997) 24–29. Father Balasuriya was subsequently reconciled with the Church on January 15, 1998. See "Father Tissa Balasuriya's Reconciliation with the Church," Origins 27/32 (January 29, 1998) 529; 531–32.

[173] This complex issue can hardly be dealt with adequately here. See L. O'Donovan, ed., Cooperation between Theologians and the Ecclesiastical Magisterium (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1982). Subsequent discussions involving CLSA, CTSA, and NCCB representatives ultimately led to an official document on theologian-magisterium relationships. See NCCB, Doctrinal Responsibilities Approaches to Promoting Cooperation and Resolving Misunderstandings between Bishops and Theologians (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1989).

Excommunication in principle does not entail the loss of ecclesiastical office but rather a prohibition of its exercise, sometimes with invalidating effects (c. 1331). However, any ecclesiastical office is lost as an administrative consequence of abandoning the Catholic communion (c. 194, §1, 2°).[174] Understandably the exercise of such an office presupposes a continuing commitment to the Catholic communion.

Prohibited Participation in Sacred Rites[175]

Canon 1365 — A person guilty of prohibited participation in sacred rites (communicatio in sacris) is to be punished with a just penalty.

The postconciliar period has witnessed the development of notably closer relationships between Catholics and members of other religious traditions, especially those in other Christian churches or ecclesial communities. Catholic ecumenical involvement, liturgical and otherwise, is subject to the direction of the college of bishops, the Holy See, individual bishops, and the episcopal conference (c. 755).

Given diverse ecumenical situations throughout the Church, the code understandably articulates only generic norms while leaving ample room for more specific lower level determinations. The current canon was apparently deemed necessary to cope with serious ecumenical abuses, e.g., risk of indifferentism through indiscriminate sacramental sharing (communicatio in sacris). Yet, other than prohibited concelebration (c. 908), it is not entirely clear to what this penal text applies, for the significant canon 844 states general principles on permissible sacramental sharing but contains no explicit prohibitions.

Hence the vagueness of this canon poses problems for its responsible implementation. Like the preceding canon, it should be interpreted strictly lest legitimate options for sharing spiritual activities and resources be unduly jeopardized and the vitality of the ecumenical movement impaired.[176] The canon envisions an obligatory yet indeterminate ferendae sententiae penalty for clerics or laity violating the law (cc. 1344; 1349). Hence, the delict is viewed as notably less serious than apostasy, heresy, or schism.

Non-Catholic Baptism or Education of Children[177]

Canon 1366 — Parents or those who take the place of parents who hand over their children to be baptized or educated in a non-Catholic religion are to be punished with a censure or other just penalty.

Catholic parents, natural or adoptive, or their surrogates (e.g., foster parents) are primarily responsible for the religious initiation and formation of their children.[178] This canon penalizes a serious breach of those responsibilities by the free and deliberate handing over of children to be baptized and/or educated in a non-Catholic religious tradition.[179] Mere negligence in fulfilling those [174] A member of a religious institute or society of apostolic life notoriously defecting from the Catholic faith is ipso facto dismissed from the institute (c. 694, 1°) or society (c. 746). For other implications of the delicts in c. 1364, see cc. 316 (public associations of the faithful), 1041, 2° and 1044, §1, 2° (irregularities for orders); 1071, 4° (permission for marriage); 1184, §1, 3° (ecclesiastical burial).

[175] Cf. CCEO 1440.

[176] See Ecum Dir, nn. 102–142, especially nn. 122–136 on sacramental sharing.

[177] Cf. CCEO 1439. For a thoughtful discussion of c. 1366, see J. Escriva Ivars, in Com Ex, 482–487.

[178] On the right and responsibility of parents to see to the baptism and education of their children, see cc. 867; 226, §2; 774, §2; 1136.

[179] This provision intends no disrespect for the spiritual values of other religious traditions. Rather, the code highlights the richness of the Catholic tradition and the par-baptismal and educational responsibilities, however problematic morally, is not a delict. Furthermore, the preceptive (c. 1344), ferendae sententiae censure or other just penalty (c. 1349) envisioned here does not apply to parents or their surrogates who legitimately send their children to non-Catholic schools for various reasons (e.g., unavailability of a Catholic school) but share their Catholic faith with them.

Such a penal situation, however unlikely, would probably be relevant only in mixed marriages. One must also consider possible pressures on Catholic spouses including those making the requisite declarations and promises prior to a mixed marriage (c. 1125, 1°). A concern to foster marital and family harmony may lead the Catholic spouse to permit the baptism and/or education of the children in another church or ecclesial community. However, even in such difficult circumstances, the Catholic is still obliged to share the faith with the children.[180]

The discretion of the penal authority in assessing the situation is important here. The positive initiative, serious imputability, and bad faith of the Catholic parent(s) in handing over the children for non-Catholic baptism and/or education are key penal considerations. Yet intensive evangelization or catechetical efforts would likely foster ecclesial values more effectively than penalties.[181]

Violation of Sacred Species[182]

Canon 1367 — A person who throws away the consecrated species or takes or retains them for a sacrilegious purpose incurs a latae sententiae excommunication reserved to the Apostolic See; moreover, a cleric can be punished with another penalty, not excluding dismissal from the clerical state.

This canon reflects the importance of reverence for the Eucharist, the summit and source of Christian worship and life (cc. 897–898). The present canon is the most serious of a series of canons penalizing deliberate and free violations of sacred realities, i.e., persons and objects.[183]

The canon envisions three possible delictual situations: disrespectfully throwing away the sacred species (usually consecrated hosts) or scattering them in an inappropriate place, intentionally taking them from the tabernacle for sacrilegious purposes (e.g., satanic ritual), or keeping them for such obscene purposes although they were obtained legitimately (e.g., at a Eucharist).[184]

The latae sententiae excommunication envisioned for any Catholic violating the law and the reservation of its remission to the Holy See[185] indicate the seriousness of the violation. Furthermore, clerics are especially obliged to foster eucharistic piety (cc. 246, §1; 276, §2, 2°; 898). Hence, they may be liable to additional discretionary ferendae sententiae penalties including dismissal from the clerical state for a very serious violation.

Perjury[186]

Canon 1368 — A person who commits perjury while asserting or promising something before ecclesiastical authority is to be punished with a just penalty.

This canon attempts to ensure the authenticity of ecclesial commitments and protect the integrity ents' sacramentally based obligation to share it with their children. Cavalier disregard for one's Catholic heritage is viewed as especially problematic.

[180] For a nuanced discussion of this issue, see Ecum Dir, n. 151.

[181] On the responsibility of pastors to support ecumenical marriages, see c. 1128.

[182] Cf. CCEO 1442.

[183] See also c. 1370 on physically attacking certain persons, c. 1376 on profaning sacred things, and c. 1380 on simoniacally celebrating or receiving the sacraments.

[184] Since the essence of the delict is disrespect for the Lord, it is not a delict if one inadvertently drops the consecrated host, keeps the Blessed Sacrament in his or her possession out of misguided devotion (c. 935), or fails to care properly for the tabernacle (c. 938).

[185] See also c. 1370, §1 on the delict of physically attacking the pope, whose remission is also reserved to the Holy See.

[186] Cf. CCEO 1444.

of church processes. Perjury means deliberately violating the serious obligation before God to tell the truth under oath (c. 1199, §1).[187] The breaking of such an oath violates the virtue of religion, which accounts for the placement of this canon here and not in title IV on crimes of falsehood (cc. 1390–1391).

The canon envisions two situations of Catholics knowingly and freely violating an oath, i.e., supporting an assertion or confirming a promise. For example, one may falsely take an oath confirming the truth of one's assertions in a formal case (c. 1532). Or a person may falsely promise to discharge faithfully a diocesan curial office (c. 471, 1°).[188]

The delict presupposes that the false assertion or promise is made knowingly and freely to a church authority figure functioning officially. Such perjury in a private context or in a civil law setting is not a delict, whatever its moral or civil law implications. Furthermore, there is no delict if one errs about the status of the person before whom one is swearing, if one fails to recognize the religious character of the oath, or if an inculpably ignorant person erroneously believes he or she is telling the truth.

The canon provides for a preceptive, indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalty to be assessed according to the seriousness of the situation (cc. 1344; 1349).

Abuse of Church/Religion[189]

Canon 1369 — A person who in a public show or speech, in published writing, or in other uses of the instruments of social communication utters blasphemy, gravely injures good morals, expresses insults, or excites hatred or contempt against religion or the Church is to be punished with a just penalty.

Late in the revision process, the penal law committee thought that the code should address certain contemporary evils, particularly those directly and adversely affecting the Church's social order at a time of serious attacks on traditional moral values. This generically formulated, rather sweeping canon embodies such a concern.

The canon generically envisions four possible violations of church integrity or moral values. Blasphemy means deliberately speaking irreverently or contemptuously of God; at issue is the degrading character of a presentation and the potentially scandalous impact upon a group's religious sensibilities, e.g., incitement to evil. Also envisioned is an intentional attack on good morals, e.g., promotion of pornography. Third, the legislator prohibits direct attacks on religion or the Church even if no particular individual is insulted; and finally he penalizes behavior prompting hatred or contempt of religion or the Church.[190]

There is a distinctly public, external character about the aforementioned delicts (c. 1330). They involve the improper use of the media (e.g., radio, TV, or film)[191] or other public activity, e.g., a public gathering or a written publication. The context is such that the religious sensibilities of a significant number of persons may be grievously offended.

The code also provides here for a preceptive, indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalty (cc. 1344; 1349). However laudable the legislator's intent, the practical relevance of this canon seems questionable because of its sweeping, imprecise character. Furthermore, one may wonder whether those normally guilty of such outrageous behavior would be significantly affected by such a penalty.

[187] For example, on the obligation to tell the truth in a formal case, see cc. 1531 (principals) and 1548, §1 (witnesses).

[188] Among other situations in which perjury may be possible in taking an oath, see cc. 380 (new bishop vis-à-vis Holy See); 1283, 1° (new administrator of church property); 1454 and 1455, §3 (tribunal personnel).

[189] Cf. CCEO 1448, §1.

[190] See also c. 1373 penalizing one publicly inciting animosities or hatred among the subjects of the Apostolic See or an ordinary because of an act of ecclesiastical power or ministry.

[191] On the importance of a human and Christian use of the media, see cc. 822–823.

TITLE II
DELICTS AGAINST ECCLESIASTICAL AUTHORITIES AND THE FREEDOM OF THE CHURCH [cc. 1370–1377][192]

Physical Attacks on Religious Figures[193]

Canon 1370 — §1. A person who uses physical force against the Roman Pontiff incurs a latae sententiae excommunication reserved to the Apostolic See; if he is a cleric, another penalty, not excluding dismissal from the clerical state, can be added according to the gravity of the delict.

§2. A person who does this against a bishop incurs a latae sententiae interdict and, if he is a cleric, also a latae sententiae suspension.

§3. A person who uses physical force against a cleric or religious out of contempt for the faith, the Church, ecclesiastical power, or the ministry is to be punished with a just penalty.

The penal law committee rejected criticisms of the need for this canon given civil law provisions, its questionable effectiveness in deterring potential offenders, and its penalizing physical attacks only on clerics and religious, prescinding from other believers. There is a descending scale of penalties proportionate to the official ecclesial status of the victim of violence, of which the attacker must be aware.

The Church's public good is presumably harmed more or less seriously depending on the institutional dignity of the victim of physical (not verbal—c. 1369) violence. Clerics (c. 1008) represent the Church in a special way in exercising their public ministry, and religious represent a special gift for its mission given their public commitment (c. 573, §1).

Accordingly one of the few reserved latae sententiae excommunications punishes those intentionally doing physical violence to the pope for whatever reason given his preeminent ecclesial status (§1; cc. 331; 333, §1). He may be physically assaulted (e.g., shooting) or deprived of his freedom (e.g., abduction). If the attacker is a cleric, additional expiatory penalties may be warranted, including dismissal from the clerical state, depending on the seriousness of the delict.[194] Such penalties may be imposed even prescinding from the cessation of contumacy, which warrants the lifting of the excommunication.

Somewhat less serious penalties are envisioned for those physically attacking a bishop for whatever reason given his significant ecclesial status (§ 2; c. 375). Any attacker is subject to a latae sententiae interdict, and a cleric is also liable to a latae sententiae suspension.

A still less serious preceptive, indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalty binds those deliberately attacking another cleric or religious physically (§3; cc. 1344; 1349).[195] Interestingly enough here, such an attack must be prompted by contempt for the faith, the Church, ecclesiastical power, or ministry. An attack motivated by other reasons (e.g., strong personal dislike), however morally problematic, is not technically a delict.

[192] Besides the Münster commentary, see Borras, 172–178; Green, in CLSA Com, 922–924; Martin, in CLSGBI Com, 789–793; Rees, 439–451; various authors in Com Ex, 495–525.

[193] Cf. CCEO 1445.

[194] Clerics are subject to additional penalties due to their special obligation of reverence for and obedience to the pope and their own ordinary (c. 273). In the Eastern code attacks on bishops warrant a preceptive "appropriate penalty" possibly including deposition, i.e., dismissal. However, attacks on patriarchs, metropolitans, and the pope warrant a major excommunication, reserved to the pope in the last instance (CCEO 1445, §1).

[195] The term "cleric" refers to bishops, priests, and deacons (cc. 207, §1; 1008–1009). The term "religious" means members of religious institutes (c. 607). Hence, nonclerical members of secular institutes or societies of apostolic life are technically not envisioned by the canon, which must be strictly interpreted (c. 18). The Eastern code, however, also penalizes physical attacks on members of a society of common life in the manner of religious as well as on lay persons exercising an ecclesiastical function (CCEO 1445, §2).

Doctrinal Violations

Canon 1371 — The following are to be punished with a just penalty:

1° in addition to the case mentioned in can. 1364, §1, a person who teaches a doctrine condemned by the Roman Pontiff or an ecumenical council or who obstinately rejects the doctrine mentioned in can. 750, §2 or in can. 752 and who does not retract after having been admonished by the Apostolic See or an ordinary;

Like canon 1364 on apostasy, heresy, and schism, this text requires careful interpretation given its broad formulation.[196] What is envisioned is the offender's persistent, deliberate refusal to comply with an authoritative warning to change an erroneous way of teaching or thinking. Such a warning is to be established by some document to be kept in the secret curial archive (c. 1339, §3).

The scope of the canon was expanded during the papal consultation prior to promulgation of the code. All prior drafts of the canon, including that approved by the October 1981 commission Plenarium, would have penalized only the teaching of a doctrine clearly condemned by the pope or an ecumenical council even if the doctrine were not technically heretical. However, the Latin code, unlike its Eastern counterpart (CCEO 1436, §2), refers also to the pertinacious rejection of a doctrine which calls not for an assent of faith (c. 750) but rather for religious submission (obsequium) of mind and will (c. 752). This latter response is appropriate because the doctrine in question is not proclaimed definitively as requiring an assent of faith.

The scope of this canon was further explicitated in a May 18, 1998 apostolic letter of John Paul II entitled Ad tuendam fidem.[197] The letter added a second paragraph to canon 750 of the Latin code and canon 598 of its Eastern counterpart. The new paragraph calls for a firm acceptance and holding of whatever is proposed definitively by the magisterium regarding doctrine concerning faith and morals. According to the present canon, whoever obstinately rejects such a doctrine and does not retract after an official warning is also to be punished with a just penalty (cf. CCEO 1436, §2).[198]

The delict presupposes an exercise of authoritative magisterial teaching, not simply a private expression of a theological opinion by a bishop. The delict is viewed as considerably less serious than apostasy, heresy, or schism since it warrants only a preceptive, indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalty (cc. 1344; 1349) instead of a latae sententiae excommunication (c. 1364, §1).[199]

The penalty for the doctrinal violations envisioned here should correspond to the seriousness of the ecclesial damage done by the offender's doctrinal obstinacy. The warning mentioned would be issued by the Apostolic See, i.e., CDF (PB 51–52) or an ordinary (c. 134). While the penalty for knowingly teaching a condemned doctrine probably affects only Catholic teachers, any Catholic may theoretically be penalized for deliberately rejecting such authoritative doctrine.

Actually, penal measures here may be decidedly counterproductive both in the Church and in the larger society. Regular magisterium-scholar-pastor dialogue rather than penal measures will more likely protect and foster the integrity of ecclesial faith and ensure appropriate freedom of in-

[196] See the commentary on cc. 749–754 regarding the complex doctrinal issues underlying this canon.

[197] See John Paul II, aplett Ad tuendam fidem, Origins 28/8 (July 16, 1998) 113; 115-116.

[198] For a more detailed discussion of the pertinent doctrinal issues, see the commentary on cc. 750 and 833.

[199] Fortunately the proposed penalty here is ferendae sententiae in character, unlike the latae sententiae provision in c. 1364. Hence, c. 1371, 1° envisions a judicial or administrative procedure hopefully facilitating a careful examination of the pertinent doctrinal issues. See CDF Regulations, art. 29, Origins 27/13 (September 11, 1997) 222–223. Unlike the less serious indeterminate penalty here, the 1917 code required the removal of faculties to preach and hear confessions, removal from any teaching office, and other penalties deemed necessary to repair scandal (CIC 2317).

quiry and expression for those engaged in the sacred disciplines (c. 218).[200]

Disobedience of Legitimate Church Authority

2° a person who otherwise does not obey a legitimate precept or prohibition of the Apostolic See, an ordinary, or a superior and who persists in disobedience after a warning.

Canon 1371 likewise envisions an obligatory, indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalty in the case of free and deliberate disobedience of ecclesiastical superiors functioning according to law (cc. 1344; 1349).[201] Such law includes the constitutions of religious institutes, secular institutes, and societies of consecrated life.[202] This number of canon 1371 is somewhat vaguely formulated and could possibly lead to certain abuses. The code here envisions a serious breach of ecclesiastical discipline involving an obstinate failure to comply with a legitimate prescription (e.g., taking an assignment) or prohibition of church authority (e.g., cessation of political activity) even after a formal warning.

Recourse against Pope

Canon 1372 — A person who makes recourse against an act of the Roman Pontiff to an ecumenical council or the college of bishops is to be punished with a censure.

This somewhat perplexing canon, without an Eastern code counterpart, emerged late in the revision process. It apparently reflects the serious intra-ecclesial conflict of the conciliarist period of the fifteenth century. In contrast, despite certain tensions, there has been very fruitful, contemporary papal-episcopal collaboration, especially during Vatican II and subsequent episcopal synods.

The canon's basic rationale is the denial of papal primacy (cc. 331 and 333, §1). Such recourse would create the impression of an ecclesial authority higher than the pope. Deliberate recourse against him to either the ecumenical council (cc. 337–341) or the college of bishops (c. 336) would represent an illegitimate effort to separate him from an integral and preeminent relationship with his brother bishops. Such an effort is technically impossible given our theological-canonical understanding of papal-episcopal relationships.

Canon 1372 generically refers to "making recourse against an act of the Roman Pontiff," not a curial act unless it were specifically approved by the pope. Since the term "recourse" (recurrit) must be strictly interpreted (c. 18), the canon seems to envision an act of administrative papal governance as distinct from judicial[203] or legislative governance.[204]

The code speaks generically of a preceptive (c. 1344), ferendae sententiae censure rather than a reserved latae sententiae excommunication as in [200] For some thoughtful theological reflections on c. 1371, 1°, see J. Boyle, Church Teaching Authority: Historical and Theological Studies (Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame, 1995) 117–118. Boyle is concerned about the canon's insufficiently nuanced approach to violations of c. 752, which embraces a wide range of papal or episcopal teaching and implies the commitment of teaching authority in varying degrees (LG 25). Canon 1371, 1° does not seem to take sufficient cognizance of sophisticated theological distinctions (e.g., the tradition of theological notes) and seems to impede legitimate dissent from the teaching of the ordinary magisterium. See also A. Naud, Un Aggiornamento et Son Eclipse (n.p.: Fides, 1996) 141–142.

[201] On the basic Christian obligation to obey one's sacred pastors as teachers of the faith and rulers of the Church, see c. 212, §1. On the special clerical obligation of reverence for and obedience to the Supreme Pontiff and one's own ordinary, see c. 273.

[202] On the counsel of obedience of "religious," see c. 601. The Eastern code requires only an appropriate penalty for disobedience of one's hierarch (CCEO 1446).

[203] On the impossibility of an appeal or recourse against a papal sentence or decree, see c. 333, §3. For other pertinent canons in the judicial arena, see cc. 1404; 1405, §2; and 1629, 1°.

[204] See Marzoa, in Com Ex, 504–508, who adopts an unduly broad view of the delict as also encompassing appeals against papal sentences.

the 1917 code (CIC 2332). An excommunication or interdict might be imposed for clerics or laity or a suspension for clerics depending on the seriousness of the issue. This is the only canon providing solely for an unspecified censure.

Opposition to Church Authority[205]

Canon 1373 — A person who publicly incites among subjects animosities or hatred against the Apostolic See or an ordinary because of some act of power or ecclesiastical ministry or provokes subjects to disobey them is to be punished by an interdict or other just penalties.

The next three canons deal with illegitimate opposition to church authority, which might significantly jeopardize the Church's threefold mission.

One can appreciate the legitimate concern to protect the unimpeded exercise of church authority, which is essential to the common good. However, this canon's concern to repress destructive hostility to church institutions must be interpreted judiciously. Otherwise a responsible expression of opinion regarding their effectiveness might be arbitrarily curtailed. Yet this is indispensable if the Church is adequately to fulfill its mission amid changing pastoral circumstances (c. 212, §2–3).[206]

The canon differentiates between two delictual situations, which might involve any Catholic[207] inciting those subject to authority to insubordination or disobedience. First of all one may deliberately stir up hostility to the Apostolic See or an ordinary (c. 134) because of some act of power or ecclesiastical ministry, e.g., the closing of a parish (c. 515, §2). The second situation does not necessarily involve a specific act of governance but rather entails provoking disobedience to the aforementioned authorities. In both instances the canon requires a certain success of the conspiratorial efforts. Thus hostility to church authority must be generated in the first case, and actual disobedience must occur in the second instance.

The conspiratorial mindset differentiates the present delict from the simple disobedience of canon 1371, 2°. The former may have more detrimental ecclesial consequences than the latter because of the fostering of a general climate of public insubordination. Hence, the provision for a preceptive, ferendae sententiae interdict or other just penalties (cc. 1344; 1349).

Membership in Forbidden Societies[208]

Canon 1374 — A person who joins an association which plots against the Church is to be punished with a just penalty; however, a person who promotes or directs an association of this kind is to be punished with an interdict.

This canon was added during the revision of the original schema at the request of the CDF. The code notably simplifies its 1917 predecessor, which explicitly condemned the Masons and also mentioned plotting against civil powers (CIC 2335). Furthermore, the 1983 code is formulated rather generically, neither providing special penalties for clerics or religious nor requiring their denunciation to the then Holy Office (CIC 2336).

However, the 1983 code, unlike its Eastern counterpart, differentiates between simple membership (just penalty) and the deliberate promoting of or holding office in a society plotting against the Church (interdict). Since the latter activities are presumably more ecclesially detrimental, they require a somewhat more severe penalty. Both penalties are preceptive (c. 1344), indeterminate (c. 1349), and ferendae sententiae in character unlike the former latae sententiae excommunication simply reserved to the Holy See. The delict pre-

[205] Cf. CCEO 1447, §1.

[206] Ongoing critique of the law is integral to church reform. See J. Provost, "Canon Law: True or False Reform in the Church," J 38 (1978) 257–267; J. Coriden, "Law in Service to the People of God," J 41 (1981) 1–20.

[207] For the view that the offender is an authority figure such as a pastor inciting his subjects to insubordination or disobedience of higher authority, see Borras, 175–176, and Martin, 791.

[208] Cf. CCEO 1448, §2.

supposes that the offender is duly aware of the society's hostile attitude toward the Church.

These developments reflect changing historical circumstances and diverse ecclesial conditions, especially but not exclusively regarding the anti-ecclesial nature of the Masons. If they or other groups actively plot against the Church, this canon is possibly relevant.

In this connection one might note an official development at the time of promulgation of the code. During the revision process various bishops, especially from Germany, sought an explicit condemnation of the Masons because of their anti-ecclesial stance. However, both the commission secretariat and the October 1981 Plenarium rejected this proposal since the problem was not perceived to be a universal one warranting a general provision.

Somewhat surprisingly, just before the code took effect, a CDF declaration, which did not technically have the force of law, indicated that Catholic Masons are involved in serious sin and are barred from the Eucharist.[209] This judgment was based on the alleged irreconcilability of Masonic principles and Catholic doctrine. The declaration also precluded contrary episcopal judgments mitigating the force of the CDF declaration. This posture seems somewhat contrary to earlier CDF pronouncements apparently open to recognizing the differences in various Masonic associations while opposing formal episcopal conference pronouncements on the general nature of such associations.

The complex implications of this issue have prompted different canonical opinions.[210] However, in dealing with practical questions that may arise, one must interpret the pertinent penal law strictly (e.g., cc. 1364 and 1374) with due regard for the factors affecting imputability (cc. 18; 1323–1327). Such prudence is also necessary in practically judging the serious sinfulness of Masonic affiliation, especially by one in good faith. The traditional principles of moral theology are pertinent here.

Furthermore, every effort should be made to clarify the precise nature of Masonic associations throughout the world to assist local church authorities in prudently assessing membership in such groups. Only such authorities seem able to clarify precisely whether a given society actively plots against the Church.

Violations of Church Freedom[211]

Canon 1375 — Those who impede the freedom of ministry, of election, or of ecclesiastical power or the legitimate use of sacred goods or other ecclesiastical goods or who greatly intimidate an elector, one elected, or one who exercises ecclesiastical power or ministry can be punished with a just penalty.

This generically formulated canon also attempts to ensure the free exercise of various significant ecclesial functions. While this goal is laudable, the canon seems somewhat difficult to interpret because of its sweeping and generic character. The implementation of the law might be facilitated if the sanctionable legal violations were more precisely delineated.[212] Furthermore, those most likely to hinder the Church's mission may not even be Catholics subject to this legislation, e.g., governmental or military figures persecuting the Church in areas of notable Church-State conflict.

There are two general types of delicts here. First of all, one may deliberately and successfully obstruct the exercise of ecclesiastical ministry, authority,[213] or office, the holding of ecclesiastical elections (c. 170), and finally the legitimate use of sacred goods (c. 1171) or other ecclesiastical goods (c. 1257, §1).[214] Furthermore, one may deliberately and seriously intimidate those involved [209] Origins 13/27 (November 15, 1983) 450.

[210] See R. Jenkins, "The Evolution of the Church's Prohibition against Catholic Membership in Freemasonry," J 56/2 (1996) 735–755. Also Marzoa, in Com Ex, 512–517.

[211] Cf. CCEO 1447, §2.

[212] For example, various penalties are specified for violations in connection with the papal election. See supra, n. 164.

[213] For example, see c. 1401 affirming the Church's proper and exclusive right to judge certain cases.

[214] See c. 1254, §1 on the Church's claim to legitimate freedom in disposing of its temporal goods.

in ecclesiastical elections (c. 172, 1°) or exercising ecclesiastical power or ministry.

Since the code envisions only a discretionary, indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalty, these possible delicts are probably not viewed as especially urgent concerns (cc. 1343; 1349).

Profanation of Sacred Things[215]

Canon 1376 — A person who profanes a movable or immovable sacred object is to be punished with a just penalty.

This canon should be read in relationship to other violations of sacred realities: canons 1367 on desecrating the sacred species, 1370 on attacking certain clerics and religious, and 1380 on simoniacally celebrating or receiving the sacraments. A concern for reverence for sacred objects (c. 1171) underlies this provision. Sacred things are those destined for divine worship through their dedication or consecration, be they immovable, e.g., church, or movable, e.g., chalice. They are to be treated reverently and are not to be used for profane or inappropriate use even if owned by private persons.[216]

The seriousness of the preceptive, indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalty obviously should correspond to the gravity of the delict (cc. 1344; 1349). At issue is deliberately putting such objects to profane, common, or sordid use for a time contrary to their cultic orientation. The sacred character of the object, the offender's sacrilegious intent, and possible scandal of the faithful are to be considered in assessing imputability.

Unlawful Alienation of Church Property[217]

Canon 1377 — A person who alienates ecclesiastical goods without the prescribed permission is to be punished with a just penalty.

A concern for fiscal accountability in administering church resources gives rise to possible penalties for those deliberately violating the norms on alienating ecclesiastical goods (c. 1257, §1) by not obtaining the requisite permission of the competent authority.[218] What is envisioned is transferring the ownership of goods constituting the stable patrimony of a public juridic person (c. 116, §1).

The current law leaves the determination of the seriousness of the delict up to the competent penal authority. Theoretically any Catholic can be liable to the preceptive, indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalty envisioned here (cc. 1344; 1349). However, practically speaking, the offender would probably be an authority figure administering the goods of a public juridic person and deliberately disregarding the norms on the aforementioned permission.[219] Nevertheless, inculpable ignorance of such norms, while not presumed (c. 15, §2), exempts one from penal imputability.

TITLE III
USURPATION OF ECCLESIASTICAL FUNCTIONS AND DELICTS IN THEIR EXERCISE [cc. 1378–1389][220]

While this title mentions both usurping ecclesiastical functions and delicts in their exercise, only one canon deals with such usurpation (c. 1381). Most canons penalize serious violations of

[215] Cf. CCEO 1441.

[216] However, the delict is not verified if church authorities have authorized the profane (non-sacral) but not sordid use of such objects, e.g., cc. 1210; 1212.

[217] Cf. CCEO 1449.

[218] On the alienation of church property, see cc. 1291–1296 esp. c. 1292 on such permission. On the property of religious, see c. 638, §3–§4.

[219] Such action by church administrators seems to be a breach of their fiduciary responsibilities (c. 1284) and may constitute an abuse of office warranting its privation (c. 1389, §1). For a possible, but probably unlikely, non-penal ecclesiastical action against one invalidly alienating ecclesiastical goods, see c. 1296.

[220] Besides the Münster commentary, see Borras, 178–189; Green, in CLSA Com, 924–927; Martin, in CLSGBI Com, 794–800; Rees, 452–467; various authors in Com Ex, 526–563.

public ecclesial trust especially regarding sacramental ministry.

Delicts involving the sacrament of penance are especially prominent, e.g., cc. 1378 on absolving an accomplice and simulating the sacrament, 1387 on solicitation in confession, and 1388 on the seal (secret) of confession.[221]

Absolution of Accomplice[222]

Canon 1378 — §1. A priest who acts against the prescript of can. 977 incurs a latae sententiae excommunication reserved to the Apostolic See.

Canon 1378 penalizes particularly serious eucharistic and penitential abuses violating the sacramental rights of believers (c. 213). The most serious delict meriting a reserved excommunication involves an authorized priest knowingly attempting to absolve his accomplice of either sex in an external sexual sin[223] (§ 1). Such an absolution is invalid except in danger of death, in which case it is valid even if another priest is available. The pastoral urgency of the situation is the prevailing legal consideration here.

To incur the penalty, the priest need not know the invalidity of such an absolution; it suffices that he knows he may not absolve his accomplice from their joint sexual sin. If the priest hears the confession but does not attempt to absolve his accomplice from the sexual sin or does not recognize the penitent as his accomplice, there is no delict. Sins other than the sexual sin in question do not fall under the invalidating and penal provisions.

The reason for these measures is the impropriety of the confessor's absolving one in whose sin he has shared whenever it occurred. This sinful complicity violates the integrity of the priest-penitent relationship, the fostering of which is a key value underlying the canons on penance. Furthermore, the faithful should be protected from being deceived when they seek the Church's sacramental ministry. The seriousness of the delict is clear because it is one of only five excommunications reserved to the Holy See. One may wonder, however, why only sexual sins are envisioned, since sinful complicity in other areas may be more ecclesially detrimental, e.g., collusion in unjust treatment of church workers.

Simulation of Eucharist/Penance[224]

§2. The following incur a latae sententiae penalty of interdict or, if a cleric, a latae sententiae penalty of suspension:

1° a person who attempts the liturgical action of the eucharistic sacrifice though not promoted to the sacerdotal order;

2° apart from the case mentioned in §1, a person who, though unable to give sacramental absolution validly, attempts to impart it or who hears sacramental confession.

§3. In the cases mentioned in §2, other penalties, not excluding excommunication, can be added according to the gravity of the delict.

Canon 1378, §2 mentions two violations of the rules on properly differentiating sacramental functions. Number one penalizes those who are not priests who violate canon 900, §l on the valid celebrant of the Eucharist. Such persons would have to recite the eucharistic prayer deliberately including the words of institution so that others would conclude erroneously that the Eucharist was being celebrated.[225]

[221] For various penalties outside Book VI prompted by a lack of professional accountability in ecclesiastical processes, see cc. 1457; 1470, §2; 1488–1489.

[222] Cf. CCEO 1457.

[223] On the difficulty of interpreting the phrase "sin against the sixth commandment of the Decalogue" used throughout the code, see the commentary on c. 1395, §2. For helpful reflections on c. 1378, see De Paolis, in Com Ex, 526–534.

[224] Cf. CCEO 1443.

[225] This sanction might apply to those involved in "feminist liturgies." See also c. 907 prohibiting deacons and laity from saying prayers and performing actions proper to the priest celebrant.

Number two penalizes those violating canons 965–975 on confessional faculties who deliberately attempt to impart sacramental absolution or simply pretend to hear confessions without such an attempt. In other words, the offender intentionally fosters the erroneous impression that penitents may be absolved of their sins.

This may rarely be a real issue, especially given the broad confessional faculties for priests (c. 967, §2). Furthermore, two other canons providing for valid absolution in certain pastoral contingencies are pertinent here, i.e., canon 144, §2 on common error or positive and probable doubt about such faculties and canon 976 on absolution in danger of death. In neither instance are the penalties specified here incurred.

Canon 1378 differentiates between clerics and lay people regarding the censure for such violations. Deacons in numbers one and two and priests without appropriate faculties in number two are subject to a latae sententiae suspension. Lay people incur a latae sententiae interdict.[226] Yet, to foster the aforementioned values, the offender may also be subject to other just penalties, including an excommunication, depending on the seriousness of the violation. This is the only discretionary excommunication in the code.

Other Sacramental Simulations[227]

Canon 1379 — In addition to the cases mentioned in can. 1378, a person who simulates the administration of a sacrament is to be punished with a just penalty.

A similar concern for liturgical integrity and the sacramental rights of believers underlies this generic canon penalizing a deliberately simulated or inauthentic celebration of sacraments other than penance and the Eucharist. For example, a lay health care minister attempts to anoint the sick (c. 1003, §1).[228]

The preceptive, indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalty provision indicates that the legislator views such violations as less serious than the preceding eucharistic and penitential violations given the ecclesial centrality of such sacraments (cc. 1344; 1349).

Simony and Sacraments[229]

Canon 1380 — A person who celebrates or receives a sacrament through simony is to be punished with an interdict or suspension.

Unlike its predecessor (CIC 727), the code does not define sacramental simony.[230] It means an explicit or implicit and externally manifest agreement whereby one party deliberately agrees to confer a sacrament on another in exchange for some temporal good, e.g., money or property. The delict essentially is the deliberate intent to equalize the spiritual and the temporal, i.e., to deal commercially in sacred things. However, this is not verified regarding the legally regulated offerings of the faithful for the celebration of the Eucharist or other sacraments (cc. 945–958; 1264).

Concerns about precluding irreverence toward the Church's salvific mysteries underlie these penalties for those involved in the simoniacal celebration or reception of the sacrament.[231] How-[226] See cc. 1041, 6° and 1044, §1, 3° declaring irregular for receiving or exercising orders one placing an act of episcopal or presbyteral orders while lacking the order.

[227] Cf. CCEO 1443.

[228] On simulating marital consent, see c. 1101. This means positively excluding marriage itself or one of its essential elements or properties (c. 1056).

[229] Cf. CCEO 1461. Unlike the Latin code, the Eastern code also penalizes the simoniacal provision of ecclesiastical office (CCEO 1462). On the invalidating effect of such a provision except for the papacy, see c. 149, §3; CCEO 946; Universi dominici gregis, 78.

[230] On different aspects of simony, see J. Abbo and J. Hannan, The Sacred Canons (St. Louis: B. Herder, 1952) 1: 723–733.

[231] See also the comparable c. 1385 on trafficking in Mass offerings.

ever, an arrangement for a third party to celebrate or receive a sacrament is not technically a delict.

The legislator envisions a preceptive (c. 1344), ferendae sententiae interdict or suspension for simoniacal celebration or reception of the sacraments. The former penalty may affect clerics and laity while the latter envisions only clerics.[232]

Usurpation of Ecclesiastical Office[233]

Canon 1381 — §1. Whoever usurps an ecclesiastical office is to be punished with a just penalty.

§2. Illegitimate retention of a function after its privation or cessation is equivalent to usurpation.

The realization of the Church's mission presupposes an orderly provision and exercise of various offices. Such order is seriously jeopardized by violations of the rules on their provision.[234] This is especially true for illegitimate attempts to assume an office on one's own initiative without the intervention of the competent authority even if such a claim is not recognized (§1). A preceptive, indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalty is warranted in such cases (cc. 1344; 1349).

The orderly transfer of authority crucial to ecclesial life is also impeded by individuals who deliberately and illegally retain a function (munus) after being deprived of it (§2)[235] or losing it, e.g., expiration of term, removal, or transfer.[236] A preceptive, indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalty is also envisioned for a former officeholder usurping a vacant office in such a fashion, e.g., a removed pastor refusing to leave the rectory and facilitate a smooth transition to his successor (cc. 1747, §1; 1344; 1349).

Unauthorized Episcopal Consecration[237]

Canon 1382 — A bishop who consecrates someone a bishop without a pontifical mandate and the person who receives the consecration from him incur a latae sententiae excommunication reserved to the Apostolic See.

This delict concerning a major violation of hierarchical communion was added during the revision of the original schema. Perhaps the increasingly intense Holy See–Archbishop Lefebvre conflict in the late 1970s and early 1980s especially influenced this development.[238] The present canon reflects the pope's central leadership role within the college of bishops, the notable ecclesial significance of the episcopal office, and the importance of close papal-episcopal relationships for orderly church government.[239] The seriousness of this violation is evident in its being one of only five latae sententiae excommunications reserved to the Holy See.

[232] The Eastern code views simony more seriously than its Latin counterpart. For the former distinguishes between simony regarding holy orders warranting deposition (dismissal) of the clerics involved, and the other sacraments requiring an appropriate penalty, possibly a major excommunication (CCEO 1461).

[233] Cf. CCEO 1462.

[234] Canons 146–183.

[235] Canons 196; 1336, §1, 2°; 1342, §2; 1389, §1; 1396.

[236] See cc. 184–196 on the loss of church office and cc. 1740–1752 on the removal and transfer of pastors.

[237] Cf. CCEO 1459, §1. The Eastern code differs from its Latin counterpart in two respects. The former speaks of a "mandate of the competent authority" rather than a "pontifical mandate" given varied Eastern episcopal selection procedures. Furthermore, the former does not reserve the major excommunication to the Holy See.

[238] However, on April 9, 1951 a Holy Office decree specified a latae sententiae excommunication for illegitimate episcopal consecrations in China after the Communist takeover had seriously impeded communications with the Holy See. See CLD 3, 649. For a thoughtful examination of such consecrations and the possible exemption from a penalty of those involved due to extreme governmental pressure, see G. King, "The Catholic Church in China: A Canonical Evaluation," J 49 (1989) 69–94.

[239] On the pope's central leadership role within the episcopal college, see cc. 330–331; 336. For the pontifical mandate required prior to an episcopal consecration, see cc. 1013 and 377, §1. Also relevant are the new bishop's obligatory profession of faith and oath of fidelity to the Apostolic See (c. 380).

If the consecration is valid, both the principal consecrating bishop and the consecrated bishop engaging knowingly and freely in the episcopal consecration liturgy without the pontifical mandate are subject to the latae sententiae excommunication. Co-consecrating bishops technically do not commit the delict of consecrating without a mandate since their complicity is not necessary theologically or canonically for the validity of the consecration (cc. 18; 1329, §2). However, if they participate knowingly and freely, they may be subject to a latae sententiae excommunication for schism (c. 751).[240]

This and the following canon are the only two canons explicitly penalizing bishops although theoretically they could commit most of the delicts specified in Book VI.[241]

Illicit Presbyteral or Diaconal Ordination[242]

Canon 1383 — A bishop who, contrary to the prescript of can. 1015, ordains without legitimate dimissorial letters someone who is not his subject is prohibited for a year from conferring the order. The person who has received the ordination, however, is ipso facto suspended from the order received.

This is the other canon explicitly penalizing a bishop. Without explanation it appeared first in the 1980 schema. The canon attempts to protect the right of the faithful to competent ministry by ensuring appropriate accountability in admitting candidates to the diaconate and the priesthood. An ordaining bishop other than a candidate's proper ordinary (cc. 1016; 1019) presumably does not know the candidate as well as the latter. Accordingly, dimissorial letters testifying to the candidate's suitability for ordination (cc. 1050–1051) are to be forwarded by the proper ordinary to the ordaining bishop.

If the latter knowingly ordains the candidate without such dimissorials (c. 1015), he may not confer the order[243] for a year. This is the only latae sententiae expiatory penalty in Book VI. Only such penalties, unlike censures, can be incurred for a specified time (c. 1336, §1). While the penalty automatically ceases after the year has elapsed, if the bishop seeks its remission sooner, the pope or his delegate must intervene (c. 1405, §1, 3°).

The candidate knowingly receiving diaconate or priesthood without proper dimissorials is subject to a latae sententiae suspension from exercising the order in question until he ceases being contumacious.

Other Instances of Illegitimate Sacred Ministry

Canon 1384 — In addition to the cases mentioned in cann. 1378–1383, a person who illegitimately performs a priestly function or another sacred ministry can be punished with a just penalty.

Despite criticism during the revision process of the sweeping, rather unfocused character of this canon[244] and canon 1389 on abuse of office, they are restated unchanged in the code.

[240] The latae sententiae excommunication of Archbishop Lefebvre for consecrating without a pontifical mandate and the similar penalty for schism of his co-consecrator were formally declared by the CFB on July 1, 1988. See Origins 18 (1988) 151. On the establishment of the papal commission Ecclesia Dei to reconcile members and associates of the Lefebvre-inspired Priestly Fraternity of St. Pius X, see John Paul II, aplett Ecclesia Dei adflicta, July 7, 1988, Origins 18 (1988) 149–152. For pertinent documents on the Lefebvre affair, see O. Bucci, "Lo scisma di Lefebvre," Apol 61 (1988) 529–555.

[241] J. Huels, "The Correction and Punishment of a Diocesan Bishop," J 49 (1989) 507–542. Only the pope or his delegate may judge bishops in penal matters (c. 1405, §1, 3°).

[242] Cf. CCEO 1459, §2.

[243] A strict interpretation (c. 18) of the singular Latin term ordinem means that the bishop is prohibited from conferring only the order in question and not all orders as Martin affirms (797).

[244] This canon raises questions about the relevance of the basic Christian right not to be penalized except according to law (c. 221, §3). How can one defend oneself when the legislator so minimally articulates the profile of the delict? The judge or ordinary conducting the penal process assumes an unduly significant determinative role here.

Two significant values must be considered in interpreting both canons. First of all, the faithful have a right to expect ministerial accountability from clerics[245] occupying positions of public trust. Second, such ministers deserve a clear description of their responsibilities lest they be uncertain about the Church's expectations of them. They also have a right not to be subject to arbitrary penal discretion, which may significantly restrict their exercise of office and impair their reputation. Accordingly, precise norms on ministerial accountability should be articulated as far as possible, reflecting both the code's expectations and possibly more detailed particular law provisions given local pastoral circumstances.[246]

The canon specifies a discretionary, indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalty for illegitimately exercising the sacred ministry in areas other than those specified in canons 1378–1383. Hence, such violations are hardly viewed as seriously as the delicts addressed in those canons. Serious penalties such as censures are generally to be avoided, and perpetual penalties such as deprivation of office are prohibited (c. 1349). Furthermore, the penalty may also be tempered or replaced by a penance (cc. 1343; 1340).

Trafficking in Mass Offerings

Canon 1385 — A person who illegitimately makes a profit from a Mass offering is to be punished with a censure or another just penalty.

A need to foster reverence for the Eucharist and preclude the commercializing of sacred realities[247] accounts for this generically formulated canon penalizing trafficking in Mass offerings. Such "trafficking" means profiting unlawfully from the money or goods received for the celebration of Mass. With due regard for the legitimacy of such offerings (c. 945), this canon seems to penalize deliberate violations of the following canons among others: canon 947 prohibiting any appearance of trafficking in or trading Mass offerings and canon 948 requiring that as many Masses be celebrated as offerings are accepted, thereby prohibiting the illegitimate accumulation of such offerings.[248] The present canon also seems to apply to canon 955, §l. The latter requires that in transferring Mass offerings the entire sum received is to be forwarded unless any excess over the offering determined by law or custom is clearly intended to benefit the recipient of the original offerings.

The preceptive, ferendae sententiae censure or other just penalty for various violations is to be proportionate to their seriousness, e.g., risk of "scandalizing" the faithful and damage to the institutional Church (cc. 1344; 1349). Presumably priests are normally envisioned as possible violators of the pertinent canons. However, lay administrators of pious causes might seriously violate their ecclesial trust regarding the disposition of such offerings (c. 956).

Bribery of Church Official[249]

Canon 1386 — A person who gives or promises something so that someone who exercises a function in the Church will do or omit something illegitimately is to be punished with a just penalty; likewise, the one who accepts such gifts or promises.

An understandable concern for integrity in exercising ecclesiastical office underlies this canon, which penalizes deliberate attempts to influence ecclesiastical officials to act illegally by doing or omitting something. Such deliberate efforts to subvert the faithful discharging of ecclesiastical [245] The references to a "priestly function" or another "sacred ministry" seem to restrict the canon's applicability to clerics (c. 207, §1) although numerous lay persons fulfill various ecclesiastical functions and ministries.

[246] Green, "Penal Law Revisited," 197–198.

[247] Such concerns underlie the provisions on Mass offerings in cc. 945–958.

[248] See CFC, decr Mos iugiter, February 22, 1991, AAS 83 (1991) 443–446. English translation in Origins 20 (1991) 705–706.

[249] Cf. CCEO 1463.

responsibilities might occasion a betrayal of public ecclesial trust.

The delict requires a definite link between the gift (e.g., cash) or promise of a future gift (e.g., stock options) and a desired future illegal course of action or inaction. However, payment of an officeholder after such illegal activity does not constitute a delict, however morally questionable. The just penalty must be imposed even if the attempted bribery fails and the officeholder does not break the law, e.g., by violating appropriate chancery secrecy (c. 471, 2°).[250]

Canon 1386 provides for a preceptive (c. 1344), indeterminate (c. 1349), ferendae sententiae penalty for the one bribing a church official (active bribery) as well as the official accepting the bribe, whether or not it leads to illegal behavior (passive bribery). Obviously any believer could be guilty of active bribery, while only an officeholder can be guilty of passive bribery. Furthermore, the bribed officeholder may commit another delict if the illegal activity itself constitutes a delict, e.g., various tribunal violations in c. 1457, §1.

Solicitation in Confession[251]

Canon 1387 — A priest who in the act, on the occasion, or under the pretext of confession solicits a penitent to sin against the sixth commandment of the Decalogue is to be punished, according to the gravity of the delict, by suspension, prohibitions, and privations; in graver cases he is to be dismissed from the clerical state.

Concerns about the integrity of the priest-penitent relationship underlie this canon on solicitation, the following one on the confessional seal, and canon 1378 punishing absolution of an accomplice and other penitential violations.

There are some noteworthy differences between the present canon and the 1917 code, which obliged the solicited penitent to denounce the offending priest (CIC 904) and penalized both the soliciting priest and the penitent knowingly failing to denounce him (CIC 2368).

First of all, the current law on penance neither obliges the solicited penitent to denounce the soliciting priest nor requires another confessor to advise the one solicited of such an obligation.

Second, unlike the 1917 code, the present canon describes the circumstances of solicitation even if not its precise meaning. It is a deliberate invitation by the priest to commit a serious sin against the sixth commandment.[252] The delict could happen during the sacramental celebration, immediately before or after it, or in a setting in which the penitent could reasonably expect the hearing of his or her confession.

The delict is essentially the solicitation itself, and the penitent need not necessarily welcome the priest's abusive sexual overture. Furthermore, the delict might also be verified if the solicited sexual activity involves the penitent and a third party, not necessarily the priest and the penitent.

Third, like the canons on penance, the present canon does not refer to the penitent knowingly failing to denounce an offending priest. The code penalizes only the soliciting priest according to the seriousness of the delict. While the ferendae sententiae penalty is obligatory (c. 1344), the penal authority may impose a suspension (censure), prohibitions (c. 1336, §1, 3°), and/or privations (c. 1336, §1, 2°) (expiatory penalties). The potential gravity of the situation is clear, since in more serious cases the priest is to be dismissed from the clerical state.[253]

Penal authorities should proceed very cautiously here, particularly because of the vulnerable situation [250] See also several canons on tribunal discipline addressing similar concerns, cc. 1488, §1 and 1489 on possible penalties for advocates and procurators for similar offenses. A related non-penal canon 1456 prohibits judges and other tribunal officials from accepting gifts on the occasion of a trial.

[251] Cf. CCEO 1458.

[252] However questionable, the law envisions only sexual sins. See c. 1378, §1.

[253] This is the only canon on clerical dismissal that speaks in obligatory terms (dimittatur).

of the priest,[254] who is bound by the seal of confession and hence is somewhat impaired in defending his integrity. Should a priest be denounced, pertinent Holy See instructions are to be followed.[255]

In this general connection, canon 982 binds one making a false denunciation of solicitation in confession to retract it formally and repair any damage done before being absolved. Furthermore, canon 1390, §1 subjects the false denunciator to the latae sententiae penalties of interdict and possibly suspension if he is a cleric. Both canons primarily envision protecting the innocent priest, whose reputation (c. 220) and ministerial effectiveness could be seriously jeopardized.

Violation of Confessional Seal[256]

Canon 1388 — §1. A confessor who directly violates the sacramental seal incurs a latae sententiae excommunication reserved to the Apostolic See; one who does so only indirectly is to be punished according to the gravity of the delict.

§2. An interpreter and the others mentioned in can. 983, §2 who violate the secret are to be punished with a just penalty, not excluding excommunication.

Traditionally one of the most severely penalized delicts has been the violation of the confessional seal because of the serious breach of the priest-penitent relationship. The sacramental seal is the strict and inviolable obligation of keeping secret whatever has been related to the confessor to obtain absolution, the revelation of which would render the sacrament odious and onerous.

If the penitent and the sin are easily known from the confessor's deliberate revealing of such information, there is a direct violation of the seal, punishable by a latae sententiae excommunication. However, there is no delict if the confessor honestly believes such information is available from extra-confessional sources. Direct betrayal of the penitent's trust (c. 983, §1)[257] is very serious, since it is one of only five excommunications reserved to the Holy See (CDF in external forum; SP in internal forum).[258]

However, if there is only a danger that the penitent's identity and the sin will be revealed, there is an indirect violation of the seal, to be punished according to the seriousness of the confessor's indiscretion (§l; c. 1344).

While the canon primarily concerns the confessor, given his key ministerial role, occasionally others, such as interpreters or bystanders (cc. 983, §2; 990), may know the contents of a confession. If they deliberately violate its secrecy (not technically the seal), they are subject to a preceptive, indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalty (§2; cc. 1344; 1349). Although the code here does not distinguish between direct and indirect violations, the penalty should correspond to the seriousness of the violation. In particularly serious cases (e.g., a direct violation) an unreserved excommunication may be warranted.

Some post-1983 code developments pertinent to the seal seem noteworthy. In 1988 the CDF with specific papal authorization decreed a latae sententiae excommunication for anyone deliberately [254] A priest does not have to be an authorized confessor to commit this delict.

[255] For further information on the 1917 code, see Abbo-Hannan, 2:30–33. According to PB 52, the CDF is exclusively competent in penal matters regarding the sacrament of penance which are brought to its attention. The investigation of solicitation still seems regulated by an unpublished 1962 Holy Office instruction, which is to be preserved in the diocesan secret archives.

[256] Cf. CCEO 1456.

[257] If the penitent is not betrayed and permits the confessor to reveal certain confessional information, there is no delict. On this delicate issue calling for extreme caution, see D. Brewer, "The Right of a Penitent to Release the Confessor from the Seal: Considerations in Canon Law and in American Law," J 54 (1994) 424–476. However, the confessor may not testify about confessional knowledge in a church process although the penitent requests such testimony (c. 1550, §2, 2°).

[258] On possible questions regarding a direct violation suggested by an October 24, 1983 letter Pro memoria of SP, see CLD 11, 51.

using technical instruments to record and/or publish in the mass media anything said in sacramental confession by the confessor or the penitent, real or feigned. The law, which took effect on September 13, 1988, seems to have been prompted by the outrageous public abuse of the priest-penitent relationship for commercial purposes.[259]

Recently a controversy erupted in Oregon when the district attorney of Lane County authorized the taping of a prisoner's confession in the county jail without his or his confessor's knowledge. This act was declared illegal on January 27, 1997 by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.[260]

Finally, certain Church-State tensions in the United States have been occasioned by conflicts between the canons on the confessional seal and civil reporting statutes binding civil and ecclesiastical authority figures in alleged sex abuse cases especially involving minors.[261]

Abuse of Authority/Negligence[262]

Canon 1389 — §1. A person who abuses an ecclesiastical power or function is to be punished according to the gravity of the act or omission, not excluding privation of office, unless a law or precept has already established the penalty for this abuse.

§2. A person who through culpable negligence illegitimately places or omits an act of ecclesiastical power, ministry, or function with harm to another is to be punished with a just penalty.

A fundamental conciliar theme restated in Sacrae disciplinae leges is that church authority must be exercised in a spirit of ecclesial service. This explains the present canon penalizing both abuse of power or function (§1) and culpable official negligence damaging others (§2). The latter provision was added during the revision of the original schema.

While such abuse is not defined, presumably it means deliberately exercising the power of orders or jurisdiction or some other ecclesiastical function in a fashion contrary to its basic ecclesial purpose. For example, a pastor might employ parish funds for his own personal use rather than responsibly stewarding the parish financial patrimony (cc. 532; 1284).

Such a concern to preclude abuse by the Church's public servants is laudable. However, the earlier comments on canon 1384 are relevant here. Canon 1389, §1 is formulated in such a sweeping, generic fashion that it seems difficult to implement practically. The legislator seems to leave the articulation of the delict exclusively to the penalizing judge or ordinary, which notably expands their competence beyond applying existing law. Furthermore, because the canon is so vaguely articulated, it raises concerns about the ability of the defendant to exercise the right of defense. This paragraph presumably provides the basis for a criminal action against church authorities whenever the code does not explicitly penalize a given abuse of office.

[259] CDF, decr Urbis et orbis, AAS 80 (1988) 1367. See also c. 1369 on media attacks against the Church and religion.

[260] See, for example, "A Prisoner's Secretly Taped Sacramental Confession," Origins 26/3 (June 6, 1996) 33; 35–36; "Recording of Prisoner's Sacramental Confession Violated Rights," Origins 26/33 (February 6, 1997) 537; 539–545.

[261] See M. Fitzgerald, The Sacramental Seal of Confession in Relation to Selected Child Abuse Statutes in the Civil Law of the United States (Rome: Gregorian University, 1991); D. Ioppolo, "Civil Law and Confidentiality: Implications for the Church," in idem et al., Confidentiality in the United States: A Legal-Canonical Study (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1988) 3–48; idem, "Appendix: Statutes and Court Decisions of the Fifty States," in Confidentiality, 49–92; R. Stake, "Grounding the Priest-Penitent Privilege in American Law," in Confidentiality, 145–162.

[262] Cf. CCEO 1464. In the context of abuse of office another Eastern penal canon must be mentioned; it is the only one explicitly said to bind Latin Catholics. Canon 1465 requires an appropriate penalty for one exercising an office, ministry, or function who presumes to induce a believer to change affiliation to another sui iuris or autonomous church, Latin or Eastern. At times the law permits such a transfer of affiliation (CCEO 29–38; cc. 111–112). However, CCEO 1465 prohibits proselytism or deliberately manipulating a person to abandon his or her religious heritage. See Pospishil Com, 118.

An equally generic and sweeping canon 1389, §2 penalizes culpable negligence in illegitimately placing or omitting an act of ecclesiastical power or function which damages others. This is the only canon in part two of Book VI where negligence (culpa), not malice (dolus), grounds penal imputability (c. 1321, §2). For example, an ordinary may neglect to conduct a preliminary investigation of an alleged delict (c. 1717). This may damage its possible victims and perhaps the Church itself, especially but not exclusively if the Church is found civilly liable because of such negligence.

The legislator's interest in precluding the culpably negligent exercise of office is clearly legitimate. However, this paragraph also raises some of the aforementioned questions about the legislator–judge/ordinary relationship and the right of defense.

Both paragraphs of the canon need to be interpreted strictly. Furthermore, the penalizing authority needs to proceed especially carefully, clearly articulating the due cause(s) for the criminal action. Ample provision must also be made for exercising the right of defense. The necessary cautions indicated in connection with canon 1399 are equally relevant here.

Only those exercising ecclesiastical power or some function are possible offenders here. The legislator envisions a gradated scale of preceptive, indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalties for abuse of office (§1) depending on the seriousness of the delict (cc. 1344; 1349). In especially grave situations one may even be deprived of office (c. 196); only this canon and canon 1396 on serious violations of residence explicitly mention such a penalty.

In cases of culpable negligence (§2) involving the illegitimate exercise of office, the legislator also provides for a preceptive, indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalty (cc. 1344; 1349). Obviously the extent and nature of the damage to another are the prime criteria for determining an appropriate penalty.

A possible separate contentious action for damages (cc. 1729–1731) may be warranted, whatever the extent of penal imputability, for anyone illegitimately damaging someone by a juridic act or any other act placed with malice or negligence must repair such damage (c. 128).

TITLE IV
THE CRIME OF FALSEHOOD
[cc. 1390–1391][263]

Violations of Reputation[264]

Canon 1390 — §1. A person who falsely denounces before an ecclesiastical superior a confessor for the delict mentioned in can. 1387 incurs a latae sententiae interdict and, if he is a cleric, also a suspension.

The first canon in this brief title considers delicts involving violations of personal reputation. This issue was placed very forcefully before the American Catholic consciousness in the mid-1990s when a young man falsely accused the late Cardinal Joseph Bernardin of sexual abuse. The second canon addresses violations of the integrity necessary in public ecclesial life, especially but not exclusively during ecclesiastical procedures.[265]

The first two paragraphs of canon 1390 deal with three violations of a person's reputation (c. 220), not all of which are viewed equally seriously.

The most serious delict here is the deliberate false accusation of a confessor of solicitation in [263] Besides the Münster commentary, see Borras, 189–190; A. Calabrese, in Com Ex, 564–572; Green, in CLSA Com, 928; Martin, in CLSGBI Com, 801–802; Rees, 467–470.

[264] The Eastern code differs somewhat from its Latin counterpart in dealing with violations of reputation. The former treats of the issue in two canons rather than one canon. One canon addresses a calumnious injuring of another or seriously impairing another's reputation (CCEO 1452). The other punishes false accusations of an ecclesiastical delict, especially if the accused is a confessor, cleric, religious, or lay person holding a church office (CCEO 1454). A separate sacramental canon requires a formal retraction prior to absolving one falsely accusing a confessor of solicitation in confession (CCEO 731).

[265] See also c. 1368 on perjury.

confession (§1; see c. 1387). Given the serious violation of the priest-penitent relationship, the solicitation should be denounced to the competent ecclesiastical authority although no canon explicitly requires such a denunciation. This authority figure is likely the accused confessor's ordinary, who must investigate probable allegations of delicts (c. 1717, §1). Yet it might be the ordinary of the place of the alleged delict. Furthermore, the judicial vicar, the promoter of justice, or another official might be authorized to address such complaints.

With due regard for the obligation to denounce a soliciting confessor, a deliberately false accusation can seriously harm the reputation and future ministry of an innocent confessor, who is especially impaired in defending himself due to the obligation of the confessional seal. Hence, the competent authority must be very cautious in accepting such denunciations. Furthermore the legislator specifies a latae sententiae interdict for anyone so harming the confessor. If the false accuser is a fellow cleric, he is also liable to a latae sententiae suspension.

The legislator's concern for restoring the innocent confessor's reputation is clear from canon 982, which prohibits absolving one confessing the sin of false denunciation before the penitent formally retracts it and is prepared to repair any possible damages (cf. c. 1390, §3).

§2. A person who offers an ecclesiastical superior any other calumnious denunciation of a delict or who otherwise injures the good reputation of another can be punished with a just penalty, not excluding a censure.

§3. A calumniator can also be forced to make suitable reparation.

Canon 1390 deals with other deliberate violations of the right to a good reputation (§2; c. 220). Such violations, however problematic, do not have such grievous institutional implications as the false accusation of a confessor. Accordingly, a discretionary, ferendae sententiae, just penalty or possibly a censure may be imposed depending on the seriousness of the damage caused by the delict (cc. 1343; 1349). Two possible profiles of a delict are indicated: 1) a calumnious, or false, denunciation to a competent ecclesiastical superior of a delict other than confessional solicitation and 2) a deliberate, even if non-calumnious, injuring of another's reputation without any reference to a delict.[266]

At times the offender may be required to make restitution for harming the victim (§3). This would likely occur in connection with the remission of the penalty as a sign of good faith. The nature of the restitution, monetary or otherwise, will depend on the nature of the damages suffered by the victim.

In this general context one should also note a possible contentious action for damages, which can be pursued independently of or along with a criminal action (cc. 1729–1731).

Falsification of Documents[267]

Canon 1391 — The following can be punished with a just penalty according to the gravity of the delict:

1° a person who produces a false public ecclesiastical document, who changes, destroys, or conceals an authentic one, or who uses a false or altered one;

2° a person who uses another false or altered document in an ecclesiastical matter;

3° a person who asserts a falsehood in a public ecclesiastical document.

Documents of various types, both public and private (c. 1540), are of particular ecclesial significance, e.g., clarifying the status of physical or juridic persons. Such documents are admissible as proof in any trial, contentious or penal, in accord with the canons (cc. 1539–1546).

[266] For a Vancouver case involving an action for damages based on an alleged violation of reputation, see P. Lopez-Gallo, "Case of Rights and Defamation," J 49 (1989) 286–302.

[267] Cf. CCEO 1455. Unlike the Latin code, this Eastern text is not subdivided into three numbers; furthermore, it envisions a preceptive, not a discretionary, penalty for various delicts involving falsifying documents.

This canon attempts to preclude injustice and protect the integrity of the Church's public life and procedures. It envisions possible penalties for various delicts involving deliberately tampering with public ecclesiastical documents (1°),[268] intentionally using other altered documents[269] in various ecclesiastical procedures (2°), as well as knowingly stating a falsehood in a public ecclesiastical document (3°).[270]

While the delicts in numbers two and three seem fairly clear, some clarifications may be helpful regarding the various forms of tampering with public ecclesiastical documents in number one. Such a document may be fabricated to convey the impression that it is authoritative, e.g., a letter of appointment. The content of an authentic document may be changed so that it distorts the author's intent, e.g., a report of preliminary penal investigation. A document may be destroyed, thereby making it unavailable to prospective readers. Furthermore, a document might be concealed temporarily or permanently so that it is inaccessible in a given process, e.g., a psychological report on marital capacity. Finally, a false or altered public ecclesiastical document might be used to support one's position in a given process.

While any penally liable Catholic may commit the delicts mentioned in numbers one and two, presumably only an officeholder may assert a falsehood in a public ecclesiastical document (3°). The delicts here seem less serious than other legal violations, since only a discretionary, indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalty is provided (cc. 1343; 1349). This is to be assessed in light of the seriousness of the injustice and the violation of the integrity of the ecclesiastical institution. A church officeholder might be punished more severely than other believers due to the breach of institutional trust. The penalty may be imposed even if the offender does not achieve the purpose(s) of such varied deceptions, e.g., obtaining of an annulment.

TITLE V
DELICTS AGAINST SPECIAL OBLIGATIONS
[cc. 1392–1396][271]

Except for a generic text on violations of obligations imposed by penalties (c. 1393), the following delicts concern violations of clerical or religious obligations related to their significant ecclesial role (cc. 1392; 1394–1396).[272] Since penalties are envisioned for violations of the following obligations, they are presumably viewed as somewhat more serious than other obligations. However, delicts elsewhere in Book VI involve violations of other obligations.[273]

Prohibited Business Activities[274]

Canon 1392 — Clerics or religious who exercise a trade or business contrary to the prescripts of the canons are to be punished according to the gravity of the delict.

This canon penalizes violations of canons 286 and 672 prohibiting unauthorized clerics and religious from intentionally conducting business (negotiatio) or trade (mercatura). Given the difficulty of clarifying precisely what constitutes such pro-

[268] See, for example, c. 428, §2 prohibiting the diocesan administrator or others from removing or destroying any curial documents or from changing anything in them, whether personally or through another.

[269] This could be a public civil document (c. 1540, §2), e.g., a forged marriage certificate, or a private document (c. 1540, §3), e.g., a premarital letter indicating a prospective spouse's views on children, fidelity, or permanence.

[270] See c. 1368 on perjury.

[271] Besides the Münster commentary, see Borras, 191–194; Di Mattia, in Com Ex, 573–584; Green, in CLSA Com, 929–930; Martin, in CLSGBI Com, 802–807; Rees, 471–479.

[272] On clerical obligations and rights, see cc. 273–289; on the obligations and rights of religious institutes and their members, see cc. 662–672; for societies of apostolic life, see c. 739.

[273] For example, for various sexual offenses of priests, see cc. 1378, §1 and 1387.

[274] Cf. CCEO 1466.

hibited commercial activities, the penal canon is formulated somewhat generically, comparable to the aforementioned substantive canons.[275]

The code seeks to foster an appropriate simplicity of life for clerics (c. 282, §1) and poverty of life for religious (c. 600) while assuring their serious ministerial commitment. This might be notably compromised by a significant investment of time and energy in commercial pursuits. However, since such pursuits may be necessary at times, canon 286 empowers the competent ecclesiastical authority to permit them.

Canon 1392 provides for an obligatory, indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalty depending on the seriousness of the delict, i.e., the deliberate failure to seek appropriate authorization for business or trade (cc. 1344; 1349). Presumably the code envisions an habitual involvement in such prohibited commercial ventures.

The canon envisions as possible offenders clerics or "religious." However, permanent deacons are subject neither to the prohibition of canon 286 nor the penalty specified here unless particular law (e.g., diocesan norms) provides otherwise (c. 288). Furthermore, the penalty binds only clerics and non-clerical members of religious institutes (see c. 18), not non-clerical members of secular institutes or societies of apostolic life.[276]

Violation of Penal Obligations[277]

Canon 1393 — A person who violates obligations imposed by a penalty can be punished with a just penalty.

This generic new provision pertinent to any penalty seems somewhat out of place in this title on violations of specifically clerical and religious obligations. It might fit better in title II on delicts against ecclesiastical authorities.

The canon attempts to foster the effectiveness of the penal system by indicating that one who deliberately disregards the obligations imposed by a penalty (cc. 1331–1333; 1336) may be liable to another just penalty for such contempt of church authority. Examples of disregarding obligations include continuing to discharge the functions of an office whose exercise has been prohibited or receiving sacraments from which one has been barred.

The present canon is similar to canon 1326, §1, 1°, which indicates as an imputability-aggravating factor the recidivism of one who commits a delict even after being penalized. The basic obligation of anyone subject to a penalty is to restore ecclesial communion (c. 209) by complying with the legitimate precepts of the penal authority. However, the opposite kind of behavior is penalized here. In a certain sense it indicates the Church's relative helplessness regarding an intransigent offender given its lack of coercive resources. The effectiveness of the Church's penal system significantly depends on the willingness of such offenders to observe its provisions.

Since the situations and attitudes of various offenders may vary notably, the present canon envisions a discretionary, indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalty, to be assessed in light of the seriousness of the offender's obstinacy (cc. 1343; 1349).

Violation of Celibacy[278]

Canon 1394 — §1. Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 194, §1, n. 3, a cleric who attempts marriage, even if only civilly, incurs a latae sententiae suspension. If he does not repent after being warned and continues to give scandal, he can be punished gradually by privations or even by dismissal from the clerical state.

§2. A perpetually professed religious who is not a cleric and who attempts marriage, even if only civilly, incurs a latae sententiae interdict, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 694.

[275] See the commentary on c. 286 for examples of prohibited business or trade.

[276] However, members of such societies are subject to an appropriate penalty in CCEO 1466.

[277] Cf. CCEO 1467.

[278] Cf. CCEO 1453, §2–§3.

One of the most serious obligations of most clerics (cc. 277, §1; 1037)[279] and all religious (c. 599) is observing perfect and perpetual continence (non-use of the sexual faculty) as well as celibacy, which prevents them from marrying. Canons 1087–1088 invalidate the attempted marriages[280] of clerics as well as members of religious institutes in perpetual (not temporary) vows. Married deacons may not remarry validly after the death of their spouses and continue their official ministry without a Holy See dispensation from canon 1087.[281]

If a cleric illegally attempts marriage, he incurs a latae sententiae suspension restricting his exercise of various ministerial functions (c. 1333).[282] One may wonder how realistic is the possibility of his giving up this new relationship, especially if children are involved. However, if after a formal warning the cleric contumaciously and scandalously persists in that relationship, he is liable to increasingly severe ferendae sententiae privations (c. 1336, §1, 2) including dismissal from the clerical state (§1).[283] This is one of the few delicts for which such a penalty is warranted.[284] Furthermore, by the law itself the cleric loses any ecclesiastical offices he may hold (c. 194, §1, 3°), yet the enforcement of this provision requires an authoritative declaration.

The non-clerical religious illegally attempting marriage incurs a latae sententiae interdict and, like the religious cleric, is also ipso facto dismissed from the religious institute given the radical incompatibility between the attempted marriage and one's religious commitment.[285] This dismissal is to be formally declared by the major superior with the council after gathering pertinent proofs of the attempted marriage (c. 694, §1, 2°–§2).

While canon 1394 does not explicitly refer to the partner of the above-mentioned cleric or religious, canon 1329, §2 on knowing and free complicity in a delict punished by a latae sententiae penalty is relevant here. Such a partner is a necessary accomplice, without whose cooperation there would be no delict. The partner of the cleric would be subject to a discretionary, ferendae sententiae penalty to be determined by the competent penal authority since she cannot incur a suspension. However, the partner of the non-clerical religious is subject to the same latae sententiae interdict. In assessing possible penalties, the penal authority needs to take cognizance of the norms on imputability (cc. 1323–1327), e.g., ignorance, grave fear, etc.

One might note briefly another administrative non-penal consequence of such a delict. A layman committing such a delict is irregular for receiving orders while a cleric is irregular for receiving further orders, e.g., a deacon vis-à-vis the priesthood (c. 1041, 3°). Such a cleric is also irregular for exercising the orders he has received (c. 1044, §1, 3°).

Various Violations of Clerical Continence[286]

Canon 1395 — §1. A cleric who lives in concubinage, other than the case mentioned in can. 1394, and a cleric who persists with scandal in another external sin against the sixth commandment of the Decalogue is to be punished by a suspension.

[279] An exception to the general rule of celibacy for Latin clerics is the married deacon (c. 1042, 1°).

[280] The code speaks technically about "attempting" marriage. This means that the cleric or religious may be mature enough to exchange naturally sufficient marriage consent, i.e., prescinding from church regulations. However, that consent is legally ineffective or not recognized by the Church because of the aforementioned marriage impediments.

[281] See June 6, 1997 circular letter of CDWDS in Origins 27/11 (August 28, 1997) 169; 171.

[282] See commentary on c. 1352.

[283] Interestingly enough, this is one of two instances where the Eastern code requires the deposition of a cleric (CCEO 1453, §2). The other is CCEO 1461 on the simoniacal conferral or reception of orders.

[284] The delict is viewed as so serious that the statute of limitations (prescription) for pursuing a criminal action is five years instead of the usual three years (c. 1362, §1, 2°).

[285] A strict interpretation of penal law means that the latae sententiae interdict here (c. 1394, §2) does not apply to non-clerical members of secular institutes or societies of apostolic life. However, they are ipso facto dismissed from the institute or society (cc. 729; 746).

[286] Cf. CCEO 1453, §1 and §3.

If he persists in the delict after a warning, other penalties can gradually be added, including dismissal from the clerical state.

§2. A cleric who in another way has committed an offense against the sixth commandment of the Decalogue, if the delict was committed by force or threats or publicly or with a minor below the age of sixteen years, is to be punished with just penalties, not excluding dismissal from the clerical state if the case so warrants.

A similar concern for an authentic observance of clerical[287] continence for the sake of the Kingdom prompts this canon penalizing other violations of that obligation[288] besides attempted marriage. Paragraph one treats of concubinage, an ongoing non-marital sexual relationship between a cleric and a woman, married or single. It also encompasses other scandalous, habitual, clerical sexual offenses with persons of either sex not entailing the exclusivity of concubinage.

A preceptive (c. 1344), ferendae sententiae suspension is envisioned initially, with subsequent increasingly severe penalties depending on the cleric's obstinate refusal to heed official warnings to change his scandalous behavior. The issue is quite serious since dismissal from the clerical state is possible in cases of notable intransigence. Furthermore, the statute of limitations (prescription) for pursuing a criminal action here and in most situations mentioned in the next paragraph is five years instead of the usual three years (c. 1362, §1, 2°).

While the canon does not explicitly refer to the cleric's accomplice in the ongoing sexual relationship, canon 1329, §1 on complicity in a delict punished by a ferendae sententiae penalty seems relevant. Such an accomplice is to be punished with a penalty comparable to suspension (e.g., interdict) or a less serious one depending on the level of imputability.

Paragraph two addresses certain occasional, non-habitual clerical sexual delicts,[289] which are especially serious if they are perpetrated publicly (i.e., in a public place), or with force, or with threats, or with a person of either sex under sixteen years of age.[290] These four criteria must be carefully considered in determining whether a delict has been committed. If any one of them is verified in an instance of external, seriously imputable, clerical sexual behavior, there may be a delict. In fact occasionally more than one of these criteria may be exemplified, e.g., the use of force or manipulation in sexual abuse of minors.

The issue of possibly diminished imputability is a critical one here, especially but not exclusively in cases of pedophilia. This means the experiencing of and acting upon recurrent, intense sexual urges and/or fantasies involving a prepubescent child for at least six months.[291] Church authorities [287] Unlike c. 1394, §2, which also dealt with non-clerical religious, the present canon deals solely with clerics, secular and "religious" of all types.

[288] Besides concubinage, the present canon speaks generically of an external sin "against the sixth commandment of the Decalogue." See also cc. 977 and 1378, §1 (absolution of an accomplice) and c. 1387 (solicitation in confession). Regrettably, the exact meaning of this phrase is not entirely clear. It may mean technically adultery or sexual delicts involving clerics and married women. However, it is also used as a circumlocution for other types of sexual misconduct, heterosexual or homosexual, e.g., rape, fornication, or incest. For a thoughtful examination of this complex issue, including the contemporary problems of sexual harassment, exploitation, and abuse, see J. Provost, "Offenses against the Sixth Commandment: Toward a Canonical Analysis of Canon 1395," J 55 (1995) 632–663.

[289] Interestingly enough, the Eastern code penalizes only ongoing sexual delicts (c. 1395, §1), not the occasional sexual delict (c. 1395, §2).

[290] The age of "minors" here has been temporarily raised to eighteen years of age in the United States due to a special Holy See modification of the code for five years beginning April 25, 1994. On November 30, 1998 John Paul II extended this provision for ten years until April 25, 2009.

[291] For further discussion of the psychological implications of pedophilia, ephebophilia, and other sexual disorders involving clerics see P. Cimbolic, "The Identification and Treatment of Sexual Disorders and the Priesthood," J 52 (1992) 598–614.

should exercise great care in developing policies in this delicate area, and consultation with psychological and other experts is imperative before disciplinary or penal measures are taken.[292]

Such authorities must be sensitive to the diverse situations of clerics accused of sexual misconduct, which require different legal-pastoral approaches. For example, the cleric accused of recent repeated sexual abuse of children or minors seems notably different from the one accused of one or possibly several sexual offenses many years ago who has sought treatment and subsequently exercised the ministry laudably. Furthermore, the cleric engaging in consensual sexual activity with another adult, however morally objectionable, is different from the one forcefully engaging in nonconsensual sexual activity with a minor or another vulnerable person such as a counselee. Complicity in the delict is to be assessed in terms of the free, deliberate sexual involvement of an individual with the guilty cleric (c. 1329, §1).

At times the most beneficial approach may be pastoral and therapeutic in character rather than penal, especially if the cleric's imputability is notably diminished. Concerns about his dignity, well-being, and future ministerial options[293] are key legal-pastoral considerations. However, one must also seriously consider the significant damage possibly done to the ecclesial community and certain individuals within it, especially the most vulnerable. Furthermore, there may be legitimate community outrage regarding the serious betrayal of trust involved in clerical sex abuse of minors. This may heighten the imputability of the offending cleric (c. 1326, §1, 2°).[294]

Somewhat surprisingly, the code does not seem to view such delicts as seriously as other violations of clerical continence since, initially at least, the canon envisions only obligatory, indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalties (c. 1344; 1349) rather than the suspension indicated in canons 1394, §1 and 1395, §1.[295] Furthermore, possible civil penalties such as incarceration may possibly preclude the need for canonical penalties if the various purposes of the penal system have been otherwise achieved (c. 1344, 2°). Nevertheless, if such penal and other remedial measures do not repair the ecclesial damage, the seriously imputable cleric may be dismissed from the clerical state, another illustration of the seriousness of this delict.[296]

[292] A helpful resource in this area are two volumes entitled Restoring Trust, prepared in 1994–1995 by the NCCB Ad Hoc Committee on Sexual Abuse. They review various diocesan sexual abuse policies, report on various treatment/evaluation centers, and provide useful articles on various aspects of the clergy sex abuse issue. See also From Pain to Hope, Report from the CCCB Ad Hoc Committee on Child Sexual Abuse (Ottawa: Publications Service CCCB, 1992).

[293] In assessing the possible reintegration of such a cleric in ministry, see, for example, F. Morrisey, "The Pastoral and Juridical Dimensions of Dismissal from the Clerical State and of Other Penalties for Acts of Sexual Misconduct," CLSAP (1991) 221–239, esp. 237–239.

[294] See Canonical Delicts Involving Sexual Misconduct and Dismissal from the Clerical State (Canonical Delicts) (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1995). Pages 46–47 contain a helpful bibliography on clerical sexual abuse. See also J 52/2 (1992) containing articles by canonists Beal (642–683) and Provost (615–641) and psychologist Cimbolic (598–614) mentioned earlier.

[295] One must remember that the code was drafted and promulgated in the 1970s and early 1980s, somewhat prior to the notable emergence of the scandal of clerical sex abuse of minors in the United States and elsewhere. At that time church authorities and canonists were much less aware than today of the broad and complex implications of this tragic development.

[296] Another example of the seriousness with which this delict is viewed in the United States is a change in the statute of limitations (prescription) for initiating a criminal action based on alleged sexual abuse of minors. The aforementioned special April 1994 Holy See norms (cf. supra, n. 290) modified c. 1362, §1, 2°, which normally provides for a five-year period after the commission of such a delict. For alleged delicts committed with minors under 18 years of age between April 25, 1994 and April 24, 1999, such a criminal action may be initiated until the minor celebrates his/her 28th birthday or one year has elapsed from the denunciation of the delict expedited prior to that 28th birthday. For alleged delicts committed with minors under 16 years of age (former rule) before April 25, 1994, such a criminal action may be initiated until the minor in question celebrates his/her 23rd birthday. See Canonical Delicts, 38–39. On

Finally, the delicts in canon 1395 are normally the basis for a mandatory dismissal of a religious cleric from his institute or society after an appropriate procedure (cc. 695; 729; 746). This is a separate issue from dismissal from the clerical state. However, somewhat surprisingly, the delicts mentioned in paragraph two may not necessarily require such a dismissal from the institute or society. The superior may decide that such action is not completely necessary since the correction of the member, the restitution of justice, and the reparation of scandal can be achieved otherwise.

Violation of Residence Obligation

Canon 1396 — A person who gravely violates the obligation of residence which binds by reason of ecclesiastical office is to be punished by a just penalty, not excluding, after a warning, even privation from office.

This provision penalizes those gravely violating the residence obligation attached to certain pastoral offices, e.g., bishop,[297] pastor,[298] or parochial vicar.[299] This traditional obligation seeks to ensure the availability of clerics to the communities which they are called to serve. The obligation is especially serious given the conciliar emphasis on authority as service, a value reaffirmed in Sacrae disciplinae leges. Furthermore, the code highlights certain basic spiritual rights of the faithful, such as being nurtured in word and sacrament (c. 213) and educated in the faith (c. 217).

The present canon initially envisions a preceptive (c. 1344), indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalty for such illegitimate absence from ministry, which does not seem especially serious. However, if, even after a warning, the cleric obstinately and habitually is absent from the community he is called to serve, he may be deprived of his office.[300] Key concerns would be the frequency, duration, and pastorally detrimental implications of such absence. Normally such indeterminate penalty delicts do not permit perpetual penalties (c. 1349). However, this exception to the rule is one of only two delicts entailing possible privation of office (see c. 1389, §1). Given its notable impact on the offender's life and ministry, such a privation of office presupposes a judicial penal process (c. 1342, §2).

TITLE VI
DELICTS AGAINST HUMAN LIFE AND FREEDOM
[cc. 1397–1398][301]

The two canons here deal with ecclesiastical delicts with civil law implications although unfortunately there is more statutory diversity in various countries regarding abortion (c. 1398) than regarding the other violations of human life, integrity, and freedom (c. 1397).

Physical Violations of Human Life, Integrity, and Freedom[302]

Canon 1397 — A person who commits a homicide or who kidnaps, detains, mutilates, or gravely

November 30, 1998 John Paul II extended the aforementioned norms for ten years until April 25, 2009.

[297] Canons 395 (diocesan bishops) and 410 (coadjutor and auxiliary bishops).

[298] Canons 533 (individual pastors) and 543, §2, 1° (team ministry).

[299] Canon 550.

[300] The diocesan bishop would penalize pastors and parochial vicars. The metropolitan would report a problem involving a suffragan to the Holy See, which is to take appropriate action; if the metropolitan is at fault, the senior suffragan would inform the Holy See (c. 395, §4). Nothing is said explicitly about a seriously delinquent coadjutor or auxiliary bishop; presumably the diocesan bishop would report the matter to the Holy See for appropriate action, for only the pope or his delegate can judge bishops in penal cases (c. 1405, §1, 3°).

[301] Besides the Münster commentary, see also Borras, 194–196; Green, in CLSA Com, 930; Martin, in CLSGBI Com, 807–810; F. Pérez-Madrid, in Com Ex, 585–594; Rees, 479–485.

[302] See CCEO 1450, §1 (homicide) and 1451 (other violations of personal freedom and integrity). Also CCC, nn.

wounds a person by force or fraud is to be punished with the privations and prohibitions mentioned in can. 1336 according to the gravity of the delict. Homicide against the persons mentioned in can. 1370, however, is to be punished by the penalties established there.

With due regard for the civil ramifications of such violations of persons, the code also views them as significant ecclesiastical concerns. Nevertheless, realistically speaking, the competent civil authorities, rather than church officials, will likely deal with such criminal behavior initially, given its destructive societal impact. Accordingly, ecclesiastical and civil authorities should cooperate as much as possible given their presumed mutual interest in fostering the good of society.

There are several different profiles of a delict. The code presupposes freedom and deliberation on the part of the assailant or victimizer, whatever his or her intent, unless it is a case of legitimate self-defense or defense of another (see cc. 1323, §1, 5° and 1324, §1, 6°). The most serious delict involves the willful taking of life (homicide). However, the canon also penalizes serious violations of human freedom, e.g., kidnapping or forcible or fraudulent detention of an individual. The legislator also envisions certain notable violations of bodily integrity, e.g., forcible or fraudulent mutilation or serious wounding of a person.

The legislator views these delicts and abortion (c. 1398) as quite serious, since the statute of limitations (prescription) for initiating a criminal action is five years rather than the usual three years from the commission of the delict (c. 1362, §1, 2°).

The code generically requires ferendae sententiae privations (c. 1336, §1, 2°) and prohibitions (c. 1336, §1, 1°–3°) according to the gravity of the delict (c. 1344). They are much less severe than the corresponding civil penalties. This is one of very few canons generically requiring such expiatory penalties. Because of their irrevocable character, the "privations" are more serious than the "prohibitions" and must be imposed judicially.

The aforementioned delicts, however serious, technically do not warrant either a penal transfer of office (c. 1336, §1, 4°) or dismissal from the clerical state (c. 1336, §1, 5°). Nevertheless, in penalizing the killing of the pope, a bishop, cleric, or religious, the competent authority must apply canon 1370, including the possible dismissal of a cleric for an attack on the pope. The significant ecclesial status of such figures underlies this special provision.

Since ecclesiastical authorities may normally not be involved in initially penalizing such delicts, canon 1344, 2° may be relevant. In short, a distinctly canonical penalty may not be necessary, or a lighter penalty than that envisioned by the code or a penance (c. 1340) may be appropriate. This is true if the offender has reformed, repaired any scandal, and been sufficiently punished civilly. Obviously the exercise of such penal discretion presupposes a careful assessment of the seriousness of the delict and its detrimental ecclesial impact.

Finally, several implications of the aforementioned delicts are noteworthy. First of all, religious, members of secular institutes, and members of societies of apostolic life are to be dismissed from the institute or society after an appropriate process (cc. 695; 729; 746). Secondly, laymen or clerics who have committed voluntary homicide or mutilated another gravely and maliciously are irregular either for receiving orders (c. 1041, 4°–5°)[303] or for exercising orders already received (c. 1044, §1, 3°).

Abortion[304]

Canon 1398 — A person who procures a completed abortion incurs a latae sententiae excommunication.

2268 (homicide) and 2297 (other violations of personal freedom and integrity).

[303] While the fact on which this irregularity is based may be a delict, one may incur the irregularity even without technically committing a delict.

[304] Cf. CCEO 1450, §2.

The present code restates the main thrust of the 1917 code (CIC 2350). However, explicit reference is made neither to the mother undergoing the abortion nor to the obligatory deposition (dismissal) of a cleric who might be involved.

The penal law committee refused to define abortion here since presumably the Church's teaching[305] was well known. Traditionally abortion has been defined as the ejection of a live, immature or non-viable fetus from the mother's womb. A related but technically distinct moral evil was feticide, i.e., the killing of the fetus within the womb. Since penal law must be strictly interpreted, most canonists have judged that abortion, but not technically feticide, however horrendous, was the delict envisioned by both codes.

Tragically, however, most abortions today occur by procedures involving killing the fetus in the womb, e.g., suction, dilation and curettage, or the use of a prostaglandin drug often in connection with the RU 486 pill. Hence, not surprisingly, a May 23, 1988 authentic Code Commission interpretation broadened the canonical understanding of abortion to maximize the protection of the fetus. Abortion means not simply the deliberate ejection of an immature fetus but also any intentional killing of the fetus through whatever means at any time after conception. This broadened view of abortion is an extensive interpretation of the code, which is not retroactive but operative only after the interpretation.[306]

According to canon 1398, a person who knowingly and freely procures a completed[307] abortion incurs a latae sententiae excommunication. A proposed ferendae sententiae penalty was rejected as possibly undercutting the canon's effectiveness, especially if the abortion were occult, or non-public. Canon 1329, §2 on complicity in a delict punished by a latae sententiae penalty is especially relevant, since numerous persons may be involved in procuring the abortion, e.g., parents of the aborted fetus, their families, doctor, nurses, etc. Those whose assistance is indispensable for the abortion presumably incur the excommunication since they are necessary accomplices. Others involved before or after the abortion may be subject to otherwise unspecified ferendae sententiae penalties. In assessing such penalties, the penal authority must consider various factors affecting imputability, e.g., age, ignorance, fear, etc. (cc. 1323–1327).[308]

This is probably the most common situation in which a confessor might remit a penalty, since this latae sententiae excommunication would rarely be formally declared (c. 1357). While counseling the penitent about the moral evil of abortion, the confessor should also consider possible mitigating circumstances precluding the incurring of the penalty (cf. canons 1323–1324).

Finally, certain other canonical implications of involvement in an abortion are noteworthy. Members of religious institutes, secular institutes, or societies of apostolic life must be dismissed for committing such a delict (cc. 695; 729; 746). Furthermore, anyone who has procured a completed abortion or positively cooperated in it is irregular for receiving orders even if there is technically no delict (c. 1041, 4°). In similar circumstances, if there has technically been a delict, such a one is irregular for exercising orders already received (c. 1044, §1, 3°).

[305] See, for example, CCC, nn. 2270–2275; also John Paul II, ency Evangelium vitae, March 25, 1995, Origins 24 (1995) 689–727, esp. nn. 58–62.

[306] AAS 80 (1988) 1818. For a translation and brief commentary on the interpretation, see L. Wrenn, Authentic Interpretations on the 1983 Code (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1983) 48–49.

[307] An attempted or failed abortion, however morally culpable, is not technically a delict. Yet see c. 1328.

[308] For a thoughtful examination of delictual cooperation here, see J. Coriden, "The Canonical Penalty for Abortion as Applicable to Administrators of Clinics and Hospitals," J 46 (1986) 652–658. A properly strict interpretation means that the canon applies primarily to those directly participating in the abortion, not those removed from such participation. Hence, however morally questionable the behavior, this particular canon applies neither to such administrators nor to political officials facilitating abortions by advocating abortion rights and voting to fund abortions.

TITLE VII
GENERAL NORM
[c. 1399][309]

Canon 1399 — In addition to the cases established here or in other laws, the external violation of a divine or canonical law can be punished by a just penalty only when the special gravity of the violation demands punishment and there is an urgent need to prevent or repair scandals.

Book VI closes with a general norm providing for a penalty in certain extraordinary circumstances even if no canon explicitly penalizes the particular violation of a divine or canonical law. This general norm might be situated more logically in title III following canon 1321 on penal imputability. This general norm, not found in the Eastern code, raises the issue of the ecclesial relevance of the so-called principle of legality (nulla poena sine lege—"no penalty without a law"). In canon law the axiom nulla poena sine culpa ("no penalty without culpability") is actually more pertinent.

The original schema (c. 73) contained such a penalty like the 1917 code (CIC 2222, 1). Some favored such a canon because it is impossible to list comprehensively all delicts notably impairing the Church's integrity and mission. Others, however, questioned its practical effectiveness and feared arbitrary action by church authorities which might violate basic Christian rights, e.g., the right not to be penalized except according to law (cf. c. 221, §3). They also felt that problematic disciplinary situations entailing no legal sanction could be responsibly addressed by issuing pertinent penal precepts.

A significant factor influencing the current canon was the approval of the underlying principle by the May 1977 Code Commission Plenarium. Apparently legitimate concerns about protecting the integrity of the Church's mission and precluding spiritual damage to persons prevailed over reasonable concerns for legal security and the rights of believers.[310]

Great caution should be employed in applying this canon, which provides for a discretionary (c. 1343), indeterminate, ferendae sententiae penalty for any believer in exceptional situations where the code does not penalize a legal violation. There is a special burden of proof on the penalizing authority here, since the canon speaks of the "special gravity of the violation" and the "urgent need to prevent or repair scandals." Both criteria must be verified to impose the penalty, which should normally be less severe than for delicts specified in the law, for the alleged offender, however imputable, could neither have anticipated the penalty nor adequately defended himself or herself. In fact, inculpable ignorance of the law (not presumed) normally exempts one from penal imputability (c. 1323, 2°), and ignorance of the penalty mitigates it (c. 1324, 9°).

The penalty is expiatory rather than a censure, since no warning is necessary for its imposition and its primary focus is not reforming the offender but restoring the violated ecclesial order. Accordingly, censures such as excommunication or suspension cannot be imposed. Furthermore, canon 1349 restricting penal discretion in applying indeterminate penalties is relevant. Hence, perpetual expiatory penalties such as privation of office and dismissal from the clerical state cannot be imposed.

[309] Besides the Münster commentary, see Borras, 23–25; Green, in CLSA Com, 930–931; idem, "Penal Law: A Review of Selected Themes," 244–246; Martin, in CLSGBI Com, 810; Rees, 75–76, 485–486; Sanchis, in Com Ex, 595–598.

[310] On the tensions between conciliar ecclesiology and a so-called "perfect society" ecclesiology underlying this canon, see especially pp. 5–6 of the Münster commentary.

Commentaries on the 1917 Code

Abbo, J., and J. Hannan. The Sacred Canons. Vol. 2: 779–871. St. Louis: B. Herder, 1952.

Bouscaren, T. L., A. Ellis, and F. Korth. Canon Law. 4th ed., 863–975. Milwaukee: Bruce, 1962.

Michiels, G. De Delictis et Poenis. 3 vols., 2nd ed. Paris: Desclée, 1961.

Vermeersch, A., and I. Creusen. Epitome Iuris Canonici. 7th ed., 219–400. Malines-Rome: H. Dessain, 1956.

Code Commission Reports on the Revision of Penal Law[311]

Commentaries on the Original 1973 Schema and Its Revision[312]

Green, T. "The Future of Penal Law in the Church." J 35 (1975) 212–275 (for postconciliar penal law reform literature, see 274–275).

[311] Green, in CLSA Com, 941.
[312] Ibid.

Green, T. "Penal Law Revisited: The Revision of the Penal Law Schema." Stud Can 15 (1981) 135–198.

Commentaries on Book VI of the 1983 Code

Arias, J. In Pamplona ComEng, 817–867.

Borras, A. Les Sanctions dans l'Eglise. Paris: Tardy, 1990.

Green, T. In CLSA Com, 891–941.

Ludicke, K. In Münster Com.

Martin, J. In CLSGBI Com, 749–810.

Rees, W. Die Strafgewalt der Kirche. Berlin: Duncker & Humblot, 1993.

Various authors in Com Ex, 222–598.

Commentaries on Penal Law in the Eastern Code

T. Green. "Penal Law in the Code of Canon Law and in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches: Some Comparative Reflections." Stud Can 28 (1994) 407–451.

BOOK VII
PROCESSES
[cc. 1400–1752]

Lawrence G. Wrenn

Ecclesial Judgments before Constantine

The Church, it may be said, is one, holy, catholic, apostolic, and adjudicative. Courts and trials have been part of our community life from the very beginning.

According to Matthew, the Evangelist, it was Jesus himself who drafted the first procedural canon of the Church's law.

> If your brother should commit some wrong against you, go and point out his fault, but keep it between the two of you. If he listens to you, you have won your brother over. If he does not listen, summon another, so that every case may stand on the word of two or three witnesses. If he ignores them, refer it to the church. If he ignores even the church, then treat him as you would a Gentile or a tax collector. I assure you, whatever you declare bound on earth shall be held bound in heaven, and whatever you declare loosed on earth shall be held loosed in heaven.[1]

St. Paul obviously approved of the notion of having every case "stand on the word of two or three witnesses," because he twice reiterated that advice, once in his second letter to the Corinthians[2] and again in his first letter to Timothy.[3]

Paul regretted that there should ever be litigations among the followers of Jesus, but he nevertheless accepted them as necessary and inevitable in a sinful Church. In his first letter to the Corinthians, Paul urged that the incestuous man among them be driven from the community:

> What business is it of mine to judge outsiders? Is it not those inside the community you must judge? God will judge the others, "Expel the wicked man from your midst."[4]

In the next (sixth) chapter of that letter, Paul, amplifying on the notion of Christians judging insiders, suggests, in effect, that the Church establish a kind of court system of its own in order to settle its problems internally:

> How can anyone with a case against another dare bring it for judgment to the wicked and not to God's holy people? Do you not know that the believers will judge the world? If the judgment of the world is to be yours, are you to be thought unworthy of judging in minor matters? Do you not know that we are to judge angels? Surely, then, we are up to deciding everyday affairs. If you have such matters to decide, do you accept as judges those who have no standing in the church? I say this in an attempt to shame you. Can it be that there is no one among you wise enough to settle a case between one member of the church and another? Must brother drag brother into court, and before unbelievers at that?[5]

By the year 197, when Tertullian wrote his Apology in an effort to convince the provincial governors of the Roman Empire that Christians were good, decent people, undeserving of the persecutions directed against them, he cited as one example of the uprightness of Christians their laudable court system. In the beautiful thirty-ninth chapter of the Apology, Tertullian reminded the Roman rulers that > family possessions, which generally destroy brotherhood among you, create fraternal

[1] Mt 18:15–18.
[2] 2 Cor 13:1.
[3] 1 Tm 5:19.
[4] 1 Cor 5:12–13.
[5] 1 Cor 6:1–6.

> bonds among us. One in mind and soul, we do not hesitate to share our earthly goods with one another. All things are common among us but our wives.... But it is mainly the deeds of a love so noble that lead many to put a brand upon us. "See," they say, "how they love one another."... We are a body knit together by a common religious profession, by unity of discipline, and by the bond of a common hope.... We assemble to read our sacred writing.... In the same place also exhortations are made, rebukes and sacred censures are administered. For with a great gravity is the work of judging carried on among us, as befits those who feel assured that they are in the sight of God; and you have the most notable example of judgment to come when anyone has sinned so grievously as to require his severance from us in prayer, in the congregation and in all sacred intercourse. The tried men of our elders preside over us, obtaining that honor not by purchase, but by established character.[6]

It is clear from this text that the Matthaean exhortation about bringing one's brother before the community for judgment was still in practice, and, indeed, of some import at the time of Tertullian. The Didascalia, however, probably written within a few decades of the Apology, spells out even more clearly what immense importance was attached to the role of judging in the early Church. Page after page of the Didascalia is devoted to the Church's court system, with detailed instructions on such matters as how the bishop-judge ought to handle the case of a falsely accused person, how the judge ought not to accept bribes, how both sides should be given a hearing, how the judge ought not to be a respecter of persons, and even how the judicatures of Christians ought to be held on the second day of the week, so that the matter might be settled before the next Sabbath.[7]

The "earliest Church historian," Eusebius, who was the bishop of Caesarea early in the fourth century, tells us that in the year 268, the then bishop of Antioch had to be deposed because of his heretical beliefs and certain misdemeanors. Among the specific complaints against the bishop were several that referred to his role as judge. It was alleged, and eventually proved, according to Eusebius that > he extorts from the brethren, depriving the injured of their rights and promising to assist them for reward, yet deceiving them, and plundering those who in their trouble are ready to give that they may obtain reconciliation with their oppressors... and ... that he practices chicanery in ecclesiastical assemblies, contrives to glorify himself, and deceive with appearances, and astonish the minds of the simple, preparing for himself a Tribunal and lofty throne, not like a disciple of Christ, and possessing a "secretum," like the rulers of the world, and so calling it, and strike his thigh with his hand and stamping on the Tribunal with his feet; or in that he rebukes and insults those who do not applaud, and shake their handkerchiefs as in theaters, and shout and leap about like the men and women that are stationed around him.[8]

It seems, therefore, that ecclesiastical courts, both good and bad, grew up along with the Church itself as part of the family. They were used and abused, admired and detested; but, above all, they were a fixture.

[6] The Ante Nicene Fathers (New York: Scribner's, 1926) III:46–47. Order of sentences slightly altered; italics the author's.

[7] Constitutions of the Holy Apostles, Book Il, Sections III–VI, The Ante Nicene Fathers, VII:398–421.

[8] The Church History of Eusebius, VII, 30. The Nicene and Post Nicene Fathers, Second Series (New York: Christian Literature Co., 1890) I:314.

Ecclesial Judgments from Constantine to the Decretals of Pope Gregory IX

Once Constantine, the Roman emperor, became a Christian and, in particular, once he granted to bishops the same authority as civil judges in cases brought before them by the mutual consent of the parties,[9] it was inevitable that the procedural law of the Roman civil courts would influence and change the procedures of the church courts. And so it did.

Perhaps the clearest single illustration of that influence of Roman law on church law is found in Gregory the Great's letter to John the Defender, the letter listed as number 45 in Book XIII of his collected letters.[10] Gregory was born in Rome sometime around 540 to a distinguished patrician family. Before his ordination, Gregory was himself a judge in the civil system, prefect of the city of Rome, and president of the Roman Senate. When, therefore, he became pope in 590, he was a true expert in law and government. At a point in his pontificate, news came to Gregory of a couple of particularly delicate matters in Spain that had already come to the attention of the local church courts. Gregory sent John the Defender to Spain and, in Letter 45, Gregory instructed John, who had in effect been designated as Gregory's judicial vicar for these particular cases, how to proceed. The pope told John that he wanted him to review and evaluate the procedures, testimony, and merits of the first instance hearing; and time and time again, Gregory quoted chapter and verse for John from Justinian's Code and Novels. Gregory was saying, in other words, that the rules and directives of Roman civil law (the Code and Novels, along with two other works called the Institutes and Digest, which were a systematic collection of several centuries of imperial legislation ordered by and published under Emperor Justinian shortly before Gregory was born) could and should be utilized in church courts.

[9] Codex Theodosianus, I 27, 1: Mommson-Meyers (Berlin, 1905) 62.
[10] PL 77, 1294–1300.

The influence of Roman law on ecclesiastical court procedures still endures. The following chapter headings, for example, which are immediately familiar to anyone conversant with the Codes of Canon Law, are in fact lifted verbatim from the Corpus Iuris Civilis (as Justinian's four collections came to be known): De ordine iudiciorum, De foro competenti, De litis contestatione, De dilationibus, De procuratoribus, De actionibus et exceptionibus, De praescriptionibus, De re iudicata, De effectu sententiarum, and De restitutionibus in integrum.[11]

The Decretals of Pope Gregory IX

Although a complete history of procedural law in the Church is far beyond the scope of these few introductory remarks, still there is one essential link between the early Church and the contemporary Church which is altogether too important to go unmentioned: the Decretals of Pope Gregory IX. In the year 1234, Gregory IX collected several centuries' worth of ecclesiastical laws and arranged them (following the order utilized by Bernard of Pavia in his Collectio Prima of some forty years earlier) into five books: Iudex, Iudicium, Clerus, Connubia, and Crimen.

Book II of the Decretals (Iudicium) was divided into the following thirty titles:

De iudiciis
De foro competenti
De libelli oblatione
De mutuis petitionibus
De litis contestatione
Ut lite non contestata non procedatur ad testium receptionem vel ad sententiam definitivam De iuramento calumniae
De dilationibus
De feriis
De ordine cognitionum

[11] Institutiones IV 6, 13; Digesta IV 1, XLII 1, XLIV 1, 2; Codex II 13, III 8, 9, 11, 13.

De plus petitionibus
De causa possessionis et proprietatis
De restitutione spoliatorum De dolo et contumacia
De eo, qui mittitur in possessionem causa rei servandae Ut lite pendente nihil innovetur
De sequestratione possessionum et fructuum De confessis
De probationibus
De testibus et attestationibus De testibus cogendis vel non De fide instrumentorum
De praesumptionibus
De iureiurando
De exceptionibus
De praescriptionibus
De sententia et re iudicata
De appellationibus, recusationibus, et relationibus De clericis peregrinantibus
De confirmatione utili vel inutili[12]

The titles, chapters, and articles of the 1983 code as they appear in this commentary are in English, but a perusal of them in the Latin version of the code dramatically illustrates the continuity of procedural law in the Church over the centuries. Many of them are exact repetitions of the titles found in the Decretals of the year 1234, some of which, in turn, were found in Justinian's collection of the year 534.

Some General Observations

1. The procedural law of the 1983 code consists of 353 canons (cc.1400–1752) and is divided into five parts: I "Trials in General" (cc. 1400–1500); II "The Contentious Trial" (cc. 1501–1670); III "Certain Special Processes" (cc. 1671– 1716); IV "The Penal Process" (cc. 1717–1731); and V "The Method of Proceeding in Administrative Recourse and in the Removal and Transfer of Pastors" (cc. 1732– 1752).

[12] CorpusIC II, 239–448.

2. Marriage cases (which constitute practically the entire work load of our tribunals) have their own special norms and are treated under part three, "Certain Special Processes," title I, "Marriage Processes" (cc. 1671–1707). Besides those special norms, however, the canons that regulate contentious cases also apply to marriage cases (cc. 1425, §1, 1° and 1691). In his 1996 allocution to the Roman Rota, however, Pope John Paul II noted certain difficulties that result from the fact that the procedure used for marriage cases "is set in the broader framework of contentious procedures" and called, therefore, for "corrective measures by the legislator or for specific norms" that would apply to marriage cases.[13] These norms are presently being drafted.

3. The matter of "Methods of Avoiding Trials" (part three, title III, cc. 1713–1716) seems rather oddly placed in both the 1917 and the 1983 codes, though interestingly, it was assigned the same relative position in the third-century Didascalia's own rather lengthy treatment of ecclesiastical judicatories.[14]

The Eastern code, however, positioned its chapter on "Methods of Avoiding a Trial" (CCEO 1164–1184) immediately before its section on "The Contentious Trial" (CCEO 1185–1356), which seems a more logical placement.

Chronology of the Revision of the 1917 Code

The early years of this revision were marked by four significant dates:

- January 15, 1959 — when Pope John XXIII issued the initial call for a revision of the 1917 code;
- March 28, 1963 — when the Pontifical Commission for the Revision of the Code was established;

[13] Origins 25 (February 29, 1996) 615–616.

[14] See the commentary on cc. 1713–1716 but one should also see the commentary on c. 1446.

- November 12, 1963 — when it was decided to postpone the work of revision until the end of the Second Vatican Council;
- November 20, 1965 — when Pope Paul VI inaugurated the work of the commission.

Following Pope Paul's inauguration, the consultors comprising the various study groups began their meetings. The De processibus group had its first meeting in May 1966 and for the next several years met, for a week or so at a time, two or three times a year.[15]

Finally, after ten years of work, the commission issued on November 3, 1976, the Schema Canonum de Modo Procedendi pro Tutela Iurium seu de Processibus, which was distributed to the various bishops of the world and other consultative organs. It was accompanied by a request that they return to the commission any observations they might have on the schema by September 1977. Using these observations, the consultors then met:

- in April and May of 1978 — to revise the present canons 1400–1490;[16]
- in October, November, and December of 1978 — to revise canons 1491–1649;[17]
- in March and May of 1979 — to revise canons 1650–1752.[18]

The final draft was then incorporated into the 1980 draft of the revised code and from there, with some few more revisions, into the final text.

Some Basic Definitions

A process (processus) is a complex of acts or solemnities, prescribed by law and to be observed by public authority, for solving questions or settling business.

A procedure (procedura) is simply a way of proceeding (modus procedendi); it can be either judicial or extra-judicial.

A trial (iudicium) is a hearing, discussion, and settlement by a judge of a legal controversy which arises between a plaintiff and a respondent.

An ecclesiastical trial is a discussion and settlement by an ecclesiastical tribunal of a controversy in a matter in which the Church enjoys competence.

Basic Elements of a Trial

There are five basic elements to a trial: the material object, the formal object, the active subject, the passive subject, and the form. These five elements comprise the subject matter of part one of this book on procedural law. The elements are discussed according to the following order:

Canon 1400 — the material object, i.e., the matters that can, in general, be addressed by a court.

Canon 1401 — the active subject, i.e., the judge or tribunal before whom the case is tried. Canon 1401 states the general principle that the Catholic Church does indeed have the proper and exclusive right to hear certain cases. Canons 1404–1475 (titles I–III) treat this matter in greater detail.

Canon 1402 — the form, i.e., the procedures or solemnities that are followed in the adjudication of certain matters. This canon states the general rule.

Canon 1476 — the passive subject, i.e., the petitioner or respondent whose case is being heard. This matter, along with the procurators and advocates for the parties, is treated in canons 1476–1490 (title IV).

Canon 1491 — the formal object, i.e., the precise claim or counterclaim made by the parties in a particular hearing. This matter is treated in canons 1491–1500 (title V).

[15] These meetings are described in Comm 6 (1974) 37–43, 216–219.

[16] These meetings are described in Comm 10 (1978) 209–272.

[17] These meetings are described in Comm 11 (1979) 67–162.

[18] These meetings are described in Comm 11 (1979) 243–296.

The Eastern Canons

One of the guiding principles in revising the procedural law for the Eastern churches was that all Catholics, as far as possible, should observe the same procedural norms. In general, therefore, the Latin canons and the Eastern canons regarding trials are uniform. As a table of corresponding canons easily shows, there are some Latin canons without an Eastern counterpart and vice versa, but these are relatively rare. There are also certain norms that are common to both codes and that differ somewhat.[19] When deemed significant, the specific differences between the two codes will be discussed in their proper place.

[19] J. Abbass, "Trials in General: A Comparative Study of the Eastern and Latin Codes," J 55 (1995) 834–874.

CANONS AND COMMENTARY

Book VII on "Processes" is divided into five parts: "Trials in General" (I), "The Contentious Trial" (II), "Certain Special Processes" (III), "The Penal Process" (IV), and "The Method of Proceeding in Administrative Recourse and in the Removal and Transfer of Pastors" (V).

Part I TRIALS IN GENERAL
[cc. 1400–1500]

After four introductory canons, part one is divided into five titles: "The Competent Forum" (I), "Different Grades and Kinds of Tribunals" (II), "The Discipline to be Observed in Tribunals" (III), "The Parties in a Case" (IV), and "Actions and Exceptions" (V).

INTRODUCTORY CANONS
[cc. 1400–1403]

The Material Object of a Trial

Canon 1400 — §1. The object of a trial is:

1° the pursuit or vindication of the rights of physical or juridic persons, or the declaration of juridic facts;

2° the imposition or declaration of a penalty for delicts.

§2. Nevertheless, controversies arising from an act of administrative power can be brought only before the superior or an administrative tribunal.

Paragraph one of this canon states what, in general, the object of a trial is; paragraph two speaks of a situation which is not the object of a trial.

When the object is to prosecute or vindicate the rights of persons or to declare juridic facts, as in §1, 1°, the trial is called contentious; when the object is to impose or declare a penalty, as in §1, 2°, the trial is called penal (see c. 1425, §1).

Not all vindication of rights, however, is the object of a judicial trial. Paragraph two notes that controversies that arise from an act of administrative power are handled administratively, or, as the canon says, "can be brought only before the superior or an administrative tribunal." If, for example, a person is aggrieved by a decision or decree of a bishop, recourse is had not to an ordinary tribunal but to the appropriate Roman congregation. In turn, recourse against the decision of that congregation is made to the Signatura acting as an administrative, not an ordinary tribunal.

Paragraph two, it should be noted, applies only to those controversies that arise from "an act of administrative power." It does not therefore suggest that any controversy involving an administrator, i.e., one who has administrative or executive power, is handled administratively. A penal or contentious case involving the person of the bishop, for example, is heard either by the Holy Father or the Rota (c. 1405, §1, 3° and §3, 1°). And when the rights or temporal goods of a juridic person represented by a bishop are at issue, the case is heard by the court of appeal (c. 1419, §2). It is, in other words, only those controversies that stem from an actual administrative act that are heard before the hierarchic superior rather than an ordinary tribunal.

Prior to 1967 there was no administrative tribunal in the Church. On August 15 of that year, however, as part of the apostolic constitution Regimini Ecclesiae universae, a second section was established within the Signatura to serve as an administrative tribunal empowered to decide on "contentions which have arisen from the exercise of administrative ecclesiastical power."[20]

For a time, indeed, it was envisioned that there would be not only a supreme administrative tribunal in the Church but local administrative tribunals as well. In the 1980 draft of this code, part five of this Book VII was not entitled "The Method of Proceeding in Administrative Recourse and in the Removal and Transfer of Pastors" as it is now, but simply "The Administrative Procedure," and that part five in the 1980 draft contained twenty canons (cc. 1689–1692, 1697–1698, and 1702–1715) which explained in considerable detail how administrative courts—which were envisioned as optional—could be constituted at the episcopal conference level and how they would function.

In preparation for the October 1981 meeting of the commission, three members of the commission recommended that these administrative courts be made obligatory rather than facultative for each conference. The Secretariat responded:

> Although it is devoutly to be wished that administrative tribunals be regularly established in the Conference of Bishops, for the safeguarding of subjective rights and for the better ordering of administrative justice, it does not seem opportune to impose such a burden by universal law. Just to establish ordinary tribunals has been replete with difficulties since oftentimes qualified, experienced personnel are lacking; this would be all the more true in setting up administrative courts since the work of such courts is extremely sensitive and important and demands a profound grasp of the law and of justice. Besides, such courts constitute a major innovation in church law and it therefore seems appropriate to move somewhat gradually and voluntarily in a way that is tailored to local resources. Nor should we forget, finally, that hierarchic recourse is always available with the possibility of approaching the Signatura for a final decision. Nevertheless, let the matter be referred to the Plenary Commission.[21]

In October 1981 the matter was referred to the Plenary Commission, and the vote was fifty-three to six in favor of retaining administrative courts as optional rather than mandatory.

Nevertheless, when the code finally appeared in 1983, all twenty canons dealing with local administrative courts had been deleted, and we are now left with the so-called "second section" of the Signatura as the sole administrative tribunal in the Church.

[20] See paragraph 106 of that constitution in CLD 6, 351. For a discussion of the nature of an administrative tribunal, i.e., whether it is judicial, extra-judicial, or quasi-judicial, see I. Gordon, "De iustitia administrativa ecclesiastica tum transacto tempore, tum hodierno," P 61 (1972) 251–378; idem, "De objecto primario competentiae 'Sectionis Alterius' Supremi Tribunalis Signaturae Apostolicae," P 58 (1979) 505–542. See also Comm 10 (1978) 217–218. For other helpful observations on administrative tribunals, see K. Matthews, "The Development and Future of the Administrative Tribunal," Stud Can 18 (1984) 1–233; and M. Moodie, "Defense of Rights: Developing New Procedural Norms," J 47 (1987) 423–448. Regarding the matter of sections within the Signatura, see the commentary on c. 1445.

[21] Comm 16 (1984) 85–86.

Because this "section" of the Signatura is the only administrative tribunal in the Church and because canon 1400, §2 indicates that a person aggrieved by an act of administrative power could have recourse to "the superior or an administrative tribunal," there was, upon promulgation, some initial confusion about the meaning of the canon. Some canonists wondered whether an option was really being offered. They wondered, for example, where an administrative act of a bishop was at issue, whether recourse either to the appropriate congregation or to the Signatura was really being allowed. It soon became apparent, however, especially after 1988 when article 123 of Pastor bonus[22] made it perfectly clear, that recourse was first to the congregation and only after that to the Signatura.

Accordingly, the parallel canon in the Eastern code (CCEO 1055, §2), not promulgated until 1990, simply omits all mention of an administrative tribunal, making it entirely clear that the initial recourse is only to the hierarchic superior.

The Active Subject of a Trial

Canon 1401 — By proper and exclusive right the Church adjudicates:

1° cases which regard spiritual matters or those connected to spiritual matters;

2° the violation of ecclesiastical laws and all those matters in which there is a question of sin, in what pertains to the determination of culpability and the imposition of ecclesiastical penalties.

Canon 1401 makes it clear that it is the Church itself, in its various judicial roles, that has the right to adjudicate certain issues. These issues are (a) spiritual matters, e.g., the validity of a sacrament, (b) matters connected with the spiritual, e.g., the right of a pastor to serve in a particular parish, (c) the violation of a law, and (d) cases in which there is the ratio peccati, that is to say, actions which disturb the social order of the Church.

The phrase ratio peccati has a long and interesting history.[23] It was first used by Pope Innocent III in 1204 in the famous decretal Novit. In that decretal Innocent intervened in a dispute between King Philip of France and King John of England, assuring them that, although he had no intention of diminishing or disturbing a king's power, he was nevertheless intervening in the dispute because it had been alleged that a sin had been committed and judgment regarding sin belonged to the Church. The phrase ratio peccati appeared in canon 1553 of the 1917 code in the same context as it does here, and indeed also appeared in the 1909 draft of the procedural law for that code as canon 3, §1.[24] In all cases in the past, as well as in the present canon, the phrase "a question of sin" refers not to theological sin (which is treated in the internal forum) but rather to an ecclesially disruptive action where judgment in the external forum is appropriate.

The Eastern code has elected to omit the present norm altogether because, although the substance of it "is very dear to every Catholic, it is nevertheless based on an undoubtedly true, but very complex, theology (e.g., what is the ratio peccati?)." "Nevertheless," as Abbass says, "the theological rule on which it is based is undoubtedly applicable in the whole Church."[25]

American civil law generally recognizes this right of the Church to judge church matters, at [22] See Code of Canon Law, Latin-English Edition: New English Translation (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1999) 721.

[23] L. Wrenn, "The Scope of the Church's Judicial Competence," J 45 (1985) 639–652.

[24] J. Llobell, E. DeLeon, J. Navarrete, Il Libro "De Processibus" nella Codificazione del 1917 (Milan: Giuffrè, 1999) 754.

[25] Abbass, 842.

least to the extent that it does not impinge on any civil right. American Jurisprudence, for example, the standard and authoritative encyclopedia on American civil law, notes the following:

> If civil rights, as contradistinguished from ecclesiastical questions, are passed upon by a church tribunal, the secular courts will usually decide the merits of the case for themselves. But, according to the rule broadly stated by some courts, when a civil right depends upon some matter pertaining to ecclesiastical affairs, the civil tribunal tries the right and nothing more, taking the ecclesiastical decisions out of which the civil right has arisen as it finds them, and accepting such decisions as matters adjudicated by another legally constituted tribunal. Thus the decisions of the church tribunals as to questions of discipline, faith or ecclesiastical rules, customs or law affecting the members of the church must be accepted by legal tribunals as final and binding upon them in their application to a case before them.[26]

The Applicability of the Canons

Canon 1402 — The following canons govern all tribunals of the Church, without prejudice to the norms of the tribunals of the Apostolic See.

Canon 1403 — §1. Special pontifical law governs the causes of canonization of the servants of God.

§2. The prescripts of this Code, however, apply to these causes whenever the special pontifical law refers to the universal law, or norms are involved which also affect these causes by the very nature of the matter.

As noted in the introduction, the procedures or solemnities that are observed in a trial constitute one of the five basic elements of a trial, namely the form.

These two canons note that although, in general, all tribunals of the Church are regulated by the canons that follow, nevertheless the tribunals of the Holy See (c. 1402) and the Congregation for the Causes of Saints (c. 1403) are often ruled by their own special norms.

The tribunals of the Apostolic See are the Apostolic Penitentiary, the Apostolic Signatura, the Roman Rota,[27] and, perhaps, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith when it deals with more serious offenses.[28] The Apostolic Penitentiary deals only with the internal forum. The norms followed by the Signatura were issued in 1968;[29] the most recent revision of the norms for the Rota appeared in 1994;[30] the norms followed by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith when it investigates more serious offenses are unavailable. The congregation, however, issued norms for privilege-of-the-faith cases in 1973,[31] for dispensations from clerical celibacy in 1980,[32] and for doctrinal examinations in 1997.[33]

Regarding the procedure in causes of canonization, Pope John Paul II issued the apostolic constitution Divinus perfectionis Magister on January 25, 1983 (the same day on which the code was promulgated), revising the mode of procedure in the drawing up of causes of canonization and giving new regulations for the Congregation for the Causes of Saints.[34] The following month further norms were issued to be followed by bishops when investigating causes of saints.[35]

[26] American Jurisprudence, 2nd ed. (Rochester, N.Y.: Lawyers Cooperative Publishing Company, 1973) 66: 784. As regards marriage cases, see cc. 1671–1672.

[27] PB 117–120.
[28] PB 52.
[29] CLD 7, 246–272.
[30] AAS 86 (1994) 508–540.
[31] CLD 8, 1177–1184.
[32] CLD 9, 92–101.
[33] Origins 27/13 (September 11, 1997) 221–224.
[34] CLD 10, 266–273.
[35] CLD 10, 273–281. See also J 43 (1983) 366–375.

Title I
The Competent Forum
[cc. 1404–1416]

Title I on the competent forum treats three main topics: the extraordinary forum, sometimes called the singular forum (cc. 1404–1406); the ordinary forum, sometimes called the common or concurrent forum (cc. 1407–1415); and the disputed forum (c. 1416).

The Extraordinary Forum

a. Judicial Immunity of the Pontiff

Canon 1404 — The First See is judged by no one.

Canon 1404 is not a statement about the personal impeccability or inerrancy of the Holy Father. Should, indeed, the pope fall into heresy, it is understood that he would lose his office. To fall from Peter's faith is to fall from his chair.[36] The question, however, of who or what body (probably a general council) would determine whether, in fact, the pope had fallen into heresy is unclear historically and is obviously not settled by this canon.

While not a statement about impeccability or inerrancy, canon 1404 is a statement about the judicial immunity of the First See. It says that the Holy Father cannot be tried by a secular or religious court and, perhaps particularly, given the history of the question, by a general council. The Constitution on the Church of Christ of the First Vatican Council, for example, said,

> We also teach and declare that he [the Roman Pontiff] is the supreme judge of all the faithful to whose judgment appeal can be made in all matters which come under ecclesiastical examination. But the verdict of the Apostolic See may be rejected by no one, since there is no higher authority, and no one may pass judgment on its judgment. Hence they stray from the right path of truth who affirm that it is permissible to appeal to a General Council against the judgments of the Roman Pontiffs, as if the General Council were a higher authority than the Roman Pontiff.[37]

b. Right of Pontiff to Judge

Canon 1405 — §1. It is solely the right of the Roman Pontiff himself to judge in the cases mentioned in can. 1401:
1° those who hold the highest civil office of a state;
2° cardinals;
3° legates of the Apostolic See and, in penal cases, bishops;
4° other cases which he has called to his own judgment.

§2. A judge cannot review an act or instrument confirmed specifically (in forma specifica) by the Roman Pontiff without his prior mandate.

§3. Judgment of the following is reserved to the Roman Rota:
1° bishops in contentious matters, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1419, §2;
2° an abbot primate or abbot superior of a monastic congregation and a supreme moderator of religious institutes of pontifical right;
3° dioceses or other physical or juridic ecclesiastical persons which do not have a superior below the Roman Pontiff.

As regards canon 1405, §1, 1°, the purpose of reserving such cases to the Holy See is not to provide a privilege to the governmental head but [36] See T. Izbicki, "Infallibility and the Erring Pope," in Law, Church and Society, ed. K. Pennington and R. Somerville (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, 1977) 97–111; M. Schmaus, "Pope," in Readings, Cases, Materials in Canon Law, ed. J. Hite, G. Sesto, and D. Ward (Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1980) 109–123; S. Ozment, The Age of Reform 1240–1550 (New Haven: Yale University, 1980) 160–164.

[37] Ench 1830.

rather to remove the possibility of a local judge being pressured to give a favorable decision.

As regards canon 1405, §2, the sense is that once an act has been confirmed in forma specifica[38] by the pope, it can no longer be adjudicated by an inferior judge without a specific mandate. In effect, therefore, it becomes a fifth type of case (added to the four in §1) that is reserved to the pope himself.

As regards canon 1405 §3, article 129 of Pastor bonus adds to the three types of cases listed a fourth, namely cases which the Holy Father commits to the Roman Rota for adjudication. The article further notes that all four types of cases are heard at the Rota not only in first instance but in other instances as well.[39] One should also see canon 1444, §2.

c. Incompetence of Lower Courts

Canon 1406 — §1. If the prescript of can. 1404 is violated, the acts and decisions are considered as not to have been placed.

§2. In the cases mentioned in can. 1405, the incompetence of other judges is absolute.

Canon 1406 brings up the matter of jurisdictional incompetence in terms of the extraordinary forum.

Incompetence can be either relative or absolute. (1) Relative incompetence stems from a territorial defect (c. 1407, §§1–2), while absolute incompetence stems from the fact that a case is already legitimately pending before another tribunal (c. 1512, 2°) or from the grade of the tribunal, the dignity of the parties, or the quality of the issue;[40] (2) relative incompetence results in the judge acting illicitly, while absolute incompetence results in his or her acting invalidly;[41] (3) relative incompetence need not be declared by the judge after the contestatio litis or joinder of issue, while absolute incompetence should be declared at any stage;[42] (4) relative incompetence may be challenged as an exception only before the contestatio litis, while absolute incompetence may be challenged at any time;[43] (5) relative incompetence can be prorogated or extended while absolute incompetence generally cannot;[44] and (6) relative incompetence does not result in the nullity of the sentence, whereas absolute incompetence results in a sentence that is incurably null.[45]

The Ordinary Forum

Canon 1407 — §1. No one can be brought to trial in first instance except before an ecclesiastical judge who is competent by reason of one of the titles determined in cann. 1408–1414.

§2. The incompetence of a judge supported by none of these titles is called relative.

§3. The petitioner follows the forum of the respondent. If the respondent has more than one forum, the choice of forum is granted to the petitioner.

After the general principles stated in this canon, this title then goes on to list the eight sources or titles of competence recognized in law. For the special titles of competence in marriage cases, one should see canon 1673. It is to be noted that canon 1673, 3° on the forum of the petitioner [38] For observations on the phrase in forma specifica, see F. Urrutia, "Quandonam Habeatur Approbatio 'In Forma Specifica,'" P 80 (1991) 3–17.

[39] Comm 20 (1988) 46.

[40] S. Goyeneche, De processibus, Part I (Messina: Scuola Tipografica Antoniana "Cristo Re," 1958) 40. See also footnote 94 of this commentary, and A. Stankiewicz, "De nullitate sententiae iudicialis propter absolutam iudicis incompetentiam," P 81 (1992) 537.

[41] E. Regatillo, Institutiones iuris canonici, vol. II (Santander: Sal Terrae, 1956) par. 350.

[42] Canon 1461; Comm 10 (1978) 257.

[43] Canon 1459, §§1, 2.

[44] Canon 1405 (where other tribunals are absolutely incompetent) admits of no exceptions, whereas cc. 1411 and 1414 (where other tribunals are relatively incompetent) admit of an extension either by the parties or by the law itself.

[45] Canon 1620, 1°.

somewhat modifies the ancient principle mentioned in canon 1407, §3 that "the petitioner follows the forum of the respondent."

(1) The Tribunal of Domicile or Quasi-Domicile

Canon 1408 — Anyone can be brought to trial before the tribunal of domicile or quasi-domicile.

For the acquisition and loss of domicile and quasi-domicile, one should see canons 102–106. This present canon clearly refers to the domicile or quasi-domicile of the respondent. In a case accepted on this basis, should the respondent relocate after the citation, the hearing is completed in the court in which it was initiated (c. 1512, 2°).

(2) The Tribunal of the Transient and of the Unlocatable Canon 1409 — §1. A transient has a forum in the place of his or her actual residence.

§2. A person whose domicile, quasi-domicile, and place of residence are unknown can be brought to trial in the forum of the petitioner provided that no other legitimate forum is available.

It bears noting that, in the case of an unlocatable person, the forum of the petitioner acquires competence only if no other legitimate forum is available. To illustrate: a woman petitioner approaches her own United States diocese, e.g., New York, requesting a declaration of invalidity. The marriage took place in San Juan, Puerto Rico. The husband is certainly somewhere in Puerto Rico but is unlocatable. Since San Juan is a legitimate forum, New York does not enjoy competence by reason of canon 1409, §2, though it might by reason of canon 1673, 4° on the forum of proofs.

(3) The Tribunal of the Disputed Object

Canon 1410 — By reason of the location of an object, a party can be brought to trial before the tribunal of the place where the object in dispute is located whenever the action is directed against the object or concerns damages.

When ownership of some object is at issue and the plaintiff brings an action either to obtain or to recover that object (actio in rem aut de spolio), that action by the plaintiff may be lodged at the tribunal where the object is located. If, however, the plaintiff is accusing the respondent of stealing the object or of some other delict, then it is not the tribunal of the disputed object that is competent but the tribunal where the offense was perpetrated (c. 1412). In both cases, of course, another tribunal, e.g., the tribunal where the respondent is domiciled, might also be competent.

(4) The Tribunal of Contract, Quasi-Contract, and Election

Canon 1411 — §1. By reason of a contract, a party can be brought to trial before the tribunal of the place where the contract was entered into or must be fulfilled unless the parties agree to choose some other tribunal.

§2. If the case concerns obligations which originate from another title, a party can be brought to trial before the tribunal of the place where the obligation either originated or must be fulfilled.

Paragraph one of this canon closes with the words, "unless the parties agree to choose some other tribunal." This tribunal chosen by the parties is known as the tribunal of election.[46]

Paragraph two of this canon notes that in what might be called quasi-contracts, i.e., other agreements and business arrangements, the tribunals where the agreement was made and where it is to be implemented are competent. In such cases, however, the tribunal of election is not available to the parties.

[46] Comm 10 (1978) 225.

(5) The Tribunal of the Delict

Canon 1412 — In penal cases the accused, even if absent, can be brought to trial before the tribunal of the place where the delict was committed.

For an example of when the diocese where the delict was committed would enjoy jurisdiction, one should see the commentary on canon 1414. The rationale for this being a source of competence is that it is often the place where the delict was committed that, first of all, facilitates the investigation of the facts and, second, most stands in need of having the wounds resulting from the delict healed by a fair trial.

(6) The Tribunal of Administration or Bequest

Canon 1413 — A party can be brought to trial:

1° in cases which concern administration, before the tribunal of the place where the administration was conducted;

2° in cases which regard inheritances or pious legacies, before the tribunal of the last domicile, quasi-domicile, or place of residence, according to the norm of cann. 1408–1409, of the one whose inheritance or pious legacy is at issue unless it concerns the mere execution of the legacy, which must be examined according to the ordinary norms of competence.

(7) The Tribunal of Connection

Canon 1414 — By reason of connection, interconnected cases must be adjudicated by one and the same tribunal in the same process unless a prescript of law prevents this.

One example of a tribunal enjoying competence by reason of connection would involve the hearing of penal cases concerning two similar delicts committed by the same person, one committed within the diocese undertaking the hearing of the case in accord with canon 1412 but the other delict committed outside the diocese, with the diocese in question having no source of jurisdiction other than canon 1414.

Another example would be the counterclaim mentioned in canon 1495 and discussed in the commentary on that canon.

(8) The Tribunal of Prevention

Canon 1415 — By reason of prevention, if two or more tribunals are equally competent, the right of adjudicating the case belongs to the one which legitimately cited the respondent first.

Although the wording of this canon (ratione praeventionis, paralleling ratione rei sitae of c. 1410, ratione contractus of c. 1411, etc.) suggests that prevention is, like the others, a genuine source of competence, some prefer to view it rather as a mechanism by which one tribunal obtains definitive competence over others that initially enjoyed a legitimate title to hear the case.

For a similar use of the notion of prevention, one should see the commentary on canon 1482.

The Disputed Forum

Canon 1416 — The appellate tribunal resolves conflicts of competence between tribunals subject to it; if the tribunals are not subject to the same appellate tribunal, the Apostolic Signatura resolves conflicts of competence.

Conflicts of competence can arise either when two or more tribunals claim to have competence over a case (prevention not having solved the conflict) or when two or more tribunals claim to lack competence. It is always to be hoped that the conflict can be settled locally, through a more thorough investigation. Appeal to a higher court should be a matter of last resort.[47]

The corresponding canon in the Eastern code deals with this matter in its own way. Unlike the Latin canon, which directs that the conflict be settled by the ordinary appellate tribunal when the conflicting tribunals are subject to the same appellate tribunal, and by the Signatura when they are not, the Eastern canon (CCEO 1083) directs that the matter be settled by the appellate tribunal of the judge who was first petitioned. No mention is made of the Signatura. The Eastern canon does, however, note that if one of the tribunals happens to be the appellate court of the other, then the matter is settled by the tribunal of third instance of the judge who was first petitioned. Even in this case, however, the intervention of the Holy See is usually not involved.

[47] Comm 16 (1984) 54.

TITLE II
DIFFERENT GRADES AND KINDS OF TRIBUNALS
[cc. 1417–1445]

INTRODUCTORY OBSERVATIONS AND CANONS [cc. 1417–1418]

1. Outline of Title

After two introductory canons, title II consists of three chapters: "The Tribunal of First Instance" (I), "The Tribunal of Second Instance" (II), and "The Tribunals of the Apostolic See" (III).

2. Grades and Kinds (Species) of Tribunals

The grade of a tribunal is the place it holds in the judicial hierarchy. There are four grades of church tribunals: the first is the diocesan, the second is the metropolitan, the third is the regional, and the fourth is the tribunals of the Holy See.[48] It should be noted that the grade of tribunal does not always coincide with the grade of hearing or instance (gradus iudicii). A tribunal of the fourth grade, for example, may hear a case in the first instance (c. 1417).

3. Subordination of Tribunals

Tribunals follow the rules of subordination of canon 1438 when competence is not disputed, and the rules of canon 1416 when competence is disputed.

4. Petitioning a Roman Tribunal

Canon 1417 — §1. By reason of the primacy of the Roman Pontiff, any member of the faithful is free to bring or introduce his or her own contentious or penal case to the Holy See for adjudication in any grade of a trial and at any stage of the litigation.

§2. Recourse brought to the Apostolic See, however, does not suspend the exercise of jurisdiction by a judge who has already begun to adjudicate a case except in the case of an appeal. For this reason, the judge can prosecute a trial even to the definitive sentence unless the Apostolic See has informed the judge that it has called the case to itself.

One should see canon 1442 for a discussion of this issue.

5. Cooperation Between Tribunals

Canon 1418 — Any tribunal has the right to call upon the assistance of another tribunal to instruct a case or to communicate acts.

When one tribunal requests another to receive the testimony of someone residing within the territory of that second tribunal, this request is made by a rogatorial letter,[49] and it is called a rogatorial commission.[50]

[48] S. Sipos, Enchiridion Iuris Canonici (Rome: B. Herder, 1954) 713.

[49] M. Lega and V. Bartocetti, Commentarius in iudicia ecclesiastica, 3 vols. (Rome: Anonima Libraria Cattolica Italiana, 1938) I:103.

[50] M. Reinhardt, The Rogatory Commission, CanLawStud 288 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1949).

For an alternative procedure, one should see canon 1469, §2. As regards the precise place for receiving testimony, one should see canon 1558.

CHAPTER I
THE TRIBUNAL OF FIRST INSTANCE
[cc. 1419–1437]

Chapter 1 consists of three articles: "The Judge" (l), "Auditors and Relators" (2), and "The Promoter of Justice, the Defender of the Bond, and the Notary" (3).

ARTICLE 1: THE JUDGE
[cc. 1419–1427]

Article 1 treats of the judge under five different categories: the diocesan judge, the regional judge, the single judge with assistance, plural judges acting as a college, and the judge of religious.

1. The Diocesan Judge

a. The Diocesan Bishop

Canon 1419 — §1. In each diocese and for all cases not expressly excepted by law, the judge of first instance is the diocesan bishop, who can exercise judicial power personally or through others according to the following canons.

§2. If a case concerns the rights or temporal goods of a juridic person represented by the bishop, the appellate tribunal judges in first instance.

Canon 375 notes that a bishop, by the fact of his episcopal consecration, receives the functions of sanctifying, teaching, and ruling. Canon 381, §1 notes that a diocesan bishop, in the diocese committed to him, possesses all the ordinary, proper, and immediate power which is required for the exercise of his pastoral office; and canon 391, §1 observes that a diocesan bishop is to rule the particular church committed to him with legislative, executive, and judicial power.

In terms of the topic under discussion, namely the diocesan judge, canon 1419 sums up the principles enunciated in these canons by stating that, apart from those cases expressly excepted by law, the judge of first instance is the diocesan bishop.

The principal cases that are, in fact, expressly excepted by law are found in canons 1400, §2; 1404; 1405; 1427, §§1 and 2; and paragraph two of this canon, which deals with an action that concerns the rights or the temporal goods of a juridic person represented by the bishop. The matter of representing a juridic person is discussed in canon 118. As canon 393 indicates, "The diocesan bishop represents his diocese in all its juridic affairs." Clearly, then, if a case involved diocesan property, it would not be the diocesan bishop but the appellate tribunal of that diocese that would hear the case in first instance.

b. The Judicial Vicar and His Adjutant

Canon 1420 — §1. Each diocesan bishop is bound to appoint a judicial vicar, or officialis, with ordinary power to judge, distinct from the vicar general unless the small size of the diocese or the small number of cases suggests otherwise.

§2. The judicial vicar constitutes one tribunal with the bishop but cannot judge cases which the bishop reserves to himself.

§3. The judicial vicar can be given assistants who are called adjutant judicial vicars, or vice-officiales.

§4. Both the judicial vicar and adjutant judicial vicars must be priests, of unimpaired reputation, doctors or at least licensed in canon law, and not less than thirty years of age.

§5. When the see is vacant, they do not cease from their function and cannot be removed by the diocesan administrator; when the new bishop arrives, however, they need confirmation.

The judicial vicar or officialis is a priest chosen by the bishop to judge cases with ordinary power.

Although his jurisdiction is ordinary, not delegated, and vicarious, not proper (c. 131), the judicial vicar is distinct from the episcopal vicars discussed in canons 476–481. This is clear from the following: (1) canons 463, §1, 2° and 833, 5° both speak of the episcopal vicars and the judicial vicar, clearly indicating that the judicial vicar is not included among the episcopal vicars; (2) canon 472 says that those who exercise judicial power follow different norms from those who exercise administrative power; (3) canon 479 says that episcopal vicars have executive (rather than judicial) power to place administrative (rather than judicial) acts, and (4) canon 481, §1 says that episcopal vicars lose their power when the see is vacant (see also c. 418, §2, 1°) whereas the judicial vicar does not (c. 1420, §5).

The judicial vicar, therefore, though he enjoys ordinary power, is not included when the law speaks about the "ordinary" (c. 134). Neither is he included in the episcopal council (c. 473, §4).

Like the episcopal vicar, however (c. 477, §1), the judicial vicar should be appointed for a definite but unspecified time; and the bishop is not to remove him from office prior to the vicar's term having expired unless the bishop has a legitimate and serious cause (c. 1422).

Paragraph two of this canon notes that "the judicial vicar constitutes one tribunal with the bishop." This implies that an appeal against a decision of the tribunal cannot be lodged with the bishop, and that the bishop is not free to change or modify a decision given by his judicial vicar.

It is to be noted, finally, that, in accord with canon 135, §3, judicial power cannot be delegated by the vicar or any other judge, except to carry out acts which are preparatory to a decree or decision.

c. The Judges

Canon 1421 — §1. In a diocese, the bishop is to appoint diocesan judges, who are to be clerics.

§2. The conference of bishops can also permit the appointment of lay persons as judges; when it is necessary, one of them can be selected to form a college.

§3. Judges are to be of unimpaired reputation and doctors or at least licensed in canon law.

Canon 1422 — The judicial vicar, adjutant judicial vicars, and other judges are appointed for a definite time, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1420, §5 and cannot be removed except for a legitimate and grave cause.

(1) The 1917 code (CIC 1574) did not permit lay persons to serve as judges. This was at least partly based on the common assumption that jurisdiction could be exercised only by those in holy orders.

After the Second Vatican Council, however, interest spread in permitting lay persons as well as clerics to function as judges.[51] In 1971, Causas matrimoniales permitted the lay man but not the lay woman to serve as a judge (V, 1); and this regulation was incorporated into the 1976 and 1980 drafts of procedural law. Finally, this 1983 code, in accord with the October 1981 vote of the members of the commission to eliminate the discriminatory restriction, allowed that a qualified lay person of either sex may be appointed a judge.

For a discussion of the exercise of jurisdiction by lay persons, one should see the commentary on canons 129; 228, §1; and 274, §1.[52]

(2) Canon 1574 of the 1917 code noted that diocesan judges exercised delegated power. The present canon has deleted that observation and, in accord with the definitions found in canon 131 §1, a diocesan judge would now seem to be exercising ordinary power.[53]

(3) The law's interest in having key court personnel equipped with academic degrees is particularly apparent in canons 1420, §4; 1421, §3; and 1435. In dioceses where there are not a sufficient number of degreed people to staff the tribunal adequately, the Signatura is willing to grant dispensations from this requirement to non-degreed but otherwise qualified people until such time as the diocese is able to arrange for a full complement of degreed personnel.

[51] See, for example, P. Frattin, "Lay Judges in Ecclesiastical Tribunals," J 28 (1968) 177–184.

[52] See also J. Provost, "The Participation of the Laity in the Governance of the Church," Stud Can 17 (1983) 417–448; and J. Beal, "The Exercise of the Power of Governance by Lay People: The State of the Question," J 55 (1995) 1–92.

[53] For more on this question, see G. Graham, Synodal and Pro-Synodal Judges (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1967) 74–83; and A. Diacetis, The Judgment of Formal Matrimonial Cases: Historical Reflections, Contemporary Developments, and Future Possibilities (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1977) 129–132.

(4) Canon 1421, §2 speaks of the conference of bishops as the authority that can permit lay persons to be appointed judges. Since conferences of bishops are not part of the hierarchical ordering of the Eastern Catholic churches, the parallel canon in the Eastern code (CCEO 1087, §2) utilizes a somewhat different system for the granting of the permission.

2. The Regional Judge

Canon 1423 — §1. With the approval of the Apostolic See, several diocesan bishops can agree to establish a single tribunal of first instance for their dioceses in place of the diocesan tribunals mentioned in cann. 1419–1421. In this case, the group of bishops or a bishop they designate has all the powers which a diocesan bishop has over his own tribunal.

§2. The tribunals mentioned in §1 can be established either for any cases whatsoever or only for certain types of cases.

The 1917 code did not specifically mention regional tribunals. They were, however, adverted to in Regimini Ecclesiae universae of 1967;[54] the Signatura issued special norms to govern them in 1970;[55] and canon 1445, §3, 3° directs that the Signatura "promote and approve the erection" of these tribunals.[56]

Once erected, regional tribunals, of course, remain under the vigilance of the Signatura. Indeed, several regional tribunals that had been erected in the United States during the early 1980s were later suppressed because the Signatura found some of their structures and practices unacceptable. The Signatura's principal objection in respect to these regional tribunals was that the defenders and judges on those tribunals were also serving as defenders and judges on first instance tribunals which were hierarchically subordinate to the regional tribunal. Although, in a given case, the judges and defender in second instance were always different from those who had served in first instance, the Signatura nevertheless found the system unacceptable.

[54] CLD 6, 351.
[55] CLD 7, 920–926.
[56] This directive was repeated in PB 124, 4°.

3. The Single Judge with Assistance

Canon 1424 — In any trial, a single judge can employ two assessors who consult with him; they are to be clerics or lay persons of upright life.

This canon notes that a single judge may utilize the services of one or at the most two assessors who serve as consultors or advisors. It should be noted that the single judge as well as the collegiate tribunal may also, in accord with canon 1428, designate an auditor to carry out the instruction of the case.

For occasions when a case alleging the invalidity of a marriage may be heard by a single judge, one should see canon 1425, §4.

4. Plural Judges Acting as a College

Canon 1425 — §1. With every contrary custom reprobated, the following cases are reserved to a collegiate tribunal of three judges:

1° contentious cases: a) concerning the bond of sacred ordination; b) concerning the bond of marriage, without prejudice to the prescripts of cann. 1686 and 1688;

2° penal cases: a) concerning delicts which can entail the penalty of dismissal from the clerical state; b) concerning the imposition or declaration of an excommunication.

§2. The bishop can entrust more difficult cases or those of greater importance to the judgment of three or five judges.

§3. Unless the bishop establishes otherwise in individual cases, the judicial vicar is to assign the judges in order by turn to adjudicate individual cases.

§4. If it happens that a collegiate tribunal cannot be established in the first instance of a trial, the conference of bishops can permit the bishop, for as long as the impossibility continues, to entrust cases to a single clerical judge who is to employ an assessor and auditor where possible.

§5. The judicial vicar is not to substitute judges once they have been assigned except for a most grave cause expressed in a decree.

Canon 1426 — §1. A collegiate tribunal must proceed collegially and render its sentences by majority vote.

§2. The judicial vicar or an adjutant judicial vicar must preside over a collegiate tribunal insofar as possible.

Canon 1425, §1 reserves to a collegiate tribunal of three judges several categories of cases, including those cases in which the invalidity of a marriage is alleged, which, as is well known, constitute more than 95 percent of all cases heard by ecclesiastical tribunals. Canon 1425, §4 outlines the circumstances under which such cases can be heard by a single clerical judge rather than by a collegiate tribunal.

This institute has an interesting history. For centuries prior to Pope Benedict XIV these cases were heard by a single judge. In 1741 that pope reformed the Church's procedural law for the hearing of marriage cases with his constitution Dei miseratione, but even though several procedural practices were changed by that constitution, such cases were still expected to be heard by a single judge.[57] In 1840 a new instruction on marriage procedures, Cum moneat, was issued, but still the rule of the single judge was maintained.[58] Four years later Causae matrimoniales was issued specifically for tribunals of the United States, and this instruction likewise directed that marriage cases be heard by a single judge.[59]

Canon 1576, §1 of the 1917 code, however, broke with this centuries-long tradition and required marriage cases to be heard by a college of three judges, "with every contrary custom reprobated and every contrary privilege revoked." For the next five decades or so, few cases were heard in the United States; but finally, in 1970, the American Procedural Norms were approved for use in the United States. Norm 3 allowed that, under certain conditions, the NCCB, in accordance with faculties to be sought from the Holy See, could permit tribunals to have these cases adjudicated by a single clerical judge rather than by a collegiate tribunal.[60] The following year, Pope Paul VI issued for the universal Church the motu proprio, Causas matrimoniales, Norm V §2 of which contained a regulation similar to that of Norm 3 of the American Procedural Norms.[61] Canon 1425, §§1 and 4 are clearly derived from this motu proprio.

Canon 1425, §4 notes that it is the conference of bishops which can permit the bishop to entrust cases to a single clerical judge. As noted in the commentary on canon 1421, §2, conferences of bishops do not exist in the Eastern churches. Accordingly, the parallel Eastern canon (CCEO 1084, §3) arranges for the permission to be granted by a different authority.

Canon 1425, §5 notes that once a judge is assigned to a case he or she is to remain on the case without being replaced by a substitute unless there is "a most grave cause," which cause, the canon notes, is to be expressed in the decree of substitution. It would seem, however, that the inclusion of the cause (e.g., other duties, serious illness) in the decree is required for liceity but not for validity.[62]

[57] CICFontes I, n. 318, §4, p. 699.
[58] CICFontes VI, n. 4069, p. 346.
[59] CICFontes VII, n. 4901, 6, p. 480.
[60] CLD 7, 952.
[61] Comm 10 (1978) 234.
[62] Ibid.

Canon 1426, §1 notes that a collegiate tribunal should proceed collegially. For more on this matter, one should see canon 1609.

Finally, it should be noted that if a sentence was rendered by an illegitimate number of judges contrary to the prescription of canon 1425, §1, the sentence is vitiated by remediable nullity (c. 1622, 1°).

5. The Judge of Religious

Canon 1427 — §1. If there is a controversy between religious or houses of the same clerical religious institute of pontifical right, the judge of first instance is the provincial superior unless the constitutions provide otherwise; if it is an autonomous monastery, the local abbot judges in first instance.

§2. Without prejudice to a different prescript of the constitutions, if a contentious matter arises between two provinces, the supreme moderator will judge in first instance either personally or through a delegate; if the controversy is between two monasteries, the abbot superior of the monastic congregation will judge in first instance.

§3. Finally, if the controversy arises between physical or juridic religious persons of different religious institutes or of the same clerical institute of diocesan right or of the same lay institute, or between a religious and a secular cleric or lay person or a non-religious juridic person, the diocesan tribunal judges in first instance.

The three paragraphs of this canon speak of the three categories of judges who sit in first instance on various types of cases involving a religious person, physical or juridic. Paragraph one outlines the cases heard by the provincial superior or local abbot. Paragraph two refers to those cases heard by the supreme moderator of a religious institute or the abbot superior of a monastic congregation. Paragraph three speaks of those cases heard by a diocesan tribunal.

ARTICLE 2: AUDITORS AND RELATORS [cc. 1428–1429]

1. The Auditor

Canon 1428 — §1. The judge or the president of a collegiate tribunal can designate an auditor, selected either from the judges of the tribunal or from persons the bishop approves for this function, to instruct the case.

§2. The bishop can approve for the function of auditor clerics or lay persons outstanding for their good character, prudence, and doctrine.

§3. It is for the auditor, according to the mandate of the judge, only to collect the proofs and hand those collected over to the judge. Unless the mandate of the judge prevents it, however, the auditor can in the meantime decide what proofs are to be collected and in what manner if a question may arise about this while the auditor exercises his or her function.

(a) The question of whether or not it is wise to involve auditors (or judge instructors, as they have been called)[63] in the judicial process, has long been hotly disputed. Cardinal Roberti, one of the more prestigious of the commentators on the procedural law of the 1917 code, was of the opinion that judge instructors did more harm than good, since their involvement necessarily resulted in the principal judge losing that immediate contact with the parties and witnesses that is so important in deciding a case.[64] The same argument

[63] CIC 1614, §1 juxtaposed the auditor with the "principal judge" as though to imply that the auditor was the "subsidiary judge." CIC 1580 referred to the auditor as "instructor of the acts," and several commentators used the term "judge instructor." The term "auditor" goes back to the early days of the Rota when the pope judged the case but employed others to audit (in an auditorium) the witnesses and collect and prepare the evidence. As a matter of fact, the men who even now serve as judges on the Rota are still referred to as auditors.

[64] F. Roberti, De processibus, 2 vols. (Rome: Libreria Pontificii Instituti Utriusque Iuris, 1941) I:295.

was made in an attempt to suppress the office of auditor in the 1983 code at the April 8, 1978 meeting of the consultors of the commission.[65]

The office has, however, been retained in the 1983 code, and it has indeed been found immensely useful in some tribunals for many years now. Some American tribunals employ a great many instructors who are responsible for collecting and presenting all the evidence to the defender of the bond and the judge, thus enabling the tribunal to be of assistance to far more people than would ever be possible if the judge had to do all the auditing personally. Roberti's point is, of course, a valid one, but it must be weighed against the demands being made on tribunals today to serve such large numbers of petitioners.

(b) In its treatment of the auditor, the 1917 code (CIC 1580–1583) completely neglected any mention of the qualities to be found in the auditor, except to say that if possible he should be selected from among the synodal judges. This may have been a lacuna but, more likely, it is just another indication that the 1917 code viewed the auditor as a true, if subsidiary, judge and assumed, therefore, that he should possess the same qualities as the judge. The post-1917 code commentators, furthermore, were in general agreement that since the auditor exercised judicial power, it would be necessary for him to be a cleric.[66] The present canon 1428, §2, however, explicitly permits the lay person (Causas matrimoniales permitted the lay man) to serve as auditor.[67]

(c) For the distinction between an auditor and a "designated receiver," one should see canon 1528.

2. The Relator or Ponens

Canon 1429 — The president of a collegiate tribunal must designate one of the judges of the college as the ponens or relator who is to report about the case at the meeting of the judges and put the sentence into writing. For a just cause the president can substitute another in place of the original relator.

For more regarding the duties of the ponens, one should see canons 1609, §3; 1610, §2; and 1677, §§1, 2, and 4.

An example of a just cause for which the president might replace the original ponens with one of the other judges on the panel might occur when, at the voting session (c. 1609), the original ponens is in strong disagreement with the other two judges and is outvoted.

The relator or ponens has also been called the referee.[68]

ARTICLE 3: THE PROMOTER OF JUSTICE, THE DEFENDER OF THE BOND, AND THE NOTARY [cc. 1430–1437]

THE PROMOTER AND DEFENDER [cc. 1430–1436]

1. Need to Be Appointed

Canon 1430 — A promoter of justice is to be appointed in a diocese for contentious cases which can endanger the public good and for penal cases; the promoter of justice is bound by office to provide for the public good.

Canon 1431 — §1. In contentious cases, it is for the diocesan bishop to judge whether or not the public good can be endangered unless the intervention of the promoter of justice is prescribed by law or is clearly necessary from the nature of the matter.

[65] Comm 10 (1978) 232.

[66] Dugan, quoting D'Angelo, disagreed. H. Dugan, The Judiciary Department of the Diocesan Curia (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1925) 52.

[67] See also the commentary on c. 1421.

[68] C. Augustine, A Commentary on the New Code of Canon Law, vol. VII, Ecclesiastical Trials (St. Louis: B. Herder, 1923) 40; W. Doheny, Canonical Procedure in Matrimonial Cases, 2 vols. (Milwaukee: Bruce, 1944) I:81.

§2. If the promoter of justice has intervened in a previous instance, such intervention is presumed necessary in a further instance.

Canon 1432 — A defender of the bond is to be appointed in a diocese for cases concerning the nullity of sacred ordination or the nullity or dissolution of a marriage; the defender of the bond is bound by office to propose and explain everything which reasonably can be brought forth against nullity or dissolution.

The promoter of justice is involved in all penal cases and in those contentious cases in which the public welfare is involved. The public welfare is involved (1) when the bishop decides it is (as, for example, when a quarrel between two priests over the possession of an office is judged to have become sufficiently public as to have caused considerable scandal), or (2) when the law says it is (as, for example, when c. 1691 indicates that the public good is involved in all marriage nullity cases and when c. 1696 declares that any separation case involves the commonweal), or (3) when the matter is obviously public (as, for example, when it is a highly publicized matter involving well-known people).

A particular promoter may be appointed, as canon 1436, §2 notes, either permanently or on an ad hoc basis, but canon 1430 indicates that there should be a promoter in every diocese.

The office of defender postdates that of the promoter,[69] and some authors regard the defender as a species of promoter. This linkage between the defender and the promoter dates back to the days just prior to Dei miseratione when some authors were urging that, just as the promoter was active in other cases as a protector of law and of justice, so he should also be active in matrimonial cases as a protector of the bond of marriage against the possible fraud and/or collusion of the parties. Dei miseratione then incorporated the idea, but, as it were, gave the promoter a new name, namely that of defender.[70]

The role of the defender, as canon 1432 points out, is to propose and clarify everything which can be reasonably adduced against nullity or dissolution. In those cases where, in the judgment of the defender, nothing can be reasonably adduced against nullity, the defender may not speak in favor of nullity but may entrust the decision to the wisdom and justice of the tribunal.[71]

Like the promoter, a particular defender may be appointed either permanently or on an ad hoc basis (c. 1436, §2), but canon 1432 indicates that there should be a defender in every diocese.

Although the public good is, to some extent, present in every case that alleges the invalidity of a marriage, the intervention of the promoter is considered necessary only when the promoter impugns the marriage or when it is judged that the intervention of the promoter is deemed important for safeguarding the procedures. Otherwise, the intervention of the defender of the bond is regarded as sufficient. Perhaps this reflects Coronata's opinion that the defender is, as it were, a species of promoter.

2. Need to Be Cited

Canon 1433 — If the promoter of justice or defender of the bond was not cited in cases which require their presence, the acts are invalid unless they actually took part even if not cited or, after they have inspected the acts, at least were able to fulfill their function before the sentence.

[69] The promoter served as a prosecutor during the Inquisition, whereas the office of defender was not instituted until 1741 by Benedict XIV in the constitution Dei miseratione.

[70] M. Coronata, Institutiones iuris canonici, vol. III, De processibus (Rome: Marietti, 1956) 45 and J. Glynn, The Promoter of Justice, His Rights and Duties (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1936) 39.

[71] For a neat description of the role of the defender, see RRAO 1992, 125–127, and CLSA Advisory Opinions 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995) 452–454.

3. Rights

Canon 1434 — Unless other provision is expressly made:

1° whenever the law requires the judge to hear either both or one of the parties, the promoter of justice and the defender of the bond must also be heard if they take part in the trial;

2° whenever the request of a party is required in order for the judge to be able to decide something, the request of the promoter of justice or defender of the bond who takes part in the trial has the same force.

Although this canon indicates that the rights of the promoter and defender are somewhat akin to those of the parties, there is, of course, a difference since the parties are protecting a private interest whereas the promoter and defender are providing for the public good.

4. Nomination and Qualities

Canon 1435 — It is for the bishop to appoint the promoter of justice and defender of the bond; they are to be clerics or lay persons, of unimpaired reputation, doctors or licensed in canon law, and proven in prudence and zeal for justice.

5. Separateness and Removal

Canon 1436 — §1. The same person can hold the office of promoter of justice and defender of the bond but not in the same case.

§2. The promoter and the defender can be appointed for all cases or for individual cases; however, the bishop can remove them for a just cause.

THE NOTARY
[c. 1437]

Canon 1437 — §1. A notary is to take part in any process, so much so that the acts are null if the notary has not signed them.

§2. Acts which notaries prepare warrant public trust.

For more on the notary, one should see canons 483–485.

CHAPTER II
THE TRIBUNAL OF SECOND INSTANCE
[cc. 1438–1441]

Chapter 2 comprises four canons. The first two treat of the sources of competence of various second instance tribunals, the third speaks of the incompetence of an illegitimate second instance tribunal, i.e. one not endowed with one of the titles of competence mentioned in the two former canons; and the fourth summarizes the way in which second instance tribunals are constituted.

Competent Second Instance Tribunals

1. For the Diocesan Tribunal

Canon 1438 — Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1444, §1, n. 1:

1° from the tribunal of a suffragan bishop, appeal is made to the metropolitan tribunal, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1439;

Canon 1438 begins with the words "Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1444, §1, n. 1." The sense, then, is that ordinarily an appeal from the tribunal of a suffragan bishop goes to the tribunal of the metropolitan bishop, but a party always has a right to appeal the sentence of a diocesan tribunal (or, for that matter, the first instance decision of a metropolitan or religious tribunal) directly to the Roman Rota.

Canon 1438, 1° also notes that the prescription of canon 1439 is to be observed. If, in other words, the tribunal of a diocese is a first instance regional tribunal, the rules of canon 1439 apply.

2. For the Metropolitan Tribunal

2° in cases tried in first instance before the metropolitan, appeal is made to the tribunal which the metropolitan has designated in a stable manner with the approval of the Apostolic See;

Once a tribunal has been designated as the appellate tribunal for a metropolitan tribunal, it is understood that the designation is a stable one and not merely a temporary arrangement.

3. For a Religious Tribunal

3° for cases tried before a provincial superior, the tribunal of second instance is under the authority of the supreme moderator; for cases tried before the local abbot, the tribunal of second instance is under the authority of the abbot superior of the monastic congregation.

4. For a Regional Tribunal

Canon 1439 — §1. If a single tribunal of first instance has been established for several dioceses according to the norm of can. 1423, the conference of bishops must establish a tribunal of second instance with the approval of the Apostolic See unless the dioceses are all suffragans of the same archdiocese.

§2. With the approval of the Apostolic See, a conference of bishops can establish one or more tribunals of second instance in addition to the cases mentioned in §1.

§3. Over the tribunals of second instance mentioned in §§1–2, the conference of bishops or the bishop it designates has all the powers which a diocesan bishop has over his own tribunal.

Canon 1438 notes that from the tribunal of a suffragan bishop appeal is made to the metropolitan tribunal. In some instances, all or some of the suffragan dioceses, instead of maintaining their own individual tribunals, will, in accord with canon 1423, form one regional tribunal. Ordinarily the decisions of that regional tribunal will be appealed for a second instance hearing to the metropolitan tribunal, but canon 1439, §2 notes that an alternative arrangement can be established. In some countries, for example, there is a single national appellate tribunal which serves as the second instance tribunal for all cases, whether those cases were heard in first instance by a diocesan, metropolitan, or even regional tribunal. This is one of several possible options envisioned in canon 1439, §2.

Canon 1439, §1 mentions another situation which is not optional but obligatory. When a first instance regional tribunal is established which comprises several dioceses, all of which are not suffragans of the same archdiocese (for example, when the regional tribunal comprises all of the suffragans of the metropolitan tribunal plus the metropolitan itself, i.e., all the tribunals of a single province), then a tribunal of second instance for that regional tribunal must be constituted by the conference of bishops with the approval of the Apostolic See, i.e., the Apostolic Signatura.

Finally, it should be noted that since the Eastern churches have a somewhat different hierarchical ordering than the Latin church, the parallel Eastern canons (CCEO 1064–1069) deal with this matter in a manner that is appropriate to their own structures.

Incompetent Second Instance Tribunal

Canon 1440 — If competence by reason of grade according to the norm of cann. 1438 and 1439 is not observed, the incompetence of the judge is absolute.

Regarding the implications of absolute incompetence, one should see the commentary on canon 1406.

The Constitution of Second Instance Tribunals

Canon 1441 — The tribunal of second instance must be established in the same way as the tribunal of first instance. Nevertheless, if a single judge rendered a sentence in the first instance of the trial according to can. 1425, §4, the tribunal of second instance is to proceed collegially.

This canon deals with the way in which a tribunal of second instance is constituted. As in first instance, in other words, there should be a judicial vicar, judges, auditors, relators, a promoter of justice, a defender of the bond, and a notary. For the way in which an appellate tribunal functions one should see canon 1640.

The canon does not say that every trial settled by a single judge in first instance must be heard by a college in second, but only those trials which were settled by a single judge in virtue of canon 1425, §4. If, therefore, the case is a minor one (as when the tribunal is settling a dispute between two persons) and not consequently reserved to a college, it may be heard by a single judge in both instances.

CHAPTER III THE TRIBUNALS OF THE APOSTOLIC SEE [cc. 1442–1445]

Chapter 3 comprises four canons. The first canon speaks of the supreme judge; the next two canons treat of the Roman Rota, and the fourth concerns the Apostolic Signatura.

The Supreme Judge

Canon 1442 — The Roman Pontiff is the supreme judge for the entire Catholic world; he renders judicial decisions personally, through the ordinary tribunals of the Apostolic See, or through judges he has delegated.

Since, as canon 331 notes, the Roman Pontiff enjoys supreme, full, immediate, and universal power in the Church, and since, according to canon 135, §1, the power of governance in the Church is legislative, executive, and judicial, it follows, as canon 1442 says, that "the Roman Pontiff is the supreme judge for the entire Catholic world."

One should also see canon 1417, §1 on the broad right of the faithful to introduce cases for adjudication at the Holy See.

The Roman Rota

According to canons 1443 and 1444 the Roman Rota may act either as an ordinary appellate tribunal or as a delegated tribunal.

1. As Ordinary Appellate Tribunal

Canon 1443 — The Roman Rota is the ordinary tribunal established by the Roman Pontiff to receive appeals.

Canon 1444 — §1. The Roman Rota judges:

1° in second instance, cases which have been adjudicated by the ordinary tribunals of first instance and brought before the Holy See through legitimate appeal;

2° in third or further instance, cases which the Roman Rota or any other tribunals have already adjudicated unless the matter is a res iudicata.

Although an appeal from a first instance decision is usually lodged with the domestic tribunal of appeal in accord with canon 1438, appellants are also free, in accord with canon 1444, §1, 1° to appeal directly to the Roman Rota for the second instance hearing. In accordance with canon 1444, §1, 2°, a case generally goes to the Roman Rota for the third instance when the two lower tribunals are not in agreement. There are, however, exceptions to this general rule. Both Spain[72] and Hungary[73] have had stable third instance tribunals for many years, and during World War II both Austria and the United States were also allowed a third instance hearing within their own countries.[74] In more recent years some conferences of bishops have periodically shown an interest in obtaining an indult to establish a third instance court in their own countries, but Rome has generally taken a dim view of such efforts—partly perhaps because of a concern that a proliferation of third instance courts might give rise to national inbreeding and so result in a loss of jurisprudential catholicity, and partly because of a concern that the individual conferences would not be able to staff these courts with the kind of Solomonic judges that would be necessary at that level.[75]

[72] AAS 39 (1947) 155–163.

[73] A. Szentirmai, "The Primate of Hungary," J 21 (1961) 36 and 44.

[74] CLD 2, 459–460.

The Rota (the name means "wheel") probably takes its name either from the fact that the judges originally sat in a circle or because there was a circle on the chamber floor at Avignon where the title is first known to have been used (ca. 1350), or because the cases under consideration were moved from judge to judge on a book stand which was on wheels. At any rate, the Rota has not only retained the name but still uses the wheel as its logo.

The Roman Rota dates back to the twelfth century, though in those days the auditors, who were the pope's chaplains, were only auditors (c. 1428) and not judges as they are today.

In 1870, when the Papal States were incorporated into the Kingdom of Italy, the Rota lost most of its jurisdiction and thereafter the auditors acted as judges only in causes of beatification and canonization. In 1908, however, Pope Pius X reconstituted the Rota as the ordinary judicial forum of the Holy See, and this marks, as it were, the beginning of the Rota's modern history.[76]

In accord with canon 1402 the Rota follows its own norms.[77]

2. As Delegated Tribunal

§2. This tribunal also judges in first instance the cases mentioned in can. 1405, §3 and others which the Roman Pontiff, either motu proprio or at the request of the parties, has called to his own tribunal and entrusted to the Roman Rota; unless the rescript entrusting the function provides otherwise, the Rota also judges these cases in second and further instance.

Some authors have pointed out that the Rota is here functioning with delegated power.[78] The reference in the canon to "the rescript entrusting the function" suggests that the point may be well made.

The Apostolic Signatura

The three paragraphs of canon 1445 outline the three areas in which the Apostolic Signatura functions:

1. In Judicial Matters

Canon 1445 — §1. The supreme tribunal of the Apostolic Signatura adjudicates:

1° complaints of nullity, petitions for restitutio in integrum and other recourses against rotal sentences;

2° recourses in cases concerning the status of persons which the Roman Rota refused to admit to a new examination;

3° exceptions of suspicion and other cases against the auditors of the Roman Rota for acts done in the exercise of their function;

4° conflicts of competence mentioned in can. 1416.

2. In Contentious Administrative Matters

§2. This tribunal deals with conflicts which have arisen from an act of ecclesiastical administrative power and are brought before it legitimately, with other administrative controversies

[75] Regatillo, 253–259. See also E. Egan, "Appeal in Marriage Nullity Cases," CLSAP (1981) 135–138.

[76] J. Noonan, Power to Dissolve (Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap, 1972) 183.

[77] AAS 86 (1994) 508–540.

[78] Lega-Bartocetti, I:182–183, and Coronata, 56, nn. 5 and 6.

which the Roman Pontiff or the dicasteries of the Roman Curia bring before it, and with a conflict of competence among these dicasteries.

3. In Noncontentious Administrative Matters

§3. Furthermore it is for this supreme tribunal:

1° to watch over the correct administration of justice and discipline advocates or procurators if necessary;

2° to extend the competence of tribunals;

3° to promote and approve the erection of the tribunals mentioned in cann. 1423 and 1439.

According to both Regimini Ecclesiae universae and the Special Norms of Government of the Signatura, judicial matters (§1) and noncontentious administrative matters were handled by the so-called "first section" of the Signatura,[79] while contentious administrative matters (§2) were heard by the "second section."[80] Since, however, neither Pastor bonus[81](which supplanted Regimini Ecclesiae universae) nor the 1983 code speaks of different sections of the Signatura, some authors have concluded that the Signatura is a single tribunal with different functions.[82]

The Apostolic Signatura had its origins in the referendaries or reporters who worked in civil chanceries in the beginning of the Middle Ages. In the Church the referendaries studied and sorted out the various requests received by the popes. By the fifteenth century they came to be called "Referendaries of the Signature" because they presented for the signature of the pope drafts of rescripts, and during that same century Pope Eugene IV established the "Signatura" as a separate department. Initially it was composed of two sections: the Signatura Gratiae and the Signatura Justitiae, but by the nineteenth century the former had lost its importance and was suppressed while the latter became the prototype of the present Apostolic Signatura. Over the centuries the Signatura of Justice developed and was reorganized several times. Finally in 1908 it was restored by Pope Pius X and declared to be the supreme tribunal of the Apostolic See.[83]

TITLE III
THE DISCIPLINE TO BE OBSERVED IN TRIBUNALS
[cc. 1446–1475]

Title III is divided into five chapters: "The Duty of Judges and Ministers of the Tribunal" (I); "The Order of Adjudication" (II); "Time Limits and Delays" (III); "The Place of the Trial" (IV); and "Persons to Be Admitted to the Court and the Manner of Preparing and Keeping the Acts" (V).

CHAPTER I
THE DUTY OF JUDGES AND MINISTERS OF THE TRIBUNAL
[cc. 1446–1457]

This chapter contains twelve canons and may be viewed as consisting of two basic sections. The first section, comprising canons 1446–1456, concerns the duties or obligations of the judge and other tribunal ministers; the second section, consisting only of canon 1457, concerns the [79] RE 105 in CLD 6, 351, and Special Norms, 17, §2 in CLD 7, 250–251.

[80] RE 106 in CLD 6, 351, and Special Norms, 96 in CLD 7, 263.

[81] PB 122–124.

[82] B. Gangoiti, "Sfera materiale e ottica del processo amministrativo ecclesiastico," Studia Lateranensia 1 (1989) 352. But see F. Ramos, I Tribunali Ecclesiastici, Costituzione, Organizzazione, Norme Processuali (Rome: Millennium Romae, 1998) 178–182.

[83] NCE 13, 209–210.

penalties for failing to carry out the substantial duties of office.

Duties

1. The Duty of Urging an Out-of-Court Settlement

Canon 1446 — §1. All the Christian faithful, and especially bishops, are to strive diligently to avoid litigation among the people of God as much as possible, without prejudice to justice, and to resolve litigation peacefully as soon as possible.

§2. Whenever the judge perceives some hope of a favorable outcome at the start of litigation or even at any other time, the judge is not to neglect to encourage and assist the parties to collaborate in seeking an equitable solution to the controversy and to indicate to them suitable means to this end, even by using reputable persons for mediation.

§3. If the litigation concerns the private good of the parties, the judge is to discern whether the controversy can be concluded advantageously by an agreement or the judgment of arbitrators according to the norm of cann. 1713–1716.

This is a generic statement about encouraging a peaceful solution to the problem. It is repeated in more specific form in canons 1341 (penalties as a last resort); 1659, §1 (regarding the oral contentious process); 1676 (on receiving a petition in a marriage case); 1695 (on receiving a petition for separation of spouses); 1713–1716 (regarding contentious matters); 1733 (when one considers himself or herself aggrieved by a decree); and 1742 and 1748 (regarding the removal or transfer of a pastor).

2. The Duty to Avoid Serving in Another Instance on the Same Case

Canon 1447 — A person who has taken part in a case as a judge, promoter of justice, defender of the bond, procurator, advocate, witness, or expert cannot later in another instance validly decide the same case as judge or perform the function of assessor.

The use of the word "validly" in the canon should be noted. If, therefore, a person were to contravene this canon, the sentence in the later instance would be irremediably null (c. 1620, 1°).

3. The Duty to Withdraw When Required

Canon 1448 — §1. A judge is not to undertake the adjudication of a case in which the judge is involved by reason of consanguinity or affinity in any degree of the direct line and up to the fourth degree of the collateral line or by reason of trusteeship, guardianship, close acquaintance, great animosity, the making of a profit, or the avoidance of a loss.

§2. In these circumstances the promoter of justice, the defender of the bond, the assessor, and the auditor must abstain from their office.

Canon 1449 — §1. If in the cases mentioned in can. 1448 the judge does not withdraw, a party can lodge an objection against the judge.

§2. The judicial vicar deals with the objection; if the objection is lodged against him,,the bishop who presides over the tribunal deals with it.

§3. If the bishop is the judge and the objection is lodged against him, he is to abstain from judging.

§4. If the objection is lodged against the promoter of justice, the defender of the bond, or other officials of the tribunal, the president in a collegiate tribunal or the single judge deals with this exception.

Canon 1450 — If the objection is accepted, the persons must be changed but not the grade of the trial.

Canon 1451 — §1. The question of an objection must be decided as promptly as possible (expeditissime) after the parties have been heard as well as the promoter of justice or defender of the bond, if they take part in the trial and are not the ones against whom the objection has been lodged.

§2. Acts placed by a judge before an objection is lodged are valid; nevertheless, those acts placed after the objection has been lodged must be rescinded if a party requests it within ten days from the acceptance of the objection.

This grouping of canons deals with two species of possible conflict of interest. Canon 1448 discusses voluntary withdrawal from a case by a major tribunal official when that official has a personal interest in the case, while the following three canons treat of the case in which a party lodges an objection (known as a "recusal") against an official when the official, despite a personal interest in the case, declines to withdraw voluntarily.

Canon 1448 lists the reasons on account of which an official should withdraw. These basically are consanguinity/affinity, guardianship/curatorship, friendship/animosity, and profit/loss. Doheny noted that some authors regarded that list (which is identical in the two codes) as exhaustive while others considered it demonstrative.[84] Doheny himself took a middle ground, saying that, in terms of strict obligation to withdraw, the list is exhaustive, but in terms of an optional withdrawal, the list is only demonstrative. The Pamplona commentary observes that the list is also merely demonstrative in terms of canon 1449 where the party is lodging an exception to an official who, despite personal interest, has declined to withdraw.[85]

Canon 1451, §1 notes that the issue of an objection is to be handled as promptly as possible (expeditissime), which means, according to canon 1629, 5°, that there is no appeal against the decision. There are, in the code, five other examples of decisions that do not admit of appeal because the issues are to be handled expeditissime: recourse against the rejection of a libellus (c. 1505, §4); recourse against the joinder of issues (c. 1513, §3); the insistence by a party that a proof rejected by the judge be admitted (c. 1527, §2); a decision in an incidental case (c. 1589, §1); and a question regarding the right of appeal (c. 1631).

[84] Doheny, I:90.

[85] L. Del Amo and R. Rodriguez Ocaña, in Pamplona ComEng, 904.

4. The Duty to Proceed Properly in All Cases

Canon 1452 — §1. In a matter which concerns private persons alone, a judge can proceed only at the request of a party. Once a case has been legitimately introduced, however, the judge can and must proceed even ex officio in penal cases and other cases which regard the public good of the Church or the salvation of souls.

§2. Furthermore, the judge can supply for the negligence of the parties in furnishing proofs or in lodging exceptions whenever the judge considers it necessary in order to avoid a gravely unjust judgment, without prejudice to the prescripts of can. 1600.

This canon distinguishes between two categories of cases: a) those which concern private individuals only and b) penal cases, cases involving the public good, and cases involving the salvation of souls. In the former, judges may proceed only at the request of a party, whereas in the latter, they may proceed on their own initiative. In both categories of cases, however, a judge may, in accord with paragraph two, supply for the neglect of the parties when appropriate. Canon 1530 serves as an example of this sort of judicial activity.

For more on cases involving the public good, one should see the commentary on canon 1430. To say that a judge may proceed ex officio in cases involving the public good does not, of course, mean that the judge himself may initiate such a case but only that, once the case has been legitimately introduced, the judge may, in the interest of justice and of obtaining a fuller truth, actively participate in the progress of the investigation.

5. The Duty to Conclude Cases Expeditiously

Canon 1453 — Without prejudice to justice, judges and tribunals are to take care that all cases are completed as soon as possible and that in a tribunal of first instance they are not prolonged beyond a year and in a tribunal of second instance beyond six months.

The Church has a centuries-old interest in avoiding all unnecessary delays in ecclesiastical trials, an interest reiterated by many popes and councils.[86]

6. The Duty to Take an Oath

Canon 1454 — All who constitute a tribunal or assist it must take an oath to carry out their function correctly and faithfully.

This oath customarily includes not only the obligation to fulfill one's function properly and faithfully but also to maintain secrecy (c. 1455) and not to accept any gifts in one's tribunal ministry (c. 1456). The oath is generally made while touching a book of the gospels or, in the case of a priest, while touching his heart.[87]

In accord with the policy of the Pontifical Commission for the Revision of the Code of Eastern Canon Law to limit the taking of oaths to an absolute minimum in the Eastern code,[88] canon 1112 of that code requires tribunal personnel to make a promise rather than to take an oath.

7. The Duty to Maintain Secrecy

Canon 1455 — §1. Judges and tribunal personnel are always bound to observe secrecy of office in a penal trial, as well as in a contentious trial if the revelation of some procedural act could bring disadvantage to the parties.

§2. They are also always bound to observe secrecy concerning the discussion among the judges in a collegiate tribunal before the sentence is passed and concerning the various votes and opinions expressed there, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1609, §4.

§3. Whenever the nature of the case or the proofs is such that disclosure of the acts or proofs will endanger the reputation of others, provide opportunity for discord, or give rise to scandal or some other disadvantage, the judge can bind the witnesses, the experts, the parties, and their advocates or procurators by oath to observe secrecy.

Paragraph one speaks of the distinction between secrecy in a penal trial and secrecy in a contentious trial. Paragraph two speaks of the secrecy the judges are to maintain regarding their deliberative session described in canon 1609. Paragraph three speaks of the right of the judge to oblige to secrecy even those who are not formally part of the tribunal.

In general this canon is to be understood in the context of canon 1598 which permits the parties and their advocates to inspect the acts prior to the conclusion and discussion of the case. The sense of the present canon is that the officers of the court may not discuss the case with any third party, i.e., any party not having legitimate access to the acts.[89]

8. The Duty Not to Accept Gifts

Canon 1456 — The judge and all officials of the tribunal are prohibited from accepting any gifts on the occasion of their acting in a trial.

Penalties for Abuse of Office

Canon 1457 — §1. The competent authority can punish with fitting penalties, not excluding privation from office, judges who refuse to render a judgment when they are certainly and manifestly competent, who declare themselves competent with no supporting prescript of law and adjudicate and decide cases, who violate the law of secrecy, or who inflict some other damage on the litigants out of malice or grave negligence.

§2. The ministers and personnel of a tribunal are subject to these same sanctions if they fail in [86] F. D'Ostilio, "Le sollecitudini della Chiesa in favore della giusta rapidità dei processi," ME 112 (1987) 347–377; idem, "La durata media delle cause matrimoniali," ME 114 (1989) 185–236.

[87] CIC 1622, §1, and Provida Mater Ecclesia 96, §1.

[88] Nu 18 (1984) 57 (c. 97 of the original 1981 schema on general norms and temporal goods).

[89] See also c. 1470, §1.

their office as described above; the judge can also punish all of them.

CHAPTER II
THE ORDER OF ADJUDICATION
[cc. 1458–1464]

Chapter 2 comprises seven canons. The first canon deals with the order in which different cases are to be heard; the other six canons discuss the order in which subordinate issues are to be heard.

Different Cases

Canon 1458 — Cases are to be adjudicated in the order in which they were presented and inscribed in the register unless one of them requires speedier treatment than the others; this fact must be established through a special decree which gives the substantiating reasons.

Subordinate Issues

Upon receiving a petition, a court does not always move uninterruptedly toward the settlement of the principal issue. Occasionally it gets sidetracked in the settlement of subordinate issues. This section explains at what stage of the proceedings such subordinate issues should be handled. Other aspects of these subordinate issues are discussed elsewhere and at greater length under canons 1491–1500 (actions and exceptions) and under canons 1587–1597 (incidental cases). The present section concerns itself primarily with the question: at what stage of the proceedings should such matters be settled by the court?

The subordinate issues discussed in this chapter are five: dilatory exceptions (c. 1459), exceptions against the competence of the judge or the judge's own awareness of incompetence (cc. 1460–1461), peremptory exceptions (c. 1462), counterclaims (c. 1463), and questions about judicial expenses (c. 1464).

Dilatory Exceptions

Canon 1459 — §1. Defects which can render the sentence null can be introduced as exceptions at any stage or grade of the trial; the judge can likewise declare them ex officio.

§2. In addition to the cases mentioned in §1, dilatory exceptions, especially those which regard the persons and the manner of the trial, must be proposed before the joinder of the issue unless they emerged after the issue was already joined; they must be decided as soon as possible.

An exception is a claim or complaint (strictly speaking, a complaint made by the defendant) which either modifies the procedure in some way or quashes the action altogether. A dilatory exception is one which does not aim at extinguishing the action but only at modifying it in some way, e.g., asking that the joinder of issues be changed.

Dilatory exceptions can be either major or minor. A major dilatory exception points out some procedural defect that will result in the nullity of the sentence, e.g., that the sentence does not contain the reasons for the decision (c. 1622, 2°). A minor dilatory exception refers to procedural points or other matters that do not affect the validity of the sentence.

Canon 1459 points out that major dilatory exceptions can be introduced at any stage or grade of a trial,[90] whereas minor dilatory exceptions should generally be proposed prior to the joinder of issues.

Exceptions against the Competence of the Judge

Canon 1460 — §1. If an exception is proposed against the competence of the judge, that judge must deal with the matter.

§2. In the case of an exception of relative incompetence, if the judge finds for competence, the decision does not admit of appeal; a complaint of nullity and restitutio in integrum, however, are not prohibited.

[90] But see cc. 1621 and 1623 for the time periods during which one may lodge a complaint against irremediably and remediably null sentences.

§3. If the judge finds for incompetence, however, the party who feels injured can appeal to the appellate tribunal within fifteen useful days.

Canon 1461 — A judge who becomes aware of being absolutely incompetent at any stage of the case must declare the incompetence.

Canon 1460, §1 states the general rule that the judge whose competence is in question is the judge who deals with the exception.

Canon 1460, §§2 and 3 deal with the relative incompetence of the judge and would therefore constitute a minor dilatory exception.[91] Generally, therefore, the judge would resolve the case by a decree rather than by an interlocutory sentence.[92]

According to the general rule (c. 1629, 4°) there is normally no room for appeal either from a judicial decree or from an interlocutory sentence which does not have the force of a definitive sentence. The issue of the relative incompetence of the judge, however, follows its own, rather unusual, rule, namely: if the judge finds against incompetence, then there is no appeal;[93] but if the judge finds for incompetence, then the decision does admit of appeal.

Canon 1461 deals not with relative but with absolute incompetence. It notes that judges who become aware of their absolute incompetence (either on their own or through an exception lodged against their competence) must declare that incompetence.

Exceptions against the absolute incompetence of the judge are considered major dilatory exceptions because when the incompetence is absolute[94] it renders the sentence invalid and, indeed, effectively brings an end to the instance. Such exceptions, however, are not considered peremptory because they do not altogether extinguish the action since the action may then be brought to another tribunal that does enjoy competence.

Peremptory Exceptions

Canon 1462 — §1. Exceptions of res iudicata, of agreement, and other peremptory exceptions which are called litis finitae must be proposed and adjudicated before the joinder of the issue. A person who proposes them later must not be rejected but is liable for expenses unless the person proves that the presentation was not delayed maliciously.

§2. Other peremptory exceptions are to be proposed during the joinder of the issue and must be treated at the proper time according to the rules for incidental questions.

A peremptory exception is a complaint that quashes the action altogether. Peremptory exceptions can be either closed case exceptions (litis finitae) or exceptions to the action.

Closed case exceptions (c. 1462, §1) claim, in effect, that the case has already been settled either by another tribunal or perhaps by a negotiated settlement (transactio) or arbitration.[95] Such exceptions should ordinarily be lodged before the joinder of issues but may be lodged later as well in accord with canon 1462, §1.

Exceptions to the action (c. 1462, §2), on the other hand, do not claim that the case was otherwise settled but do claim that, for some reason, the matter should not be heard. For example: the plaintiff sues the defendant, stating that the defendant never paid him or her the agreed upon $50,000 for the purchase of a piece of property. The defendant then lodges a peremptory excep-

[91] Regatillo, par. 350.

[92] Canon 1589, §1.

[93] The other two standard "remedies" against a sentence, however, namely, the complaint of nullity (cc. 1619–1627) and reinstatement (cc. 1645–1648), are permitted.

[94] See cc. 1406, §2 (where judges other than the Roman Pontiff are absolutely incompetent in cases reserved to him); 1417, §2 (where the Apostolic See has called a case to itself); and 1440 (where competence by reason of grade has not been observed).

[95] See cc. 1446, §3 and 1713–1715.

tion, claiming that the so-called bill of sale is a forgery and that it was always the respondent and never the petitioner who owned the property. Such exceptions are treated according to the rules on incidental cases as found in canons 1587– 1597.

Counterclaims

Canon 1463 — §1. Counterclaims cannot be proposed validly except within thirty days from the joinder of the issue.

§2. They are to be adjudicated, however, along with the original action, that is, in the same grade with it unless it is necessary to adjudicate them separately or the judge considers it more opportune to do so.

The counterclaim is known in Latin as actio reconventionalis, or reconventio, i.e, a reconvening of the petitioner by the respondent. It is also referred to as a second convening, or reciprocal petition. It may be defined as a petition made by the respondent in order to offset the original petition. One party in a marriage, for example, sues for a separation; the other party then sues for a declaration of invalidity.

For the difference between an exception and a counterclaim or counteraction, one should see the commentary on canons 1494–1495.

Questions about Judicial Expenses

Canon 1464 — Questions concerning the provision for judicial expenses or a grant of gratuitous legal assistance which had been requested from the very beginning and other such questions as a rule must be dealt with before the joinder of the issue.

CHAPTER III
TIME LIMITS AND DELAYS
[cc. 1465–1467]

Time limits are of three kinds: legal (when they are defined by the law), judicial (when they are defined by the judge), and conventional (when they are defined by the parties).

All three kinds of time limits ,can be either peremptory or non-peremptory. Peremptory time limits are those which extinguish the right in question if the time limit is not met. Non-peremptory time limits, if unmet, do not extinguish the right.

As regards legal time limits, the rule of thumb is that those that refer to the parties are peremptory, whereas those that refer to the tribunal (or judge) are non-peremptory.[96] An example of the former is canon 1505, §4 which gives the petitioner ten days to appeal a rejection of a petition; after those ten days the right is considered extinguished. See also canons 1460, §3; 1623; 1630, §1; 1633; and 1646. An example of the latter is canon 1453 which says that a tribunal should complete a first instance hearing in a year and a second instance hearing in six months; if, however, the tribunal has not in fact completed the instances in the allotted time, no right is extinguished. For another example of the legal non-peremptory time limit, one might look at canon 1609, §5 where the judges, at their deliberative session, can postpone sentencing but not more than a week; again, if the meeting is deferred beyond that time limit, no right is extinguished.

For an exception to the second part of this rule of thumb regarding legal time limits (namely, that those limits that refer to the tribunal are non-peremptory), one should see canon 1506 where the right of the judge to accept or reject a petition is extinguished when the judge remains silent for ten days after the petitioner has legitimately insisted that the judge fulfill his duty.

Judicial and conventional time limits can also be either peremptory or non-peremptory. In this case, however, the rule of thumb is different. It is that all such time limits are non-peremptory unless they are expressly declared to be peremptory either by the law itself or by the judge.[97] An example of a non-peremptory judicial time limit is the assignment by the judge of a date for the presentation of defense briefs (c. 1601). Examples of peremptory judicial time limits are the deadline for presenting the procurator's mandate as described in canon 1484, §2, and the deadline for presenting the items of discussion (articuli argumentorum) for the interrogation of witnesses as described in canon 1552, §2.

[96] Coronata, 81.
[97] Coronata, 82.

Legal Time Limits

Peremptory

Canon 1465 — §1. Fatalia legis, that is, the time limits established by law for extinguishing rights, cannot be extended nor validly shortened unless the parties request it.

For an exception to the principle that peremptory legal time limits cannot be extended (or prorogated), one should see canon 1633 which requires that an appeal be prosecuted within a month of its being filed, but then allows the judge a quo to extend that time limit.

Non-Peremptory

The canons do not explicitly say that non-peremptory (or simple) legal time limits (the ones that usually put limits on the judge or the tribunal) may or may not be extended, but presumably those limits follow the rules that pertain to judicial and conventional time limits.

Judicial and Conventional Time Limits

§2. Before the judicial or conventional time limits lapse, however, the judge can extend them for a just cause after the parties have been heard or if they request it; the judge, however, can never shorten those limits validly unless the parties agree.

§3. Nevertheless, the judge is to take care that such an extension does not overly prolong the litigation.

Canon 1466 — When the law in no way establishes time limits for completing procedural acts, the judge must define them after having taken into consideration the nature of each act.

Holidays

Canon 1467 — If the tribunal is closed on the day scheduled for a judicial act, the time limit is extended to the first day following which is not a holiday.

For details regarding the computation of time, one should see canon 203.

CHAPTER IV
THE PLACE OF THE TRIAL
[cc. 1468–1469]

Stable Location for the Tribunal

Canon 1468 — Insofar as possible, every tribunal is to be in an established location open during stated hours.

The Judge outside His Territory

Canon 1469 — §1. A judge expelled by force from his territory or impeded from the exercise of jurisdiction there can exercise jurisdiction and render a sentence outside that territory; the diocesan bishop, however, is to be informed of this.

§2. In addition to the case mentioned in §1, for a just cause and after having heard the parties, the judge can also go outside the territory to acquire proofs. This is to be done, however, with the permission of the diocesan bishop of the place where the judge goes and in the location designated by that bishop.

It has always been recognized, both in Roman[98] and in canon law, that as a general rule, a judge cannot exercise his jurisdiction outside of his own territory. This principle was stated explicitly in canon 201, §2 of the 1917 code. The corresponding canon in the 1983 code, canon 135, §3, simply says, however, that judicial power should be exercised "in the manner prescribed by law." This apparent softening of the principle of territoriality in the 1983 code does not, of course, negate the principle of territoriality but does seem to leave room for broader exceptions.

[98] Digesta V, 1, 59.

The exception mentioned in paragraph one of this canon, about the judge who has been expelled from his own territory, is a traditional one that was recognized both in medieval law and in the 1917 code.[99] The exception mentioned in paragraph two, however, is new to this code.[100] For an alternative procedure to this second paragraph, one should see canon 1418 which recognizes the right of every tribunal to call upon other tribunals for assistance.

CHAPTER V
PERSONS TO BE ADMITTED TO THE COURT AND THE MANNER OF PREPARING AND KEEPING THE ACTS
[cc. 1470–1475]

This chapter, as its title indicates, refers to two general subjects: persons and acts; or, more specifically, the persons to be admitted to the courtroom and the manner of preparing and keeping the acts.

Persons to Be Admitted

Necessary Persons

Canon 1470 — §1. Unless particular law provides otherwise, while cases are being heard before the tribunal, only those persons are to be present in court whom the law or the judge has established as necessary to expedite the process.

This paragraph, like canon 1455, refers to the publicity of the trial in terms of a third party, whereas canon 1598 discusses the publicity of the trial in terms of the two parties.

Clearly, an ecclesiastical trial is much more private regarding third parties than are most civil trials to which private citizens and the press, and sometimes even television cameras, have access.

The necessary people at the hearing of a witness are, besides the judges or auditor, the notary, the defender, and the promoter when they are involved in the case, and, in accord with canon 1559, ordinarily the procurators and advocates and sometimes the parties.

If the tribunal is collegiate, only the judges are present at the deliberation prior to sentencing (cc. 1455, §2 and 1609). At the session during which the sentence is signed, only the judge(s) and the notary are present (c. 1612, §4).

Respectful Persons

§2. With appropriate penalties, the judge can call to task all those present at a trial who are gravely lacking in the respect and obedience due the tribunal; furthermore, the judge can also suspend advocates and procurators from the exercise of their function in ecclesiastical tribunals.

Regarding the penalties mentioned in the canon, one should see canons 1331–1353 regarding penalties, other punishments, and their application.

Regarding advocates and procurators in particular, one should see canons 1487–1489.

Interpreters

Canon 1471 — If a person to be questioned speaks a language unknown to the judge or the parties, an interpreter designated by the judge and under oath is to be used. The statements, however, are to be put into writing in the original language and a translation added. An interpreter is also to be used if a speech or hearing impaired person must be questioned unless the judge may prefer the person to answer the questions in writing.

[99] Clem II, 2, CorpusIC II, 1144, CIC 1637.
[100] See CIC 1770, §2, 3°.

The Acts

Drafting the Acts

Canon 1472 — §1. The judicial acts, both the acts of the case, that is, those regarding the merit of the question, and the acts of the process, that is, those pertaining to the procedure, must be put in writing.

§2. The individual pages of the acts are to be numbered and authenticated.

Canon 1473 — Whenever judicial acts require the signature of the parties or witnesses and the party or witness is unable or unwilling to sign, this is to be noted in the acts; the judge and the notary are also to attest that the act was read to the party or the witness verbatim and that the party or the witness was either not able or unwilling to sign.

Canon 1472 introduces the distinction between the acts of the case (acta causae) and the acts of the process, sometimes called the procedural acts (acta processus). The acts of the case are all those materials which pertain to the merits of the case, like the proofs and the sentence, whereas the acts of the process are those materials which pertain to the formalities of the case, like the constitution of the tribunal and the acceptance of the petition. All of the acts must be committed to writing since quod non est in actis non est in mundo[101] and because, at the conclusion of the instance, the judge must base his decision ex actis et probatis, that is to say, on the acts and what is proved therein (c. 1608, §2).

[101] Loosely translated, this reads, "Whatever is not included in the acts is considered non-existent."

Should the instance be terminated by peremption or renunciation (cc. 1522 and 1525), the acts of the process are extinguished but not the acts of the case.

Transmitting the Acts

Canon 1474 — §1. In the case of an appeal, a copy of the acts authenticated by the attestation of a notary is to be sent to the higher tribunal.

§2. If the acts were written in a language unknown to the higher tribunal, they are to be translated into one known to that tribunal, with due precautions taken that the translation is a faithful one.

This canon deals with what is to be transmitted to the appeal court, and is therefore appropriately included in the chapter. Later canons (cc. 1633–1635) will deal with such questions as when, how, and to whom the acts will be transmitted.

Conserving the Acts

Canon 1475 — §1. When the trial has been completed, documents which belong to private persons must be returned; a copy of them, however, is to be retained.

§2. Without a mandate of the judge, notaries and the chancellor are forbidden to furnish a copy of the judicial acts and documents acquired in the process.

Canon 469 indicates that the tribunal is part of the diocesan curia. Canon 1475, §2, however, since it establishes a special rule regarding the conservation of judicial acts that is different from the rules that apply to other diocesan documents (cc. 486–491), suggests that the tribunal should have its own special archive.

Although the code does not indicate for exactly how long judicial acts should be conserved, the Apostolic Signatura has permitted tribunals to destroy the original acts of marriage cases after ten years following the conclusion of the process, provided that the original sentences and decrees be preserved and the other judicial acts be stored on microfilm.[102]

TITLE IV
THE PARTIES IN A CASE
[cc. 1476–1490]

This title comprises two chapters, the first on the petitioner and the respondent, the second on procurators and advocates.

CHAPTER I
THE PETITIONER AND THE RESPONDENT
[cc. 1476–1480]

General Principles

Canon 1476 — Anyone, whether baptized or not, can bring action in a trial; however, a party legitimately summoned must respond.

As noted in the introduction, one of the five basic elements of a trial is the passive subject, namely the petitioner and respondent.

The Latin terms for petitioner and respondent are actor (the one who institutes the action by a petition—c. 1501) and pars conventa (the convened party). They are sometimes referred to, especially in penal cases, as the plaintiff and the defendant.

The basic principle of canon 1476 is twofold: a) anyone can act in a trial (quilibet potest agere) and b) the respondent must respond (pars conventa respondere debet). Neither part of the principle, however, is quite as simple as it might seem. Canon 1478, for example, speaks of several groups of people, like minors and the fiscally incompetent, who have only limited capacity to serve as petitioners; and canon 1508, §3 notes that there are groups of people, like those who do not have the free exercise of personal rights, whose capacity to act as respondents is also limited.

The canon makes a point of saying that anyone, whether baptized or not, can act in a trial. In order to understand why the code makes an issue of the fact that one's baptismal status is irrelevant, one needs to know something about the history of this institute. It was understood under the 1917 code, particularly on the basis of canon 87, that a non-baptized person did not have the right to act as petitioner in a case. In 1970, however, Norm 8 of the American Procedural Norms permitted "any spouse without qualification" to petition for a declaration of marriage invalidity, and on January 8, 1973, the Pontifical Commission for the Interpretation of the Decrees of Vatican Council II declared that, even outside of the United States, unbaptized people needed no special permission to act as petitioners in marriage cases.[103] This right of the unbaptized is now extended to all types of cases.

A similar situation existed under the 1917 code for baptized non-Catholics. Because they were baptized, it was granted that they enjoyed "judicial capacity," but because they were not Catholic, they were considered to lack the "procedural capacity" to petition in a Catholic tribunal. This was specifically spelled out in article 35, §3 of Provida Mater Ecclesia[104] but it was reversed by the American Procedural Norms and the interpretation of January 8, 1973 as indicated above.[105] Prior to that, however, in those cases in which a non-Catholic did wish a Catholic tribunal to declare his or her marriage invalid (so that he or she would be free to remarry a Catholic), the procedure was for the non-Catholic to "denounce" the [102] RRAO 1985, 17, and RRAO 1990, 22. See also RRAO 1981, 2–3, and c. 489, §2 on periodically purging the acts in criminal cases involving morals.

[103] CLD 8, 1092.

[104] Doheny, I:116. Canon 1505, §1 and §2, 2° also mentions procedural capacity.

[105] For the implications of this development in marriage invalidity procedures, see c. 1674, 1°.

marriage and then for the promoter of justice to petition for the declaration of invalidity.

Canon 1477 — Even if the petitioner or respondent has appointed a procurator or advocate, they themselves are nevertheless always bound to be present at the trial according to the prescript of the law or of the judge.

The parties, for example, may be required by the law or the judge to offer their declarations in person (c. 1530) or to meet in person with a witness in order to settle a discrepancy (c. 1560, §2). This is true even if they have appointed a procurator or advocate.

Minors and Those Lacking Use of Reason

Canon 1478 — §1. Minors and those who lack the use of reason can stand trial only through their parents, guardians, or curators, without prejudice to the prescript of §3.

§2. If the judge thinks that the rights of minors are in conflict with the rights of the parents, guardians, or curators or that the latter cannot adequately protect the rights of the former, then the minors are to stand trial through a guardian or curator appointed by the judge.

§3. Nevertheless, in spiritual cases and those connected with spiritual matters, if the minors have attained the use of reason, they can petition and respond without the consent of their parents or guardian. They can do so personally if they have completed their fourteenth year of age; otherwise, they do so through the curator appointed by the judge.

According to canon 97, §1, minors are those persons under the age of eighteen. According to canon 99 those who habitually lack the use of reason are equated with infants, i.e., those under the age of seven (c. 97, §2). Despite the broad, general principle stated in canon 1476, minors and those lacking the use of reason do not generally enjoy procedural capacity (ius standi in iudicio) except through parents, guardians, or curators.

The legislation incorporated into paragraph three dates back to Pope Boniface VIII (d. 1303) and is designed to protect minors whose parents or guardian has allowed their own selfish, perhaps monetary, interests to prevail over the spiritual welfare of the minor.[106]

Although the law often uses the terms "guardian" and "curator" interchangeably, some authors regard the guardian as one who looks after the interests of those who are minors, while a curator performs the same office for those who suffer from some mental debility. This more specific usage is also found in the code on occasion. See canon 98, §2 regarding the guardian and canon 1478, §4 for the curator.

The Fiscally Incompetent and Weak-Minded Persons

§4. Those deprived of the administration of goods and those of diminished mental capacity can stand trial personally only to answer for their own delicts or at the order of the judge; otherwise, they must petition and respond through their curators.

This paragraph notes that, except in the two cases mentioned, those of diminished mental capacity must act and respond through their curators. The question might arise here: does the phrase "those of diminished mental capacity" include all those who are listed in canon 1095, namely, those who lack the due reason, discretion, or competence for marriage? The answer seems clearly to be no. A respondent, for example, whose severe personality disorder deprived him or her of the capacity to enter a marital covenant is not necessarily deprived by that disorder of the capacity to enter a non-marital type of contract, or to conduct his or her own legal or judicial affairs. Few people who suffer from personality disorders are appropriately referred to as "those of diminished mental capacity," i.e., ii qui minus firmae mentis sunt. Therefore, not all those respondents in marriage cases whose marital incompetence is alleged need have guardians appointed for them, but only those who either lack the use of reason altogether or are weak minded.

[106] Lega-Bartocetti, I:136.

Appointment of Guardian and Curator

Canon 1479 — Whenever a guardian or curator appointed by civil authority is present, the ecclesiastical judge can admit the guardian or curator after having heard, if possible, the diocesan bishop of the person to whom the guardian or curator was given; if the guardian or curator is not present or does not seem admissible, the judge will appoint a guardian or curator for the case.

The appointment of a guardian or curator should, of course, be made promptly, since at the very beginning of the case it is the guardian, not the respondent, who is cited in all those cases where a guardian or curator is required (c. 1508, §3). Also, in the appointing of a guardian or curator, the welfare of the minor or of the legally incompetent person should always be paramount in the mind of the judge.

Juridic Persons

Canon 1480 — §1. Juridic persons stand trial through their legitimate representatives.

§2. In a case of the lack of or negligence of the representative, however, the ordinary himself can stand trial personally or through another in the name of juridic persons subject to his authority.

Canon 118 notes that they alone represent a public juridic person who are acknowledged to have this competence either by universal or particular law or by its own statutes, and that they represent a private juridic person who have been given this competency by statute.

Among those recognized by universal law as representatives of public juridic persons are the bishop for his diocese (c. 393) and the pastor for his parish (c. 532).

CHAPTER II
PROCURATORS FOR LITIGATION AND ADVOCATES
[cc. 1481–1490]

Definitions and Functions

A procurator or proxy is one who, by legitimate mandate, performs judicial business in the name of someone else. The procurator, in other words, is a representative of the party and is, in effect, the alter ego of the party.

An advocate is a person approved by ecclesiastical authority who safeguards the rights of a party in a canonical process by arguments regarding the law and the facts. Besides providing advice and technical assistance, preparing the evidence, etc., an advocate may be present at the examination of the parties, witnesses, and experts (c. 1561), may inspect the acts, even though not published, and review the documents produced by the parties (c. 1678, §1, 2°), and is, of course, expected to write a brief (c. 1601). In his famous 1944 allocution to the Rota, Pope Pius XII outlined the functions of the advocate and also noted that the advocate "must not withdraw himself from the sole and common final purpose: the discovery, the ascertainment, the legal affirmation of the truth of the objective fact."[107]

Optional and Required Appointments

Canon 1481 — §1. A party can freely appoint an advocate and procurator; except for the cases established in §§2 and 3, however, the party can also petition and respond personally unless the judge has decided that the services of a procurator or advocate are necessary.

§2. In a penal trial, the accused must always have an advocate either appointed personally or assigned by the judge.

§3. In a contentious trial which involves minors or in a trial which affects the public good, with the exception of marriage cases, the judge is to appoint ex officio a defender for a party who does not have one.

[107] CLD 3, 617.

Paragraph one notes that in contentious trials that involve adults and only the private good, the appointment of an advocate or procurator is optional for the parties unless the judge has decided that the services of an advocate are necessary, in which case either the party appoints the advocate at the insistence of the judge or the judge appoints the advocate to assist the party.

Paragraphs two and three address the penal trial and the contentious trial involving minors or the public good (except for marriage cases) where an advocate or defensor is required. It is understood that, in a marriage case, the respondent may appoint an advocate but that, in a sense, that role is already being fulfilled by the defender of the bond, and that a personal advocate for the respondent is ordinarily unnecessary and tautological.[108]

Occasionally the person mandated to serve as advocate for the petitioner is also mandated to serve as procurator so that one and the same person would serve as procurator/advocate.[109] In a marriage case, however, a party generally performs personally, and not through a proxy, any judicial business that needs to be done.

Number

Canon 1482 — §1. A person can appoint only one procurator who cannot substitute another unless the procurator has been given the expressed faculty to do so.

§2. If a person appoints several procurators for a just cause, however, they are to be designated in such a way that prevention is operative among them.

§3. Nevertheless, several advocates can be appointed together.

A party may appoint only one procurator but may appoint several advocates. This rule follows from the nature of the two offices. Only one procurator is permitted because a procurator is the alter ego of the party and is uniquely identified with the party; several advocates are permitted and, in complex cases, even desired so that the party may profit from expert advice from different advocates, each of whom may specialize in a different aspect of the case.

The term "prevention" mentioned in paragraph two has the same basic meaning here that it had in canon 1415. In that canon the first judge (among those competent) to cite the respondent thereby acquired competence over the case ratione praeventionis. According to the present canon, the first procurator to undertake the judicial business becomes the active procurator—by prevention.

The notion of prevention is also expressed in canon law by the term in solidum (as opposed to collegialiter, where the function is performed by several people together as a group).[110]

Qualities

Canon 1483 — The procurator and advocate must have attained the age of majority and be of good reputation; moreover, the advocate must be a Catholic unless the diocesan bishop permits otherwise, a doctor in canon law or otherwise truly expert, and approved by the same bishop.

It is to be noted that unlike judges (c. 1421, §3), promoters of justice, and defenders of the bond (c. 1435), it is not absolutely necessary for an advocate to hold a doctorate or licentiate in canon law.

Ordinary Mandate

Canon 1484 — §1. Before the procurator and advocate undertake their function, they must present an authentic mandate to the tribunal.

§2. To prevent the extinction of a right, however, the judge can admit a procurator even if the [108] Comm 10 (1978) 268 and 16 (1984) 61. See also c. 1723 in penal cases.

[109] Comm 10 (1978) 269.

[110] See c. 140.

mandate has not been presented, once a suitable guarantee has been furnished if the case warrants it; the act, however, lacks any force if the procurator does not correctly present the mandate within the peremptory time established by the judge.

Paragraph one speaks of the requirement that the procurator and advocate submit a mandate to the tribunal. In all marriage cases which receive an affirmative decision in the first instance tribunal, the acts of the case are forwarded to the appellate tribunal for further action (c. 1682). It bears noting that, unless the mandate signed at the beginning of the hearing specifically empowers the procurator or advocate to serve in both tribunals, the mandate is presumed to be valid only for the first instance tribunal.

Paragraph one also notes that the mandate must be authentic. It is unclear whether "authentic" in this context means that it must be signed by a notary (see cc. 483, §1 and 1437, §1) or simply that it must be a genuine, original document truly signed by the party (see cc. 1070 and 1544).

Paragraph two speaks of a circumstance where a procurator may validly place an act on behalf of a party even before presenting an authentic mandate, provided that the mandate is later presented prior to the deadline presented by the judge. According to canon 1465, §2 the judge can ordinarily extend the time limit; but canon 1484, §2 specifically mentions that the particular judicial time limit is peremptory, that is, that if unmet, the right is extinguished, so that if the mandate is not submitted prior to the deadline, any act placed by that procurator is considered invalid.

Also, according to canon 1620, 6°, should one act in the name of another without an authentic mandate, the sentence would be irremediably null.

Special Mandate

Canon 1485 — Without a special mandate, a procurator cannot validly renounce an action, an instance, or judicial acts nor come to an agreement, make a bargain, enter into arbitration, or in general do those things for which the law requires a special mandate.

This canon says, in effect, that the general mandate is a mandate only to act on behalf of a party in a trial that leads to a judicial decision. The general mandate, therefore, does not empower a procurator to terminate the trial either by renunciation or by reaching some sort of out-of-court settlement.

Removal by the Mandator

Canon 1486 — §1. For the removal of a procurator or advocate to take effect, they must be informed; if the issue has already been joined, the judge and the opposing party must also be informed about the removal.

§2. After the definitive sentence has been issued, the right and duty to appeal, if the mandating person does not refuse, remains with the procurator.

Although, as noted, the mandate of the advocate in first instance ordinarily expires at the time of the definitive judgment in first instance, the mandate of the procurator ordinarily extends through the lodging of an appeal.

Expulsion by the Judge

Canon 1487 — For a grave cause, the judge either ex officio or at the request of the party can remove the procurator and the advocate by decree.

For a serious or grave cause the judge may expel a procurator or advocate from the trial. Gross dereliction of duty, malfeasance, dishonesty, and disrespect for the tribunal (c. 1470, §2) would no doubt qualify as grave causes.

Sanctions for Reprehensible Actions

Canon 1488 — §1. Both the procurator and the advocate are forbidden to resolve the litigation by bribery or to make an agreement for an excessive profit or for a share in the object in dispute. If they do so, the agreement is null, and the judge can fine them. Moreover, the bishop who presides over the tribunal can suspend the advocate from office and even remove him or her from the list of advocates if it happens again.

§2. Advocates and procurators can be punished in the same way if in deceit of the law they withdraw cases from competent tribunals so that the cases will be decided more favorably by other tribunals.

Canon 1489 — Advocates and procurators who betray their office for gifts, promises, or any other reason are to be suspended from the exercise of legal assistance and punished with a fine or other suitable penalties.

Permanent Staff

Canon 1490 — As far as possible, legal representatives are to be appointed in a stable manner in each tribunal, who receive a stipend from the tribunal and are to exercise, especially in marriage cases, the function of advocate or procurator on behalf of parties who wish to select them.

This canon seems to encourage as an ideal the establishment in every diocese of a permanent staff of procurators and advocates to serve the needs of interested parties. Although the ideal is perhaps beyond the realistic grasp of some dioceses, the canon nevertheless embodies the pastoral interest of the Church in being of service to people seeking justice, and encourages each diocese to do whatever is possible in providing skilled personnel to assist them in judicial proceedings.

TITLE V
ACTIONS AND EXCEPTIONS
[cc. 1491–1500]

As noted in the introduction, the basic elements of a trial are the subject, the form, and the object. The subject is twofold: active (the tribunal), and passive (the parties). The form is the procedures. The object, like the subject, is also twofold: material (rights, juridic facts, and penalties) and formal, namely the actions and exceptions which are the subject of this title V.

Title V comprises two chapters, the first on actions and exceptions in general, the second on actions and exceptions specifically.

CHAPTER I
ACTIONS AND EXCEPTIONS IN GENERAL
[cc. 1491–1495]

Preliminary Observations

An action is a request made by a petitioner (Latin: actor) for a judicial decision on some matter. An exception is a claim or complaint made by the respondent which either modifies the court procedure in some way (these are called dilatory exceptions) or quashes the suit altogether (these are called peremptory exceptions).

Exceptions and a certain type of action (the reconvening action or counterclaim) are also discussed in canons 1458–1464 in chapter 2 of title III ("The Order of Adjudication"). That treatment, however, confines itself to the question of the particular stage of the trial at which such matters should be introduced. The present treatment is more general.

Availability

Canon 1491 — Every right is protected not only by an action but also by an exception unless other provision is expressly made.

This is a simple statement to the effect that in general whenever a right is disputed, some adjudicative process must normally be available to the parties. St. Lawrence's Parish, for example, sells a piece of property to St. Robert's Parish. A bill of sale exists as proof of the transaction, but St. Lawrence's continues to occupy and use the property. St. Robert's is entitled to bring an action against St. Lawrence's in order to obtain possession of the property. But St. Lawrence's can then bring an exception against St. Robert's, claiming that the contract was, for a stated reason, null and void.

The canon notes that an action and an exception are always available to protect a right "unless other provision is expressly made." An example of "an express other provision" is found in canon 1062, §2 which indicates that a promise to marry does not give rise to an action to seek the celebration of marriage.

Extinction

Canon 1492 — §1. Every action is extinguished by prescription according to the norm of law or by some other legitimate means, with the exception of actions concerning the status of persons, which are never extinguished.

§2. Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1462, an exception is always available and is perpetual by its very nature.

It is axiomatic that actions are temporary while exceptions are perpetual. This principle, which seems to the advantage of the respondent, is, in fact, meant to correct the respondent's previous disadvantage in that the petitioner comes to court freely, whereas the respondent is convened and is obliged to appear. If, therefore, a right of a respondent is imperiled by his or her having been summoned and sued, his or her right then to lodge an exception is in no way limited by time.

To this general principle, however, there are exceptions on both sides. Some actions, namely those regarding the status of persons (those, for example, which refer to the bond of marriage, the separation of spouses, religious profession, or the clerical state) are perpetual. And some exceptions can cease. In particular, canon 1459, §2 requires that dilatory exceptions be proposed before the joinder of issues. If, however, the party fails to do that, the exception ceases to be available because the party is considered, in effect, to have renounced the exception.[111]

Concerning the prescription that extinguishes actions, one should see canons 197–199, 1268–1270, and 1362.[112]

Multiple Actions

Canon 1493 — A petitioner can bring a person to trial with several actions at once, either concerning the same or different matters, so long as the actions do not conflict among themselves and do not exceed the competence of the tribunal approached.

An example of multiple actions would be a person petitioning both for a separation from his or her spouse and for the custody of the children.

Counteractions

Canon 1494 — §1. The respondent can file a counterclaim against the petitioner before the same judge in the same trial either because of the connection of the case with the principal action or to remove or diminish the claim of the petitioner.

§2. A counterclaim to a counterclaim is not allowed.

Canon 1495 — The counterclaim must be presented to the judge before whom the first action was filed even if the judge was delegated for only one case or is otherwise relatively incompetent.

[111] Lega-Bartocetti, I:258; Goyeneche, 183. See also P. Coyle, Judicial Exceptions, CanLawStud 193 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University, 1944) 8, 24–25. It is also to be noted that c. 1492, §2 includes the phrase "without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1462."

[112] Regarding the prescription (or statute of limitations) that pertains to a cleric's sexual abuse of a minor, one should see the commentary on c. 1362 and J. Alesandro, "Dismissal from the Clerical State in Cases of Sexual Misconduct: Recent Derogations," CLSAP 56 (1994) 28–67.

The commentaries on canons 1459 and 1463 discussed exceptions and counteractions in terms of their order of adjudication. The basic difference between the two is this: an exception always remains tied to the original action and is never separate from it, whereas a counteraction, in effect, begins a new case and is, as it were, independent of the original action.

Canon 1494, §1 notes that there are basically two types of counteractions. The first type is directly connected to, but still independent of, the original action, as in the case of the two parties to a marriage, the first of whom sues for a separation whereupon the second countersues for a declaration of invalidity. The second type of counteraction aims at removing or diminishing the petition, as when the original petition sues a person for a sum of money whereupon that person countersues the original petitioner for a piece of property.

Where, in other words, a counteraction is instituted, there are, in effect, two different cases with the petitioner in the first case being the respondent in the second and vice versa.[113] But where an exception is lodged, there remains only the one case, with the respondent remaining the respondent. It is true that, according to the old axiom "in lodging an exception the respondent becomes the petitioner";[114] but this is to be understood only in the sense that, in accord with canon 1526, §1, it is then incumbent upon the one lodging the exception to prove that the exception has merit. In fact, however, when a respondent lodges an exception, he or she remains the respondent in the one and only principal case under consideration.[115]

Canon 1495 notes that even though the judge is acting in virtue of delegated power and the terms of delegation empowered him to judge only the one issue, nevertheless his jurisdiction is, by this canon, extended to include the counterclaim. Equity in fact dictates that the counterclaim, like any connected case, not only may be but indeed should be proposed before the original judge. Canon 1414 reads cognoscendae sunt, and this canon proponenda est.[116]

CHAPTER II
SPECIFIC ACTIONS AND EXCEPTIONS
[cc. 1496–1500]

This chapter deals with sequestration, injunctions, and possessory actions. In North America, such matters are, in fact, almost always brought before civil courts rather than ecclesiastical tribunals, but the principles of justice inherent in these institutes (which date back to medieval and even Roman law) are of both historical and practical interest.

Object Sequestration

Canon 1496 — §1. A person, who through at least probable arguments has shown a right over something held by another and the threat of damage unless the thing is placed in safekeeping, has the right to obtain its sequestration from the judge.

Injunctions

§2. In similar circumstances, a person can obtain an order to restrain another from the exercise of a right.

Object sequestration is the temporary entrusting of a disputed object to a third party.[117] An in-[113] Canon 1463, §2, however, directs that the two cases, depending on the circumstances, may be heard together or separately.

[114] Reus excipiendo fit actor.

[115] Some exceptions are handled as incidental cases. See cc. 1462, §2 and 1587–1591.

[116] See also c. 1588 on the proposal of an incidental case.

[117] Although c. 1496, §1 speaks only of a "thing" (super aliqua re and res ipsa) as the object of sequestration, it sometimes happens that a person can also be sequestered. In a child custody case, for example, the child can sometimes be placed in the care of a neutral party until the suit is settled.

junction is the temporary prohibition of exercising a disputed right because of probable infringement on the prevailing right of someone else.

It is to be noted that, in object sequestration, a person can obtain the right to have an object sequestered even when the person's right to the object is demonstrated only through probable arguments (probabilibus saltem argumentis).

Security Sequestration

Canon 1497 — §1. Sequestration of a thing is also allowed as security for a loan provided that the right of the creditor is sufficiently evident.

§2. Sequestration can also be extended to the goods of the debtor which are discovered in the possession of others under any title and to the loans of the debtor.

Security sequestration is the temporary entrusting to a third party of assets owned by a debtor as security for the creditor.

In security sequestration, in order for the creditor to obtain the right to have assets sequestered or attached, it is not enough for the creditor to demonstrate that the other party probably owes the creditor something; rather, the creditor must set forth arguments that convince the judge with a degree of certitude (satis constet) that the creditor truly enjoys the right to a security sequestration.

It is clear from the rubric of chapter 2 that sequestrations and injunctions may be entered either as actions or as exceptions

Sequestration and Injunctions as Extraordinary Procedures

Canon 1498 — Sequestration of a thing and restraint upon the exercise of a right can in no way be decreed if the harm which is feared can be repaired in another way and suitable security for its repair is offered.

When there are means, other than sequestration or injunction, of repairing the harm or damage, and when the respondent guarantees that the damage will indeed be repaired, then the judge is not allowed to issue a writ or decree of sequestration or of injunction.

Protection of the Respondent

Canon 1499 — A judge who grants the sequestration of a thing or a restraint upon the exercise of a right can first impose an obligation upon the person to compensate for damages if that person's right is not proven.

In some instances a judge will impose a surety bond on the petitioner to compensate the respondent for any damage suffered in the event that the petitioner's alleged right is not proven.

Possessory Actions

Canon 1500 — The prescripts of the civil law of the place where the object whose possession is in question is located are to be observed regarding the nature and force of a possessory action.

A possessory action is a defense submitted to a judge for the obtaining, retaining, or recovery of the possession of some object or right.

As already noted, all of the matters included in this chapter (sequestrations, injunctions, and possessory actions) are, in North America, heard virtually exclusively by civil courts rather than ecclesiastical tribunals. In regard to possessory actions in particular, however, this canon decrees for the universal Church that, should such an action be submitted to a tribunal, the prescriptions of the civil law of the place where the disputed object is located should be observed.[118]

[118] See c. 1410.

Bibliography

Books

Augustine, C. A Commentary on the New Code of Canon Law. Vol. VII, Ecclesiastical Trials. St. Louis: B. Herder, 1923.

Bartocetti, V. De causis matrimonialibus. Rome, 1950.

Bassett, W., and P. Huizing, eds. Judgment in the Church. New York: Seabury, 1977.

Coronata, M. Institutiones iuris canonici. Vol. III, De processibus. Rome: Marietti, 1956.

Della Rocca, F. Canonical Procedure. Milwaukee: Bruce, 1961.

Diacetis, A. The Judgment of Formal Matrimonial Cases: Historical Reflections, Contemporary Developments, and Future Possibilities. Washington, D.C. : Catholic University of America, 1977.

Doheny, W. Canonical Procedure in Matrimonial Cases, Vol. I. 2 vols. Milwaukee: Bruce, 1944.

Gordon, I., and Z. Grocholewski, eds. Documenta recentiora circa rem matrimonialem et processualem, Vol. I. 2 vols. Rome: Pontificia Universitas Gregoriana, 1977.

Goyeneche, S. De processibus. Part I. Messina: Scuola Tipografica Antoniana "Cristo Re," 1958.

Graham, G. Synodal and Pro-Synodal Judges. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1967.

Grocholewski, Z., ed. Documenta recentiora circa rem matrimonialem et processualem, Vol. II. 2 vols. Rome: Pontificia Universitas Gregoriana, 1980.

Lega, M., Praelectiones de iudiciis ecclesiasticis. 4 vols. Rome: Typis Vaticanis, 1905.

Lega, M., and V. Bartocetti. Commentarius in iudicia ecclesiastica, Vol. I. 3 vols. Rome: Anonima Libraria Cattolica Italiana, 1938.

Noonan, J. Power to Dissolve. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap, 1972.

Ramos, F. I Tribunali Ecclesiastici, Costituzione, Organizzazione, Norme Processuali. Rome: Millennium Romae, 1998.

Regatillo, E. Institutiones iuris canonici, Vol. II. 2 vols. Santander: Sal Terrae, 1956.

Roberti, F. De processibus, Vol. I. 2 vols. Rome: Libreria Pontificii Instituti Utriusque Iuris, 1941.

Sheehy, G., R. Brown, D. Kelly, and A. McGrath, eds. Canon Law, Letter and Spirit. Collegeville: Michael Glazier, 1995.

Sipos, S. Enchiridion Iuris Canonici. Rome: B. Herder, 1954.

Smith, S. The Marriage Process in the United States. New York: Benziger Brothers, 1893.

———. Elements of Ecclesiastical Law. Vol. II, Ecclesiastical Trials. New York: Benziger Brothers, 1887.

Wernz, F. Ius Decretalium. 6 vols. Rome: Typis Vaticanis, 1898.

Wernz, F., and P. Vidal. Ius Canonicum. Vol. VI, De processibus. Rome: Universitas Gregoriana, 1949.

Woywod, S., and C. Smith. A Practical Commentary on the Code of Canon Law, Vol. II. 2 vols. London: B. Herder, 1948.

Articles

Abbass, J. "Trials in General: A Comparative Study of the Eastern and Latin Codes." J 55 (1995) 834–874.

Beal, J. "Have Code Will Travel: Advocacy in the Church of the 1990s." J 53 (1993) 263–283.

———. "The Exercise of the Power of Governance by Lay People: The State of the Question." J 55 (1995) 1–92.

Burke, R. "The Distinction of Personnel in Hierarchically-Related Tribunals." Stud Can 28 (1994) 85–98.

Coriden, J. "Alternative Dispute Resolution in the Church." CLSAP (1986) 61–82.

Frattin, P. "Lay Judges in Ecclesiastical Tribunals." J 28 (1968) 177–184.

Gil de la Heras, F. "Organización Judicial de la Iglesia en el Nuevo Código." IC 24 (1984) 123–197.

Grocholewski, Z. "Theological Aspects of the Judicial Activity of the Church." J 86 (1986) 552–567.

Hayward, P. "Changes in Ecclesiastical Administrative Justice Brought About by the New Competence of the 'Sectio Altera' of the Apostolic Signatura to Award Damages." Ius Ecclesiae 5 (1993) 643–673.

Hesch, J. "The Right of the Accused Person to an Advocate in a Penal Trial." J 52 (1992) 723–734.

Matthews, K. "The Development and Future of the Administrative Tribunal." Stud Can 18 (1984) 1–233.

Moodie, M. "Defense of Rights: Developing New Procedural Norms." J 47 (1987) 423–448.

Morrisey, F. "Some Thoughts on Advocacy in Non-matrimonial Cases." J 53 (1993) 301–318.

Provost, J. "The Participation of the Laity in the Governance of the Church." Stud Can 17 (1983) 417–448.

Part II
THE CONTENTIOUS TRIAL
[cc. 1501–1670]

Part one of Book VII on procedures, canons 1400–1500, is concerned with the nature and structure of tribunals, the officers of the court, the parties and their representatives, and some basic rules governing all types of trials. Part two, canons 1501–1670, governs the actual unfolding of a trial. Commentators sometimes refer to this as the dynamic part of procedural law.

Contentious trials may be distinguished as "ordinary" (cc. 1501–1655) or "oral" (cc. 1656–1670). Weightier matters are reserved to the ordinary contentious process. The oral contentious process is a streamlined process that, as its name indicates, resolves issues by means of an oral hearing.[1]

There are also special procedures which somewhat modify ordinary or oral contentious trials. These include norms for marriage nullity cases (cc. 1671–1691), norms governing the separation of spouses (cc. 1692–1696), procedures for investigating the nullity of sacred orders (cc. 1708–1712), and norms for the imposition or declaration of ecclesiastical penalties (cc. 1717–1731).

The norms for ordinary contentious trials must be understood in light of an especially significant purpose of all ecclesiastical trials, namely, vindicating rights and declaring juridic facts (c. 1400, §1, 1°). Thus, the ultimate goal is discovering the truth in order to do justice. As the designation "contentious" indicates, this goal is sought through a contention, a legal dispute over some specified question or questions. The judicial contention is the means through which the Church seeks truth and justice.[2]

Contentious trials unfold in stages. While commentators vary in the manner in which they distinguish the stages, the principal phases of the ordinary contentious trial can be identified as follows:

1. an introductory phase (cc. 1501–1512),
2. the clarification and specification of the dispute (cc. 1513–1516),
3. the trial proper, principally focused on the gathering of proofs, often referred to as the "instruction" of the case (cc. 1517–1597),
4. the publication of acts and discussion of the case (cc. 1598–1606),
5. the decision (cc. 1607–1618),
6. challenges to the decision (cc. 1619–1648), and
7. the execution of the decision (cc. 1650–1655).

Implementing procedural law effectively requires an appreciation of the interrelationship of these differing stages, the contribution each makes to the whole process, and the overall flow of the trial.[3]

The norms for contentious trials in the Code of Canons for the Eastern Churches are very similar, in many cases identical, to those of the Latin code. This reflects a deliberate decision of the Eastern Code Commission to keep procedural law

[1] See the commentary on cc. 1656–1670 for further information on the nature of this process and when it can be employed.

[2] E. Egan, "Appeal in Marriage Nullity Cases: Two Centuries of Experiment and Reform," CLSAP 43 (1981) 132–135.

[3] For a more detailed outline sketching the various steps in the development of a trial, see M. Wijlens, The Ordinary Contentious Trial: A Schematic Overview (privately published, 1992). This text is available through the CLSA, Catholic University, Caldwell Hall 431, Washington, DC 20064.

substantially the same throughout the Church.[4] Because of that basic similarity, in this portion of the commentary reference will be made to parallel passages in the Eastern code only when there is a significant or otherwise instructive difference between the two codes.[5]

At present, the most common use of the contentious trial is to adjudicate marriage nullity cases. In this commentary, therefore, special attention will be given to the application of the basic procedural law to trials of marriage nullity.

[4] Nu 3 (1976) 23 (canons "De processibus," n. 2).

[5] For a discussion of such differences, see J. Abbass, "Contentious Trials: A Comparative Study of the Eastern and Latin Codes," J 56 (1996) 875–904.

Canons and Commentary

SECTION I
THE ORDINARY CONTENTIOUS TRIAL
[cc. 1501–1655]

Title I
The Introduction of the Case[6]
[cc. 1501–1512]

CHAPTER I
THE INTRODUCTORY LIBELLUS OF LITIGATION
[cc. 1501–1506]

Requirement of a Petition

Canon 1501 — A judge cannot adjudicate a case unless the party concerned or the promoter of justice has presented a petition according to the norm of the canons.

An ecclesiastical judge may act only in response to a legitimately prepared petition presented by a person with a recognized interest in the matter. Without such a petition, a trial has no basis and any action taken is vulnerable to a plaint of irremediable nullity (c. 1620, 4°). Once a trial is initiated, however, even if it concerns only the private good of the parties, the judge has the right and even the duty to proceed in order to serve the goal of doing justice (c. 1452).[7]

Form and Contents of a Petition [cc. 1502–1504]

Canon 1502 — A person who wishes to bring another to trial must present to a competent judge a libellus which sets forth the object of the controversy and requests the services of the judge.

Canon 1503 — §1. The judge can accept an oral petition whenever the petitioner is impeded from presenting a libellus or the case is easily investigated and of lesser importance.

§2. In either case, however, the judge is to order the notary to put the act into writing; the written record must be read to and approved by the petitioner and has all the legal effects of a libellus written by the petitioner.

[6] L. Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 970–973; M. Coyle, in CLSGBI Com, 862–868; C. de Diego-Lora, in Pamplona ComEng, 934–942; M. J. Arroba Conde, in Valencia Com, 660–666; R. Rodríguez-Ocaña, in Com Ex, IV/2, 1162–1216; S. Panizo Orallo, in Com Ex IV/2, 1217–1231.

[7] M. F. Pompedda, "Decision-Sentence in Marriage Trials," QuadStR 5 (1990) 80.

By definition, a libellus is a written petition presented by the one wishing to initiate a trial. It must request the assistance of a tribunal that has a claim to legal competence or jurisdiction (cc. 1404–1416, 1673), and must specify what is being sought from the judge.

While the norm is the presentation of a written petition, canon 1503 empowers a judge to accept an oral petition when a petitioner is impeded, for instance, by illiteracy, or when the matter is of lesser importance. When an oral petition is presented, a tribunal notary must commit the substance of that petition to writing and that written petition must be approved by the petitioner. This gives the document full legal force as a libellus.

Canon 1504 — The libellus, which introduces litigation, must:

1° express the judge before whom the case is introduced, what is being sought and by whom it is being sought;

2° indicate the right upon which the petitioner bases the case and, at least generally, the facts and proofs which will prove the allegations;

3° be signed by the petitioner or the petitioner's procurator, indicating the day, month, and year, and the address where the petitioner or procurator lives or where they say they reside for the purpose of receiving the acts;

4° indicate the domicile or quasi-domicile of the respondent.

The essential elements of a libellus are defined in this important canon. These elements enable a tribunal to clarify whether there is a genuine claim and whether the tribunal has jurisdiction to adjudicate that claim. In the absence of one or more of these elements, the petition is liable to rejection. Every libellus must:

1. be directed to a specific tribunal (to assist in clarifying jurisdiction);
2. indicate the goal sought by the petitioner (e.g., vindication of good reputation; declaration of the nullity of a marriage);
3. identify the petitioner (to determine whether he or she has standing to introduce the suit);
4. refer in general terms to the right upon which the action is sought (to establish that a matter appropriate to a judicial process is at issue);
5. identify the facts and proofs which the petitioner intends to use to establish the right (to establish that a means of argumentation exists);
6. be signed and dated and include the address of the petitioner and/or procurator;[8]
7. identify the respondent and, if possible, the respondent's domicile or quasi-domicile (to determine jurisdiction and facilitate citation).

RESPONSE TO THE LIBELLUS [cc. 1505–1506]

Canon 1505 — §1. When a single judge or the president of a collegiate tribunal has seen that the matter is within his competence and the petitioner does not lack legitimate personal standing in the trial, he must accept or reject the libellus as soon as possible by decree.

§2. A libellus can be rejected only:

1° if the judge or tribunal is incompetent;

2° if without doubt it is evident that the petitioner lacks legitimate personal standing in the trial;

3° if the prescripts of can. 1504, nn. 1–3 have not been observed;

4° if it is certainly clear from the libellus itself that the petition lacks any basis and that there is no possibility that any such basis will appear through a process.

[8] For a description of the role of the procurator, and the distinction between a procurator and an advocate, see the commentary on cc. 1481–1490.

The libellus must be either accepted or rejected by the court in a formal decree. As is true of any decree (cc. 51 and 1617), it is to be in writing and must include a summary of the reasons for the decision.[9]

A petition can be rejected only for reasons specified in this canon; otherwise it must be admitted for a hearing.

In deciding to accept or reject a libellus, the single judge or president of a college of judges first considers two questions: (1) whether there is a basis for the tribunal to assume jurisdiction immediately or at least to seek authorization to assume it, and (2) whether the petitioner has legal standing to initiate the suit. If the answer to either of these threshold questions is negative, the petition must be rejected (c. 1505, §2, 1°–2°).

Next, the formalities of the libellus are examined to assure that all requirements are met. Then the judge assesses whether a fumus boni iuris, a sign that there is at least some basis for the claim, is present. Finally, the judge assesses whether there is at least some hope of bringing forward proof for the claim. If the formalities required for a libellus have not been observed or if there is no basis or potential proof of the claim, the judge rejects the libellus.

§3. If the libellus has been rejected because of defects which can be corrected, the petitioner can resubmit a new, correctly prepared libellus to the same judge.

§4. A party is always free within ten available days to make recourse with substantiating reasons against the rejection of a libellus either to the appellate tribunal or to the college if the libellus was rejected by the presiding judge; the question of the rejection is to be decided as promptly as possible (expeditissime).

In face of a rejection of a libellus, a petitioner can remedy the defects and re-present the petition (c. 1505, §3). While a canonical advocate is not specifically mentioned by this canon, equity suggests that the tribunal make the services of an advocate available to a petitioner to assist in this attempt.

Within ten days "available time" (tempus utile),[10] the petitioner also has the right to "make recourse against" the decision rejecting a libellus.[11] This recourse means more than simply objecting to the decision; it entails a "reasoned" argument that the rejection was inappropriate.

If the initial rejection was issued by a sole judge, then recourse is taken to the court of appeals. If the petition was rejected by the president of a college of judges, the appeal normally is directed to the full panel.[12]

The appellate court or the college of judges is charged to decide the recourse "as promptly as possible" (expeditissime). In accord with canon 1629, 5°, there is no appeal beyond this decision.[13]

[9] A decree accepting a libellus could be viewed as "merely procedural" (c. 1617) and need simply state that the libellus contains the elements specified in c. 1504 without any further discussion of reasons. A decree rejecting the libellus, however, should provide the reasons for the rejection so that a petitioner will have some idea on how the libellus might be amended.

[10] Tempus utile is distinguished from continuous time, and refers to a period within which a party has the ability to act. See the commentary on cc. 200–203 for reflections on the computation of time in canon law.

[11] The Church's procedural law distinguishes between an "appeal" (a challenge directed against the merits of a formal judicial decision) and "recourse" (a challenge against administrative decisions or against certain procedural decisions in a judicial trial such as the rejection of a libellus).

[12] While the canon envisions this as the normal approach, nothing prevents a petitioner from immediately taking recourse against the rejection to the appellate tribunal rather than to the full college of judges.

[13] Realistically, since cases involving the status of persons are never a res iudicata (see cc. 1641–1644), a prospective petitioner would be free to "try again" by lodging a totally new petition at some future date. For example, several years after the rejection of a libellus, a petitioner might learn new information that would open up previously unsuspected avenues of investigation. In such a case (while not ignoring a prior rejection), an ecclesiastical judge rightly would examine the merits of the new petition.

Canon 1506 — If within a month from the presentation of the libellus the judge has not issued a decree which accepts or rejects the libellus according to the norm of can. 1505, the interested party can insist that the judge fulfill his function. If the judge takes no action within ten days from the request, then the libellus is to be considered as accepted.

Since ecclesiastical trials are vehicles for vindicating rights, the law provides a remedy when a judge fails to act in response to a legitimate petition. If neither a decision to accept or reject the libellus is made within one month after its submission, the petitioner can insist that the judge act on it. The petitioner would be wise to do this in writing, documenting the fact that the action was taken. If ten further days pass without a response, the libellus is accepted by virtue of the law itself.[14]

CHAPTER II THE CITATION AND NOTIFICATION OF JUDICIAL ACTS [cc. 1507–1512]

Canon 1507 — §1. In the decree which accepts the libellus of the petitioner, the judge or the presiding judge must call the other parties to trial, that is, cite them to the joinder of the issue, establishing whether they must respond in writing or present themselves before the judge to come to agreement about the doubts. If from the written responses the judge perceives it necessary to convene the parties, the judge can establish that by a new decree.

§2. If the libellus is considered as accepted according to the norm of can. 1506, the decree of citation to the trial must be issued within twenty days from the request mentioned in that canon.

§3. If the litigating parties de facto present themselves before the judge to pursue the case, however, there is no need for a citation, but the notary is to note in the acts that the parties were present for the trial.

In the decree accepting the petition, the court also issues an official citation (or summons) to the respondent and to the other parties whose involvement in the case is required (e.g., a defender of the bond or promoter of justice).[15] The judicial citation informs these parties of the fact of the petition and its acceptance. The citation invites their participation in the first substantive action of the court—the "joinder of issues" at which the dubium (i.e., the "doubt," the terms of the controversy) is to be defined. Thus, sufficient information needs to be sought at this time to identify the essential question(s) and to narrow the focus of the subsequent investigation. At this stage of the trial, seeking a written response from the respondent and other participants is an option. The citation should specify whether the response to the citation is to be in writing or in person.

It may be that, having requested and reviewed written responses to the citation, the judge determines that the nature of those responses requires seeing the parties in person before it is possible to define the issue. In this case, the judge issues a new decree delaying the joinder and calling the parties to an initial hearing.

If a petition was accepted in the extraordinary manner provided in canon 1506, the court is required to issue this initial citation within twenty days of the party's insistence on action (hence, within ten days of the automatic acceptance of the petition).

Finally, the citation is a means to an end and not the end in itself. Thus, if the parties to the trial [14] In a properly staffed and well-organized tribunal, the acceptance of a libellus by default should never occur. If, however, a petition is accepted in this extraordinary fashion, petitioners and their procurators may need to exercise special care to assure that the petition is handled appropriately.

[15] For a description of the role of these critically important officers of the court, see the commentary on cc. 1430–1436.

are actually present to prosecute the case, their rights are respected and a formal citation would be unnecessary. When this occurs, the notary is responsible to assure that the acts of the case reflect the presence of the parties.

Canon 1508 — §1. The decree of citation to the trial must be communicated immediately to the respondent and at the same time to others who must appear.

§2. The libellus which introduces litigation is to be attached to the citation unless for grave causes the judge determines that the libellus must not be made known to the party before that party makes a deposition in the trial.

A notification of the citation is to be communicated immediately to the respondent and other concerned parties. Normally, the libellus presented by the petitioner is to be attached to the citation. A judge may, however, delay the communication of the libellus in order first to seek initial testimony from a respondent. For example, the judge may see a need to obtain preliminary information from a respondent because his or her review of the petitioner's claims might give rise to anger or excessive defensiveness which could color subsequent testimony. Should the judge deem this necessary, however, the decree of citation should specify why the judge has chosen this course of action.

§3. If litigation is introduced against someone who does not have the free exercise of his or her rights or the free administration of the things in dispute, the citation must be communicated, as the case may be, to the guardian, curator, or special procurator, that is, the one who is bound to undertake the trial in the name of that person according to the norm of law.

When someone lacks the ability to stand trial personally, the norms governing the process of recognizing or appointing a guardian or other curator to protect the person's rights are to be observed.[16] In such a situation, the citation is communicated to the guardian.

Canon 1509 — §1. The notification of citations, decrees, sentences, and other judicial acts must be made through the public postal services or by some other very secure method according to the norms established in particular law.

§2. The fact of notification and its method must be evident in the acts.

While this canon is located in the context of the initial citation, its norms apply to the notification of all judicial decrees, sentences, and other acts issued by the tribunal in the course of a trial.

Since the communication of a citation has very significant consequences, it is vital that those cited receive this notification.[17] To forestall any charge that a person's rights were violated, it is also critical that the acts of a case contain some indication that the citation was properly communicated. The canon expressly accepts delivery through postal services as an appropriate means of notification. Recognizing, however, that different circumstances render any one method inadequate for a worldwide Church, this canon provides for particular law to determine other secure means of notification.

Obviously, the participation of the parties establishes the fact of citation. When a party does not participate, it is especially critical that the acts reflect that the party was duly cited. In this circumstance, one "secure" practice is to use "return receipt" registered mail.

[16] See the commentary on cc. 1478–1480. Those norms identify persons unable to stand trial personally and govern the appointment of guardians and curators.

[17] Significantly, a properly cited party who neither appears nor provides a reasonable excuse for being unable to appear may be decreed absent (see c. 1592). As a consequence, those absent parties effectively waive a number of their rights in the trial. See the commentary on cc. 1592 and 1594.

Canon 1510 — A respondent who refuses to accept the document of citation or who prevents its delivery is considered to be legitimately cited.

This norm protects a petitioner from a respondent who might attempt to obstruct the trial by evading the citation. When there is evidence that a citation was evaded or refused, the tribunal is to consider the respondent duly notified and is to proceed with the trial.

Canon 1511 — If the citation was not communicated legitimately, the acts of the process are null, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1507, §3.

Canon 1512 — When the citation has been communicated legitimately or the parties have appeared before the judge to pursue the case:

1° the matter ceases to be res integra;

2° the case becomes proper to the otherwise competent judge or tribunal before which the action was initiated;

3° the jurisdiction of a delegated judge is fixed in such a way that it does not cease when the authority of the one delegating expires;

4° prescription is interrupted unless other provision is made;

5° the litigation begins to be pending; therefore, the principle while litigation is pending, nothing is to be altered immediately takes effect.

These norms specify the effects of the transmittal or failure to transmit a citation. If the citation is not properly communicated, the procedural acts of the process are null and void (unless the party de facto participated). Any resulting decision certainly would be vulnerable to a complaint of remediable nullity (c. 1622, 5°), and likely would be irremediably null as a violation of the right of defense (c. 1620, 7°).

What of the situation where a respondent's whereabouts cannot be determined? Does the inability to cite a respondent prevent the process from moving forward? No. Provided all reasonable efforts have been made to locate a respondent, a tribunal may hear a case when the respondent's whereabouts remain unknown.[18] Great care needs to be taken in these circumstances, first to assure that genuine efforts were made to locate the respondent and, second, to assure that the rights of the respondent are not ignored or violated if the process moves ahead. If the whereabouts of a respondent are discovered during the trial, that person must then be cited and invited to participate in the process. There is no need, however, to declare null the procedural acts posited up to that point.[19]

A properly communicated citation (or the fact of the participation of the one cited) brings with it a number of judicial effects.

1. First, the matter in question ceases to be a res integra. In other words, the contested nature of the right or object involved is officially recognized and considered subject to judgment.

2. Second, presuming that there is a sufficient legal basis, the jurisdiction of the tribunal is secured. Therefore, other potentially competent tribunals are "prevented" from acting (c. 1415). Furthermore, any changes of circumstances subsequent to this do not interfere with the tribunal's competence. Thus, for example, if a court has jurisdiction as the domicile of the [18] That the law envisions this possibility is evident in c. 1409, §2, which makes provision for a petition to be accepted at the tribunal of the domicile of the petitioner when the domicile or quasi-domicile of a respondent is unknown and no other legitimate forum is available. See ApSig, decr De foro competenti in causa nullitatis matrimonii, April 6, 1973, P 62 (1973) 590–591. Translated in CLD 8, 1196–1197. See also J. Provost, "Competent Tribunal When Respondent's Address Is Unknown," J 44 (1984) 244–246.

[19] Of course, if a respondent shows that the petitioner was aware of his or her whereabouts and concealed that information, then that attempt to deny the right of defense would render the process invalid.

respondent when it issues the citation, a subsequent move of the respondent to another diocese would not deprive the tribunal of its competence to complete the case.

3. Similarly, the jurisdiction of a delegated judge (iudice delegato)[20] appointed to process the case is firmly established and will perdure even if the authority of the one who initially delegated the judge later expires.

4. The passage of time affecting possible prescription (cc. 197–199) is interrupted, unless the law provides otherwise.

5. The matter is considered "pending" or officially under adjudication.[21] This has the consequence of prohibiting the introduction of any innovation, any transfer of control, or any other action that might prejudice the rights of one or more of the parties to the trial.

[20] The term "delegated judge" is found in the Latin code only in this canon, although reference to delegating judges is also made in cc. 1427, §2 (a judge delegated by a supreme moderator of a religious institute of pontifical right); 1442 (a papal delegate); and 1495 (a judge delegated for one case only). Other sorts of delegated judges are found in canonical tradition. For example, c. 1607, 2° of the 1917 code speaks of a judge delegated by a local ordinary.

In the 1983 code, however, the idea of a delegated judge seems to be an exception to c. 135, §3 (CCEO 985, §3) which states that judicial power, except for the performance of some preliminary acts, cannot be delegated. Clearly, a "delegated judge" as used in c. 1512, 3° is not an auditor or merely someone delegated to handle some preparatory acts but a true judge. Does this refer only to the religious and papal delegates of cc. 1427 and 1442? J. Abbass thinks not. In "Contentious Trials," 888–889, nn. 56–57, he states that the prohibition against delegating judicial power extends only to individual judges and judicial colleges. According to Abbass, a bishop remains free to delegate a judge, and he notes that CCEO 1102, §2 foresees this possibility.

[21] Canon 1194, 5° of the Eastern code differs, stating that with the citation the "instance of the suit begins." For the significance of this difference, see Abbas, "Contentious Trials," 891–892.

Title II
The Joinder of the Issue[22]
[cc. 1513–1516]

The Notion and Purpose of the Joinder

Canon 1513 — §1. The joinder of the issue (contestatio litis) occurs when the terms of the controversy, derived from the petitions and responses of the parties, are defined through a decree of the judge.

§2. The petitions and responses of the parties, besides those in the libellus which introduces the litigation, can be expressed either in a response to the citation or in the oral declarations made before the judge; in more difficult cases, however, the judge must convene the parties to resolve the doubt or doubts which must be answered in the sentence.

The joinder of the issue is the definition of the terms of the controversy by a decree of the judge. Normally, the issue is phrased in the form of a question or questions to which an affirmative or negative response is given at the completion of the process (e.g., "Whether the marriage between the petitioner and the respondent has been proven invalid on the ground(s) of A and B?").

The purpose of the joinder of the issue is to focus the investigation of the tribunal on the specific question or questions to be decided. It establishes the "matter about which the entire controversy will revolve."[23] Thus, it is a critical moment in the process and shapes the subsequent instruction of the case.

The definition of the issue(s) is an act of the judge, specified in a judicial decree.[24] It reflects [22] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 973–974; Coyle, in CLSGBI Com, 869–870; L. Madero, in Pamplona ComEng, 943–945; Arroba Conde, in Valencia Com, 667–668; A. Stankiewicz, in Com Ex IV/2, 1232–1246.

[23] Pompedda, "Decision-Sentence," 82.

[24] Thus, while it initiates the process, the "entire controversy . . . is not totally expressed in a 'libellus,'" and the court is not limited to the potential grounds brought forward in the libellus or in any counterclaims of the respondent. Pompedda, "Decision-Sentence," 82.

the court's evaluation of the pleadings and responses of the petitioner and the respondent (as well as the defender of the bond and promoter of justice when the nature of the case requires their participation).

The canon envisions two means whereby the issue may be joined. Most commonly, the judge reviews the written and oral statements of the parties to the case and defines the issue on the basis of that information. Alternatively, in more difficult cases, the judge may call the parties together and define the issue by means of a discussion. Ideally, both parties would agree on the formulation of the issue, although nothing prevents the judge from defining the question(s) at issue if the parties cannot agree.

Notification and Potential Challenge to the Definition of the Issue

§3. The decree of the judge must be communicated to the parties; unless they have already agreed to the terms, the parties can make recourse to the judge within ten days in order to change them; a decree of the judge, however, must resolve the question as promptly as possible (expeditissime).

Once the issue has been defined, the parties are to be informed of the decision of the judge and given ten days to request the amendment of the ground(s), or the addition of a different ground, or the deletion of one or more of the grounds. The judge's decision in the face of a challenge is to be made expeditissime and hence is not subject to appeal (c. 1629, 5°).

Clearly, the very structure of these norms indicates the high value placed on obtaining input from both the petitioner and respondent in specifying the question(s) at issue. What should be done, then, if a respondent does not reply to the citation? There are a number of options. The judge may choose to decree the respondent absent and determine the issue without any testimony from the respondent. In this case, the absent respondent has effectively waived his or her right to participate in the formulation of the ground (see the commentary on c. 1592). If there is a founded hope that the respondent will eventually participate, the judge could delay for a time the definition of the issue while further efforts are made to secure the respondent's input. Given the expectations of canon 1453, however, such a delay must not infringe on the petitioner's right to a decision within a reasonable time.[25]

Changing the Definition of the Issue

Canon 1514 — Once established, the terms of the controversy cannot be changed validly except by a new decree, for a grave cause, at the request of a party, and after the other parties have been heard and their arguments considered.

Once the issue has been defined, it acquires a certain stability. A change in the terms of the controversy can validly be made only in accord with the provisions of this canon. Four things are required.

1. One party (including the defender of the bond or promoter of justice when they are involved) must request the amendment or addition of a ground. While enjoying a great deal of autonomy in managing the trial, a judge cannot change the ground without such a request.

2. There must be a "grave cause" for the change (e.g., assuring a just decision).

3. The other parties to the case must be consulted about the proposed change and their arguments carefully considered. An objection by one or more of the parties, however, does not prevent the judge from admitting the change.

[25] If it seems just to delay joining the issue in the hope that some additional time will secure the respondent's input, the judge may deem the avoidance of excessive delays as the "grave cause" required to gather at least some proofs before the joinder (c. 1529).

4. The judge must issue a decree specifying the change and summarizing the reasons for admitting the change (cc. 51 and 1617).

In the absence of any of these steps, an alteration of the ground is invalid; any subsequent decision is vulnerable to a complaint of remediable nullity under canon 1622, 5°.[26]

Effect of the Joinder on Possession of Property

Canon 1515 — After the issue has been joined, the possessor of the property of another ceases to be in good faith; therefore, if the possessor is sentenced to restore the property, the person must also return the profits made from the day of the joinder and repair any damages.

If the contention concerns a dispute over property, the joinder of the issue puts the possessor on notice that the ownership of the property is under adjudication. Officially, the possession is no longer "in good faith."[27]

Should the trial result in a decision mandating that the possessor hand over the property, all profit made from the point of the joinder must also be handed over, and restitution must be made for any damages suffered as the result of the possession.

Time Limits for Proposing Proofs

Canon 1516 — After the issue has been joined, the judge is to prescribe a suitable time for the parties to present and complete the proofs.

The joinder of the issue completes the preliminary stage of the trial and inaugurates the "instruction" of the case (i.e., the evidence-gathering phase). While the parties have the chief responsibility to bring forward appropriate proofs of their claims,[28] the judge has the authority to establish reasonable time limits suitable for the nature of the case. Those time limits may be extended in accord with the provisions of canon 1465, §2, provided there are no undue delays (c. 1465, §3).

For marriage cases, canon 1677, §4 further specifies that the judge is to arrange for the instruction of the case ten days after the notification of the decree of the joinder, unless objections were raised against that decree.

Title III
The Trial of the Litigation[29]
[cc. 1517–1525]

The Life Span of a Trial

Canon 1517 — A trial begins with the citation; it ends not only by the pronouncement of a definitive sentence but also by other methods defined by law.[30]

The first part of this norm reiterates the provisions of canon 1512 indicating that the citation (summons) begins the trial.[31]

[26] The value of stability in the definition of the issue is also protected by c. 1639, §1, which prohibits the introduction of a new ground in the appeal process. Canon 1683, however, makes an exception for marriage nullity cases, permitting the introduction of a new ground on the appellate level which is adjudicated as if in first instance.

[27] Canon 198 provides that the possession must be in "good faith" throughout the "entire course of time required for prescription." In the circumstances of a trial, however, prescription was already interrupted by the communication of the citation (c. 1512, 4°).

[28] The judge, however, has a role in seeking out evidence to supply for the parties' negligence or inability to bring forward appropriate proof (see c. 1452, §2).

[29] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 975–976; Coyle, in CLSGBI Com, 870–873; Madero, in Pamplona ComEng, 945–949; Arroba Conde, in Valencia Com, 668–671; J. Carreras, in Com Ex IV/2, 1247–1268.

[30] There is no counterpart to c. 1517 in the Eastern code. See Abbass, "Contentious Trials," 880–881.

[31] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 975, explains that the 1917 code's distinction between the beginning of the litigation and the beginning of the instance has been eliminated by this norm of the 1983 code.

Once initiated, the normal means of bringing the trial to conclusion is through a judicial sentence. Other ways in which a trial can be interrupted or terminated are suspension (cc. 1518–1519 and 1681), peremption or abatement (cc. 1520–1523), renunciation (cc. 1524–1525), and reconciliation or arbitration (cc. 1713 and 1676).

Suspension of a Case and Its Effects

A trial may be interrupted due to factors relating to the parties (c. 1518) or their representatives (c. 1519). In marriage nullity cases, a case may also be suspended to investigate the possible non-consummation of the union (c. 1681).

During a suspension, the development of the trial proper ceases until the cause of the suspension is addressed. The trial may then resume, and the time during which the case was suspended is not computed relative to peremption.[32]

Suspension Due to a Change in the Status of a Party to the Trial

Canon 1518 — If the litigating party dies, changes status, or ceases from the office in virtue of which action is taken:

1° if the case has not yet been concluded, the trial is suspended until the heir of the deceased, the successor, or an interested party resumes the litigation;

2° if the case has been concluded, the judge must proceed to the additional acts, after having cited the procurator, if there is one, or otherwise the heir of the deceased or the successor.

When death or some other change of status affecting a party's capacity to act in the litigation occurs, two possibilities result depending on how far the process has advanced.

1. The process is suspended by the law itself as long as it has not reached the stage of formal conclusion of the probative phase of the process (c. 1599). The trial may be resumed only if a person with standing to do so pursues the matter.[33]

2. If the process has been formally concluded, the judge must proceed to a final decision, first citing the procurator, heir, or successor of the party whose status has changed. Canon 1675, §2 specifies that, if one of the parties dies, this norm applies in marriage nullity cases.

Lawrence Wrenn suggested that the phrase causa conclusa might be interpreted to refer to the issuance of the definitive decision rather than the "conclusion" spoken of in canon 1599.[34] Most commentators, however, do not agree with this interpretation.

Suspension Due to a Change in the Status of a Representative of a Party

Canon 1519 — §1. If the guardian, curator, or procurator who is necessary according to the norm of can. 1481, §§1 and 3 ceases from that function, the trial is suspended in the meantime.

§2. The judge, however, is to appoint another guardian or curator as soon as possible; the judge can appoint a procurator for the litigation if the party has neglected to do so within the brief time period established by the judge.

[32] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 975.

[33] Carreras, in Com Ex IV/2, 1257–1258, and Madero, in Pamplona ComEng, 946, argue that this situation provides an exception to the norm of c. 1674 and allows a third party with an interest involved to continue the process of impugning a marriage. While the text of c. 1518 makes this argument reasonable, the interest must be compelling. The situation envisioned in c. 1675, §1, where the resolution of some other controversy depends on the question of the validity of the marriage, could provide an example of a legitimate interest in proceeding.

[34] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 975.

A temporary suspension of the process takes place only in the narrow circumstance of a trial where a representative for the parties is required by canon 1481, §1 or §3 (e.g., contentious trials involving the public good or a minor).[35]

When this suspension occurs, if a guardian or curator is needed (see c. 1478–1479), the judge is to provide for a new one as quickly as possible.

If a procurator is needed, the judge is to give a brief period of time for the affected party to appoint a new representative. If such an appointment is not made within the allotted time, the judge is to appoint a procurator ad litem so that the litigation can be resumed.

Peremption (Abatement)

Canon 1520 — If the parties, without any impediment, propose no procedural act for six months, the trial is abated. Particular law can establish other terms of abatement.

Peremption or abatement occurs as a result of the failure of the parties to place any procedural act for a period of six months. If, however, some legitimate cause has impeded the parties from acting, abatement does not take effect. Particular law may establish a different period of time, longer or shorter, after which abatement takes effect. It should be noted that abatement does not take effect as a result of the mere passage of time, but rather from the failure of the petitioner and respondent to act within the specified time. Thus, delays resulting from a backlog in the tribunal or as a result of the negligence of the court itself do not bring about abatement.

[35] Canon 1481, §3 specifically excludes marriage nullity cases from those contentious trials involving the public good where a judge is required to appoint a legal representative when a party lacks one. In marriage nullity cases, however, judges retain the discretion to do so if they deem it necessary.

Canon 1521 — Abatement takes effect by the law itself against all persons, including minors or those equivalent to minors, and must be declared ex officio, without prejudice to the right of seeking indemnity against guardians, curators, administrators, or procurators, who have not proved that they were not negligent.

Canon 1522 — Abatement extinguishes the acts of the process but not the acts of the case; indeed these acts can also have force in another trial provided that the case involves the same persons and the same issue; regarding those not party to the case, however, the acts have no force other than that of documents.

Canon 1523 — Each litigant is to bear the expenses of the abated trial which that litigant has incurred.

Abatement takes effect automatically, by the force of the law itself, and affects all parties to the case. The judge, however, is to make the parties aware of the fact by declaring that abatement has taken effect.

Since abatement may stem from negligence (e.g., the failure of a procurator to act), canon 1521 recognizes the right of a party injured by abatement to bring an action against those at fault. Canon 1523 provides that the parties are liable for the court's expenses incurred prior to abatement.

Abatement extinguishes the judicial instance. In other words, all procedural acts taken up to that point lose their force. Abatement does not, however, vitiate the value of the substantive acts of the case. Therefore, any testimony secured prior to abatement remains in the file and can be employed in a new instance involving the same parties and same issues. Those substantive acts may also serve as documentary evidence in other ecclesiastical trials. An authentic interpretation of May 17, 1986 clarified the fact that, should one of the parties wish to initiate a new petition subsequent to the abatement of a prior instance, it is not necessary to lodge the petition before the original tribunal.[36] Any court with recognized jurisdiction at the time of the new petition may accept the libellus and may employ the substantive acts from the earlier process.[37]

Renunciation

Canon 1524 — §1. The petitioner can renounce the trial at any stage or grade of the trial; likewise both the petitioner and the respondent can renounce either all or only some of the acts of the process.

§2. To renounce a trial, guardians and administrators of juridic persons need the counsel or consent of those whose involvement is required to place acts which exceed the limits of ordinary administration.

§3. To be valid, a renunciation must be written and signed by the party or by a procurator of the party who has a special mandate to do so; it must be communicated to the other party, accepted or at least not challenged by that party, and accepted by the judge.

Since the petitioner initiated the process, only the petitioner may renounce the instance itself. Both parties, however, have the right to renounce any or all procedural acts. Should all the procedural acts be renounced and that renunciation admitted, the instance is effectively ended.

A renunciation can take place at any point in the trial. It can be lodged before a tribunal of first, second, or any further instance.

Renunciation is considered an extraordinary matter. Thus, before placing an act of renunciation, a guardian or administrator may need to seek counsel or consent from the appropriate person or bodies as required by law (cf. cc. 638, 1277). Nor is a procurator free to posit a renunciation unless given a special mandate to do so (c. 1485).

For the validity of a renunciation, the following must occur:

1. the renunciation must be expressed in writing and signed by the party (or procurator with a special mandate) placing it;
2. the renunciation must be communicated to the other party;
3. the other party must either accept the renunciation or at least raise no opposition to it;[38]
4. the renunciation must be admitted by the judge, who retains the discretion to refuse to accept a renunciation in order better to serve justice.

If any of these elements is lacking, the renunciation has no force and the trial continues.

Canon 1525 — A renunciation accepted by the judge has the same effects for the acts renounced as the abatement of the trial; it also obliges the renouncing party to pay the expenses for the acts renounced.

The judicial effects of a renunciation that has been admitted are identical to the effects of abatement (c. 1522), with the exception that the court expenses become the responsibility of the renouncing party.

[36] PCILT, responsa ad proposita dubia, May 17, 1986, AAS 78 (1986) 1324. Also see L. Wrenn, Authentic Interpretations on the 1983 Code (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1993) 29–30.

[37] In fact, the original tribunal may have lost any claim to jurisdiction. For instance, jurisdiction may originally have been based on the domicile of the respondent. But if at the time of the new petition the respondent is no longer domiciled in that diocese, the original court has lost that basis to adjudicate the case. Unless some other basis for jurisdiction is present, the original court would be prevented from reopening the case.

[38] There is a more stringent norm in penal trials where, for a valid renunciation, the accused must accept the renunciation (unless the accused was decreed absent from the trial). See the commentary on c. 1724, §2.

TITLE IV
PROOFS[39]
[cc. 1526–1586]

Introduction

The title on proofs constitutes the longest section of Book VII. The process of gathering and assessing evidence, commonly known as the "instruction" of the case, is under the direction of the judge. It is on the basis of the proofs assembled that the judge must reach moral certitude and pronounce a decision in the controversy (c. 1609, §2).

A proof is a demonstration, in whole or in part, of the truth of matters relevant to the question at issue. Proofs may be direct or indirect in nature. Certain forms of evidence may provide "full proof," although more commonly it is in the "aggregate of proofs and indications" that the truth is discovered.[40]

After a series of introductory canons referring to proofs in general, the six chapters of this title discuss distinct sources of proof recognized at canon law. Those sources yield various types of evidence of differing probative value.

The instruction of a case is not merely a matter of assembling information. Sifting, weighing, and evaluating the evidence is also crucial. These norms contain principles to assist the judge in that art.

Burden of Proof

Canon 1526 — §1. The burden of proof rests upon the person who makes the allegation.

In accord with ancient principles of law, the canon clearly asserts the responsibility of the one making a claim to bring forth evidence establishing that claim. Initially, that burden rests on the petitioner, although a respondent may assume the burden of proof in establishing any counterclaims made in response to the initial petition.

Once a trial is initiated, however, the judge also assumes a responsibility to seek and act in accord with the truth. Thus, while not removing the burden of proof from the parties, this canon must be interpreted in light of canon 1452, §2, which affirms the judge's right and duty to "supply for the negligence of the parties in furnishing proofs" in order to avoid a "gravely unjust judgment."

Matters Not Requiring Proof

§2. The following do not need proof:
1° matters presumed by the law itself;
2° facts alleged by one of the contending parties and admitted by the other unless the law or the judge nevertheless requires proof.

Some matters require no proof, such as when the law itself establishes a presumption. For example, canon 1060 establishes a presumption in favor of the validity of a marriage; canon 1061, §2 presumes the consummation of a marriage subsequent to the cohabitation of the parties; canon 1321, §3 establishes the presumption of imputability whenever an external violation of ecclesiastical law or precept has occurred. Such presumptions, however, can be overturned by sufficient evidence to the contrary.

Also exempted from the requirement of proof are facts alleged by one party and admitted by the other party (see c. 1536, §1). This holds unless the law or the judge requires additional proof. The law does provide otherwise in cases concerning the public good (c. 1536, §2), which include marriage nullity cases (c. 1691). In these cases, the declarations of the parties alone do not normally constitute full proof.[41]

[39] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 976–988; R. Bourgon, in CLSGBI Com, 873–895; J. Calvo, in Pamplona ComEng, 949–983; Arroba Conde, in Valencia Com, 671–688; J. P. Schouppe et al., in Com Ex IV/2, 1269–1430.

[40] Pius XII, alloc, October 1, 1942, AAS 34 (1942) 338–343. Translation in CLD 3, 605–611.

[41] See the commentary on cc. 1536–1537 and 1679 for circumstances in which the declarations of the parties might constitute full proof.

Admissible Proofs

Canon 1527 — §1. Proofs of any kind which seem useful for adjudicating the case and are licit can be brought forward.

§2. If a party insists that a proof rejected by a judge be accepted, the judge is to decide the matter as promptly as possible (expeditissime).

This title identifies various types of proof that are licit (e.g., declarations of the parties, documents, etc.). The canon also leaves the door open for the admission of types of proof not foreseen by the code, such as videotapes and various forms of electronic transmissions.[42] Normally, a judge will be flexible and provide sufficient latitude for the parties to bring forward proofs. Ruling on the liceity and utility of any particular proof, however, is the responsibility of the judge. For example, a judge could refuse to admit a proof obtained by an immoral means. Similarly, a judge can refuse useless proofs or those brought forward as delaying tactics, such as the multiplication of witnesses (c. 1553).

If a judge rejects a proposed proof, the one proposing it can ask for a reconsideration of that rejection. The judge is then to rule expeditissime, meaning that no further appeal can be made against the decision (c. 1629, 5°).

Alternative Methods for Obtaining Testimony

Canon 1528 — If a party or a witness refuses to appear before the judge to testify, it is permissible to hear them through a lay person designated by the judge or to require of them a declaration either before a notary public or in any other legitimate manner.

Since discovering the truth is the primary goal of the instruction of a case, great latitude is afforded the judge or auditor in obtaining evidence from a less than fully cooperative party or witness. When people refuse to appear at the tribunal and testify in the usual manner, their testimony may be sought through third parties designated by the tribunal, by means of a written and notarized declaration, or in "any other legitimate manner." What might constitute another legitimate manner? The code does not specify, and certain questions have arisen over the manner in which tribunals sometimes seek testimony. The use of written questionnaires has been challenged by Zenon Grocholewski, who concludes that this "may not be accepted as an ordinary means of questioning the parties and/or the witnesses."[43] Grocholewski argues that testimony taken in this way does not satisfy the requirements governing the way the examination of the parties and witnesses is to be carried out, and results in evidence of very limited probative force. John Beal, on the other hand, questions whether such a restrictive reading of canon 1528 is justifiable, and argues that the practice can be justified especially in situations "where a party or a witness would, in the judgment of a tribunal, refuse or be reluctant to appear personally."[44]

The practice of seeking testimony by telephone is not authorized by the code,[45] but neither is it ruled out in the canons themselves. Seeking testimony by telephone, however, has been strongly criticized by Grocholewski and others.[46] Certainly, [42] As more and more communication is handled electronically, these sources of proof will grow in importance. Much as with documents (see c. 1543), care will need to be taken to assure the authenticity of the proof brought forward. Assessing whether electronic communications have been altered may present a new area in which tribunals will need to employ the services of experts (see cc. 1574–1581).

[43] Z. Grocholewski, "Interrogation by Letter or Telephone," in CLSA Advisory Opinions 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995) 460–465.

[44] J. Beal, "Making Connections: Procedural Law and Substantive Justice," J 54 (1994) 162.

[45] A proposal to authorize the use of the telephone was made but not accepted during the code revision process because of a fear of abuses (Comm 11 [1979] 114). Also see the commentary on c. 1558.

[46] Grocholewski, "Interrogation," 460–465. He does, however, leave the door partly open to alternative means of taking testimony by concluding that "an interrogation by letter or telephone could be justified only by the most exceptional circumstances" (464).

there are dangers connected with attempting to secure testimony by telephone. Yet the tribunal has a responsibility to seek the truth in order to make a just decision. When a party or witness is unwilling to provide evidence in any other fashion, that underlying responsibility can be in tension or conflict with a stance that would never admit testimony obtained by telephone. Certainly, Grocholewski is correct in concluding that obtaining testimony by telephone is not an "ordinary" manner of proceeding.[47] Creative approaches might well provide means to alleviate many of the concerns related to this method of taking testimony. For example, a witness could be asked to go to the offices of a local parish and present testimony by telephone from that location. The parish priest or other parish official could verify the identity of the party and serve as notary while the judge or auditor posed questions by telephone. Similarly, the use of videoconferencing technology could also provide an effective means of interrogating the parties and witnesses that would ease the burdens on them while preserving many of the values of an interview in the tribunal's offices.

Prohibition of Evidence Gathering before the Joinder of the Issues

Canon 1529 — Except for a grave cause, the judge is not to proceed to collect the proofs before the joinder of the issue.

Since the purpose of the joinder of issues is to focus the investigation on the central question(s) to be decided by the court, that investigation is most fruitfully conducted after the issue has been defined. The nature of the questions asked, the appropriate witnesses to contact, the other sorts of proofs to be admitted are all affected by the nature of the matter at issue. Additionally, to respect the rights of the respondent, the investigation should not proceed until he or she has at least had an opportunity to contest the claims of the petitioner, to secure the services of an advocate, and to nominate witnesses.

The canon, however, provides for an exception to this norm, which permits the gathering of at least some evidence before the joinder when there is a "grave cause" for doing so. In the drafting of this canon, a specific decision was made to use the term "grave" cause rather than simply a "just" cause,[48] thus emphasizing the exceptional nature of this possibility. No list of grave causes is provided. The canonical tradition, however, provides guidance. Canon 1730 of the 1917 code specifically provided for securing the testimony of a witness who was in danger of death or who would be otherwise unavailable at a later time. Certainly, these two circumstances continue to constitute grave causes.[49] In practice, it is the judge who must weigh the gravity of arguments for collecting any proof before the joinder of the issue. While collecting proof prior to the joinder must never become the usual practice, the principle that justice should not be unduly delayed may sometimes provide a cause that is sufficiently grave.[50]

[47] Grocholewski, "Interrogation," 461. Should a judge deem it necessary to seek testimony by telephone, great care needs to be taken to assure the identity and freedom of the one making the deposition in order to eliminate or significantly mitigate the dangers feared by the code commission.

[48] Comm 16 (1984) 64.

[49] S. Raica, Canon 1529: A Historical and Canonical Study (Rome: Pontificia Universitas Gregoriana, 1996) 97–100, discusses the meaning of "grave cause" as used in this canon and concludes that the criterion to be used in determining such gravity is whether failure to seek the evidence prior to the joinder "would imperil the attainment of the truth" (100). Raica persuasively argues that fidelity to this norm is vital not only to the credibility of the trial process (avoiding the impression that the "process has occurred before the process") but also to maintain the right of privacy of the parties (90–91, 103).

[50] For example, in a particular case a respondent may not reply by the originally scheduled time of the joinder of the issues. When there is a good prospect that the respondent will take part in the trial, the judge may choose to delay the determination of the issue so that the ground or grounds joined are not based solely on the claims of the petitioner. Mindful, however, of the requirements of c. 1453, the judge may also conclude that these circum-

In practice, in the face of a persuasive argument that a grave cause is present, the judge would be able to issue a decree authorizing evidence gathering prior to the joinder.[51]

CHAPTER I
THE DECLARATIONS OF THE PARTIES
[cc. 1530–1538]

An important innovation of the 1983 code was the decision to include in the title on proofs the norms governing the collection and assessment of the declarations of the parties. The prior code had placed the canons on the declarations of the parties (CIC 1742–1746) in a separate title, distinct from the title on proof. In interpreting and implementing that code, the instruction Provida Mater Ecclesia had specifically excluded the "judicial declarations" of the parties as sufficient to constitute proof in marriage nullity cases.[52] The change in attitude toward such declarations reflects developments in the praxis and jurisprudence of the Roman Rota as well as a less suspicious and more respectful stance toward the parties and their testimony.[53]

Judge's Right to Question the Parties

Canon 1530 — The judge can always question the parties to draw out the truth more effectively and indeed must do so at the request of a party or to prove a fact which the public interest requires to be placed beyond doubt.

The judge is entrusted with the responsibility of discovering and ruling in accord with the truth. In light of this responsibility, the judge (or auditor) has a fundamental right to question the parties. Additionally, the judge must interrogate a party (1) when requested by one of the parties to the case (including the defender of the bond or promoter of justice) or (2) when the public good of the Church requires that some fact be established.

The Obligation to Testify Truthfully

Canon 1531 — §1. A party legitimately questioned must respond and must tell the whole truth.

A party to an ecclesiastical trial has an underlying obligation to testify truthfully. That obligation is nuanced in several ways. First, the questioning must be conducted in a legitimate fashion, by the judge or auditor and in accord with the norms for posing questions (see c. 1564). Further, the accused in a penal trial is not obligated to confess the crime and cannot be forced to testify under oath (c. 1728, §2).

If a party violates the obligation to tell the truth and commits perjury, he or she is possibly subject to an ecclesiastical penalty (c. 1368).

Evaluation of a Refusal to Answer

§2. If a party refuses to respond, it is for the judge to decide what can be inferred from that refusal concerning the proof of the facts.

When a party refuses to reply to a question, the significance of that refusal must be evaluated by the judge. Silence cannot automatically be interpreted as a tacit admission, and hence each situation must be carefully assessed.

Oath to Testify Truthfully

Canon 1532 — In cases where the public good is at stake, the judge is to administer an oath to the parties to tell the truth or at least to confirm the truth of what they have said unless a grave cause suggests otherwise; the same can be done in other cases according to the judge's own prudence.

stances provide a grave cause to gather at least some proofs before the joinder. See also the discussion at c. 1513, §3 above.

[51] Beal, "Making Connections," 154–159.

[52] SCSacr, instr Provida Mater Ecclesia, August 15, 1936, art. 117, AAS 28 (1936) 337. Translation in CLD 2, 500.

[53] P. Felici, "Juridical Formalities and Evaluations of Evidence in the Canonical Process," J 38 (1978) 153–157. Also see Pompedda, "Decision-Sentence," 90–91.

In cases which concern the public good (which according to c. 1691 always includes marriage nullity cases), the judge is to administer to the parties an oath to tell the truth or to confirm the truth of information previously provided. An oath is "the invocation of the divine name in witness to the truth" (c. 1199, §1). The fact that testimony was given under oath is a factor to be considered in the evaluation of evidence.

A judge may forego the oath for a grave cause, for example a conscientious objection to the taking of an oath. In cases that do not involve the public good, the administration of an oath is left to the judge's discretion.

In penal cases, the accused may not be compelled to take an oath (see c. 1728, §2), but he or she may wish to present testimony under oath.[54]

Preparation of Questions

Canon 1533 — The parties, the promoter of justice, and the defender of the bond can present the judge with items about which the party is to be questioned.

Canon 1534 — The provisions of cann. 1548, §2, n. 1, 1552, and 1558–1565 concerning witnesses are to be observed to the extent possible when questioning the parties.

While the judge or auditor directs the instruction of the case, the responsibility to seek the truth belongs to all participants in an ecclesiastical trial. In furtherance of that goal, the parties, their advocates, the defender of the bond, and the promoter of justice all have the right to ask the judge or auditor to interrogate the parties concerning various subjects or even to suggest specific questions to be posed. The judge or auditor then determines whether and in what manner to use these questions.[55]

The manner of conducting the interview is governed by the canons for the interrogation of witnesses adapted appropriately for the questioning of the parties.

Definition of a Judicial Confession

Canon 1535 — A judicial confession is the written or oral assertion of some fact against oneself before a competent judge by any party concerning the matter of the trial, whether made spontaneously or while being questioned by the judge.

With careful precision, this canon defines a judicial confession. Such a confession must involve a statement:

1. concerning factual matters (not speculation or statements of opinion);
2. made as part of the trial process, that is, to a judge or auditor, whether orally or in writing, whether spontaneously volunteered or admitted in response to questioning;
3. made by either the petitioner or respondent directly (a third party report of a statement allegedly made by one of the parties is not a judicial confession);
4. against the interests of the party in the trial (not every admission of fault or weakness is a confession, for such a statement may serve the interest of the party in the trial; similarly, a confession may consist of admissions of positive behaviors which are against the interests of the party);
5. and about a matter pertinent to the issue being investigated.

[54] Bourgon (in CLSGBI Com, 876) asserts that "in penal cases an oath may not be administered to the accused person." That conclusion goes beyond the norm of the canon. While it would never be appropriate subtly to pressure an accused to take an oath (which even a simple invitation might do), there is no reason to prevent the accused from volunteering to take the oath, an opinion held by J. Martin, in CLSGBI Com, 959.

[55] Canon 1561 leaves room for particular law to allow persons other than the judge or auditor to pose questions directly to witnesses. Since c. 1534 applies the norms for the interrogation of witnesses to the questioning of parties, similar particular law provisions could be enacted to allow direct questioning of parties by persons other than the judge or auditor.

Probative Force of Judicial Confessions

Canon 1536 — §1. The judicial confession of one party relieves the other parties from the burden of proof if it concerns some private matter and the public good is not at stake.

In matters where the public good is not at stake, a judicial confession relieves the other parties of the burden of proof (see c. 1526, §2, 2°). The judge must still evaluate the confession for its veracity and its relevance to the matter at issue. Thus, it may or may not provide full proof.

§2. In cases which regard the public good, however, a judicial confession and declarations of the parties which are not confessions can have a probative force which the judge must evaluate together with the other circumstances of the case; the force of full proof cannot be attributed to them, however, unless other elements are present which thoroughly corroborate them.

In cases involving the public good, both judicial confessions and other declarations made by the parties are attributed some, though normally not full, probative force.[56] The appropriate probative value must be determined by the judge in light of the evidence taken as a whole. In weighing these declarations, the judge is to consider "the other circumstances of the case" (ceteris causae adiunctis) and whether there are "other elements [alia elementa]... which thoroughly corroborate" those declarations.[57] For marriage nullity cases, canon 1679 provides for the use of testimony regarding the credibility of the parties as well as other "indications and supporting factors" (indicia et adminicula) in the evaluation of the declarations of the parties.

Extrajudicial Confessions

Canon 1537 — After considering all the circumstances, it is for the judge to decide how much value must be accorded an extrajudicial confession introduced into the trial.

An extrajudicial confession shares all of the characteristics of a judicial confession as described above, with the exception that the statement was made outside of the context of the trial. The statement is later brought to the attention of the court, often by a witness who heard the confession.

With due regard for the norm of canon 1538, the judge is to evaluate the weight of the confession in context of the evidence as a whole. For example, the judge would consider circumstances such as the confession's consistency with other statements and behaviors of the party, any ambiguity which the statement might contain, the quality of the memory of the person reporting the confession, etc. It should be noted, however, that there is no restriction against attributing full probative force to extrajudicial confessions.

The time at which an extrajudicial confession was made is significant in assessing its value. The judge would attribute greater weight to a confession uttered at a "non-suspect" time, i.e., before any thought of a trial arose, than to a statement made only after the contention was under way. While this canon refers only to confessions, the principles for evaluation are applicable to any extrajudicial declaration made by one of the parties.

Effect of Error, Force, or Fear

Canon 1538 — A confession or any other declaration of a party lacks any force if it is shown that it was made due to an error of fact or extorted by force or grave fear.

[56] Pompedda in "Decision-Sentence," 91, asks whether the depositions of the spouses are of themselves sufficient to induce moral certitude, and he responds that the answer "according to prevalent rotal jurisprudence is without a doubt in the affirmative."

[57] Pompedda, "Decision-Sentence," 91. For an analysis of the role of circumstances and corroborative elements in proof, see J. Beal, "The Substance of Things Hoped For: Proving Simulation of Matrimonial Consent," J 55 (1995) 751–753.

This norm protects the integrity of the tribunal's search for the truth. Any confession or declaration of the parties, judicial or extrajudicial, has no force at all if made through an error of fact, or if it was extorted through grave force or fear.[58]

CHAPTER II
PROOF THROUGH DOCUMENTS
[cc. 1539–1546]

Admissibility of Documents

Canon 1539 — In any kind of trial, proof by means of both public and private documents is allowed.

Proof by documents is admitted in all types of trials, whether involving the public or the private good, whether concerning marriage nullity, property issues, penal matters, or any other issue. The canon refers to "public" and "private" documents; the distinctions are clarified in the following canon.

Modern technological developments require an expanded understanding of this type of proof. The term documenta traditionally referred to various sorts of written materials. But other documentary evidence might include photographs, audio and video tape recordings, and information from other electronic media.[59]

[58] This norm makes "other provision" adapting the basic principles of law found in cc. 125 and 126 which govern the effect of force, fear, fraud, ignorance, or error on juridic acts. Precisely because the need to obtain the truth is so critical in an ecclesiastical trial, c. 1538 is more demanding than cc. 125–126, which at times recognize the validity of acts posited under the influence of such factors.

[59] Although the code commission chose not to adopt the broader term "instrument" rather than "document," this decision did not preclude the admission into evidence of these or other forms of documentary materials. See Comm 11 (1979) 105.

ARTICLE 1: THE NATURE AND TRUSTWORTHINESS OF DOCUMENTS
[cc. 1540–1543]

Kinds of Documents

Canon 1540 — §1. Public ecclesiastical documents are those which a public person has drawn up in the exercise of that person's function in the Church, after the solemnities prescribed by law have been observed.

§2. Public civil documents are those which the laws of each place consider to be such.

§3. Other documents are private.

The first paragraph of the canon specifies those elements which make an ecclesiastical document "public" in nature. The document must (1) be drawn up by a designated ecclesiastical official (2) in the exercise of his or her office or function (3) after having observed the proper formalities for preparing the document in question. Without these elements, the document is private. Examples of public ecclesiastical documents include rescripts of the Apostolic See and other ecclesiastical authorities, tribunal decrees, and certificates of baptism and the reception of other sacraments.

Paragraph two is an example of the canonization of civil law (c. 22), since canon law accepts the legal definition of documents provided by the civil authority of the place. Depending on such civil norms, examples of public civil documents could include birth, marriage, and death certificates, the rulings of civil courts, and police and other governmental records.

All documents that do not meet the standards of the first two paragraphs are considered private. Examples include letters, diaries, financial records, tape recordings, calendar entries, and a host of other materials.

Value of Public Documents

Canon 1541 — Unless contrary and evident arguments prove otherwise, public documents are to be trusted concerning everything which they directly and principally affirm.[60]

Public documents, whether ecclesiastical or civil, carry probative weight. Such documents are presumed by canon law to be fully accurate about the facts which these documents "directly and principally affirm." Like any presumption of law, however, this can be overturned by clear proof to the contrary.

Public documents may contain a mixture of information, only some of which is directly and principally affirmed. For example, in marriage nullity cases, it is not unusual for a petitioner or respondent to submit a restraining order issued by a civil court as evidence of harassment or mistreatment by the other party. What is directly and principally affirmed in such a document is that the civil court legally restrained the party or parties named therein from a number of specified actions on the date and under the conditions indicated. The document establishes that the court was convinced that there was sufficient cause to restrict the rights of the person or persons restrained. But, unless it is accompanied by specific findings of fact, the document does not directly and principally affirm that every claim made by the one who petitioned the order is fully accurate. Thus, the document constitutes proof of the restraining order itself; it may be a source of proof of the existence of certain patterns of abuse, but the document does not provide full proof of such allegations. Further evidence would be required to corroborate information contained in but not directly affirmed by the document.

Value of Private Documents

Canon 1542 — A private document, whether acknowledged by a party or approved by the judge, has the same force of proof against the author or signatory and those deriving a case from them as an extrajudicial confession. It has the same force against those who are not parties to the case as declarations of the parties which are not confessions, according to the norm of can. 1536, §2.

The probative force of private documents varies. The wording of the canon is rather dense and requires close attention. With regard to its author or signer, a private document is to be assessed in the same way that extrajudicial confessions or declarations are assessed (c. 1537). With regard to "outsiders," i.e., persons other than the author or signer, private documents have the same force as declarations of the parties which are not confessions (c. 1536, §2).

These documents can be extremely important forms of proof, since they may contain information not available from any other source. At the same time, the judge must cautiously weigh information in private documents. Not only is there a need to establish that private documents are authentic, but information contained in such documents may be erroneous or ambiguous and needs to be interpreted as much as possible within its original context.

Defects or Alterations in Documents

Canon 1543 — If the documents are shown to have been erased, emended, falsified, or otherwise defective, it is for the judge to decide what value, if any, must be afforded them.

Documents may deteriorate, be officially corrected or unofficially amended, forged, or otherwise tampered with. Thus, when any document gives indication of alteration or lack of authenticity, the court must be on guard. Wisely, however, this canon does not mandate automatic rejection of these documents. The judge is given the responsibility to evaluate the value and probative weight of the questionable document. In assessing such documents, the court may well secure the assistance of an expert in the field.

[60] The parallel canon in the Eastern code (CCEO 1222) differs, adding the clause "with due regard for other requirements for public civil documents in the civil law of the place." For the rationale and significance of this difference, see Abbass, "Contentious Trials," 893–894.

Article 2: The Presentation of Documents [cc. 1544–1546]

Authentic Copies

Canon 1544 — Documents do not have probative force in a trial unless they are originals or authentic copies and deposited at the tribunal chancery so that the judge and the opposing party can examine them.

In assessing the probative value of documents, the judge must distinguish between the authenticity of the document itself (i.e., that it is an original or a fully exact copy of an original) and the trustworthiness of the information contained in the document (e.g., a letter submitted in evidence may not be subject to challenge as an authentic document, but the information contained in the letter may be erroneous or incomplete and, hence, subject to challenge). This canon reminds tribunals of the need to assure the authenticity of the documents themselves.

Probative force is not attributed to documents unless originals or authentic copies are deposited with the tribunal. This enables the judge and the "opposing party" to examine them,[61] either to contest their authenticity as documents or to challenge the accuracy of the information contained in them.

What constitutes an "authentic" copy? Ultimately, any copy that faithfully and completely reproduces an original has an internal authenticity in that the copy is genuine; it has not been altered. How can a tribunal, however, be sure that a purported original or copy has not been tampered with? One means to help assure the trustworthiness of documents is the use of formally authenticated copies, i.e., copies prepared by ecclesiastical or civil notaries or certified by such notaries as concordant with the originals. Of course, as the history of forged papers amply attests, this sign of external authenticity is not an absolute guarantee of their actual authenticity. Thus, the requirement that all documents be lodged at the tribunal allows documents to be examined and their authenticity challenged.

In normal practice, the parties often present photocopies or even fax copies of documents to tribunals. Since these do not have a notary's certification of their external authenticity, there is greater danger that they may have been illegitimately altered. Such copies of documents, nonetheless, may well be completely faithful to the original and trustworthy. Thus, internal authenticity cannot be totally denied to documents presented in these fashions.[62]

As a general rule, judges should insist on the presentation of original documents (with authentic copies made at the tribunal) or certified copies. Occasionally, however, there are grave reasons why an original document or certified copy is simply unavailable.[63] When an original or certified copy of a document is not available, but a photocopy or other abstract is, the judge cannot uncritically accept the document as authentic. The judge may, however, incorporate the copy into the acts and then evaluate its authenticity and genuineness in light of other evidence. Since external authenticity is simply a means to assure that the copy faithfully reproduces the information contained in the original, it would be pure formalism rigidly to refuse to consider the potential veracity of a non-authenticated copy when circumstances make it impossible to compare it to the original.

[61] Certainly, the defender of the bond and promoter of justice, if involved in a case, also have the right to examine all documentary evidence. This is explicitly provided for in marriage cases by c. 1678, §1, 2°.

[62] For example, in recent times some congregations of the Roman Curia have used faxes to communicate official documents so that their execution can be expedited. The original documents are later sent by mail, but the expectation is that the ecclesiastical authority receiving the fax transmission will act on the basis of that electronically communicated copy.

[63] For instance, the destruction of records by fire, flood, war, or other disasters is not uncommon, especially among refugee peoples.

Mandate to Produce Documents

Canon 1545 — The judge can order a document common to both parties to be presented in the process.

When a document common to both parties is in the possession of only one of the parties, the judge has the authority to order that the document be presented and incorporated into the acts of the case. Should the possessor of the document refuse to provide that document without a legitimate reason for the refusal (see c. 1546), it is the judge's responsibility to evaluate the significance of that refusal in a manner similar to the evaluation of the refusal of a party to answer a question (see c. 1531, §2).

Exemptions from Obligation to Produce Documents

Canon 1546 — §1. Even if documents are common, no one is bound to present those which cannot be communicated without danger of harm according to the norm of can. 1548, §2, n. 2 or without danger of violating an obligation to observe secrecy.

§2. Nonetheless, if at least some small part of a document can be transcribed and presented in copy without the above-mentioned disadvantages, the judge can decree that it be produced.

The judge's authority to demand the presentation of a document is not unlimited. There is also a need to balance conflicting rights and responsibilities, and to protect the parties and other persons from damage that might result from the disclosure of confidential documents. Thus, two circumstances exempt from the obligation to present a document.

1. First, the obligation is mitigated when exhibiting a document would cause serious dangers either to the possessor of the document or to his or her spouse, relatives, or in-laws.[64] It should be noted that this exemption must involve a genuine danger. The mere existence of some fear (which may have little real foundation) or a preference not to make the information contained in the document known is insufficient to claim the exemption. Likewise, a fear that the disclosure of the information in the document will result in embarrassment or will damage one's position in the ecclesiastical trial does not dispense one from the obligation to communicate the document.[65]

2. Second, a document may be withheld when exhibiting it would violate an obligation of secrecy which the tribunal must respect. The Church recognizes both moral and legal obligations to maintain secrecy. See the commentary on canon 1548 for additional reflections on this obligation.

In balancing the conflicting needs for the court both to discover the full truth and to avoid other dangers, the solution may be a partial disclosure of a document or some portion thereof. Canon 1546, §2 provides for the presentation of a transcript of a document in place of the full document. The transcript might remove the names of parties who could be injured, or remove sections of the document with no relevance to the issue in the trial but which contain harmful information. It is for the judge to determine whether, and how, such a partial presentation might be made.

[64] The types of dangers recognized as dispensing one from the obligation to provide a document are the same as those which exempt a witness from the obligation of testifying. See the commentary on c. 1548, §2, 2°.

[65] Penal procedure contains an exception to this rule. Given the right of parties not to incriminate themselves (c. 1728, §2), an accused is not obliged to produce a purely private document which would be tantamount to his or her confessing to the delict.

CHAPTER III
WITNESSES AND TESTIMONIES
[cc. 1547–1573]

Often the single most important source of evidence is the testimony of witnesses.[66] There are various types of witnesses, and the nature and quality of their knowledge can vary tremendously. This chapter first identifies those who can and cannot serve as witnesses, and then discusses the introduction and exclusion of witnesses. It next specifies norms for the proper examination of witnesses, and concludes with provisions for the evaluation of their testimony. Precisely because witnesses are so vital in the search for truth, careful attention to these norms is critical in the tribunal's ministry of justice.

Proof through Witnesses Admissible in All Cases

Canon 1547 — Proof by means of witnesses is allowed under the direction of the judge in cases of any kind.

This initial canon asserts the principle that testimony from witnesses is admissible in any sort of ecclesiastical trial.[67] While the assertion of canon 1527 on the admissibility of proofs of any sort that are useful and licit might seem to render canon 1547 redundant, the coetus decided to retain it to avoid any confusion about the admissibility of witness testimony in trials when the civil law of the place might not permit proof by means of witnesses in contractual disputes.[68] By mandating that proof by witnesses be admitted only under the judge's supervision, the canon carefully preserves the judge's role in directing the course of the trial. Thus, for example, the judge retains the right to allow a minor to testify (c. 1550, §1), to set time limits for identifying the information to be sought from a witness (c. 1552, §2), to curb an excess number of witnesses (c. 1553), to rule on a request to exclude a witness (c. 1555), and to examine a witness in secret (c. 1559).

The Obligation of the Witness to Tell the Truth

Canon 1548 — §1. When the judge questions witnesses legitimately, they must tell the truth.

The obligation to tell the truth in an ecclesiastical trial, whether under oath or not, is a grave one. Since discovering the truth and deciding in accord with it is the very goal of the trial, the integrity of the process depends on witnesses being fully honest.

The obligation to tell the truth is, however, subject to some limitations. In addition to those exempted from testifying in virtue of the second paragraph of this canon, a witness is obliged to respond only to the judge or auditor in the course of the process.[69] The witness has no obligation, however, to respond to questions posed by third parties outside the context of the trial. The obligation to respond also depends on the legitimacy of the questions posed by the judge or auditor. For [66] For a brief description of the etymology of the terms "witness" and "testimony," see Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 981.

[67] In contrast to the position of Bourgon (in CLSGBI Com, 880, note 1) and Arroba Conde (in Valencia Com, 677), this author holds that proof by means of witnesses is not totally barred from a supplementary role in the documentary process for certain marriage nullity cases (cc. 1686–1688). In addition to the clear wording of c. 1547, this fact is verified in the canonical tradition. See the commentary on c. 1686 for the argument supporting this conclusion.

[68] See the commentary on c. 1290 dealing with contracts, and the discussion in Comm 11 (1979) 108. Thus, although the Church usually defers to civil law regarding contracts, the Church will admit testimony from witnesses in contractual matters even if the civil law does not recognize such testimony as admissible evidence. Of course, if the resulting judgment lacked civil recognition, the Church's ability to enforce a judgment might be thwarted.

[69] By extension, that obligation also holds if particular law permits a defender of the bond, advocate, or other official taking part in the interview to pose questions (see c. 1561).

example, questions not pertinent to the case (see c. 1564) are unlawful and, hence, the witness would have the right to refuse to answer.

Those Exempt from Testifying

§2. Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1550, §2, n. 2, the following are exempted from the obligation to respond:

1° clerics regarding what has been made known to them by reason of sacred ministry; civil officials, physicians, midwives, advocates, notaries, and others bound by professional secrecy even by reason of having given advice, regarding those matters subject to this secrecy;

2° those who fear that from their own testimony ill repute, dangerous hardships, or other grave evils will befall them, their spouses, or persons related to them by consanguinity or affinity.

An exemption from testifying, either in whole or in part, is extended to two groups of persons:

1. Those who have an obligation of secrecy connected with their office or function.
2. Those who are likely to suffer harm as a consequence of their participation as witnesses.

These exemptions from testifying may or may not be claimed by a witness. For example, a witness who may suffer harm and would have a right to claim an exemption from testifying may, nonetheless, choose to testify despite the dangers present. Such an "exemption" differs from "exclusion" from testifying by the law itself (c. 1550).

The exemption extends first to clerics (c. 266, §1) concerning any information learned in the course of their ministry.[70] The exemption also extends to others who learn information in the course of their official duties and who consequently have an obligation of secrecy.[71] These exemptions, however, extend only to information learned by the witness in the course of his or her official duties.[72]

In addition to those bound by professional secrecy, an exemption from testifying is extended to prospective witnesses who might suffer dangerous consequences should they testify. To invoke this exemption there must be a genuine danger to the witness personally or to his or her spouse, relatives, or in-laws. The canon refers to three sorts of dangers: (1) "ill repute" (infamiam), the loss of good reputation (c. 220); (2) "dangerous hardships" (periculosas vexationes); and (3) "other grave evils" (aliave mala gravia).

If witnesses fear that their testimony will result in these consequences, a conflict of values results. The court needs to obtain the truth, but the witnesses need to protect themselves and their families. In these situations, it is the judge's responsibility to work with witnesses to assess the degree of danger to which their testimony might expose them. The judge may then determine whether there are ways to obtain their testimony while avoiding or minimizing these dangers.[73] Not every [70] Information learned by a priest or interpreter in the sacrament of penance is completely inadmissible. See the commentary on c. 1550, §2, 2°.

[71] The canon lists a number of persons who are able to claim such professional secrecy. The list, however, is not taxative, since it concludes with the generic description of "others bound by professional secrecy." The identification of some of those persons so bound would be a matter on which canon law would defer to the civil law (c. 22).

[72] Thus, without duly executed consents for release of confidential information, therapists are exempt from testifying concerning clients. Such therapists, however, could not claim exemptions from testifying concerning persons whom they know, not in the context of the therapist-client relationship, but as friends, family members, neighbors, and the like.

[73] While in some circumstances it is appropriate to exempt the witness from testifying at all, other options can be considered. For instance, the court may agree to question a witness only about certain limited matters and to avoid areas which might create dangers but which have less relevance to the specific issue in the trial. The serious-claim of exemption fits under the provisions of this canon. Some fears may have little or no foundation. Not every hardship or embarrassment that might be connected with testifying dispenses from the obligation to testify. The court, however, has no choice but to take the concerns of fearful witnesses very seriously since, in most of the world, ecclesiastical tribunals have neither genuine power to subpoena testimony nor means to protect witnesses from retribution.

ARTICLE 1: THOSE WHO CAN BE WITNESSES [cc. 1549–1550]

The Principle

Canon 1549 — All persons can be witnesses unless the law expressly excludes them in whole or in part.

As a basic principle, all persons, whatever their background, condition, or ecclesial status, can serve as witnesses unless the law expressly excludes them. The exclusions, specified in canon 1550, are narrow.[74] For example, there are no restrictions prohibiting a person who has incurred an ecclesiastical penalty (e.g., an excommunication) from serving as a witness.

In practice, however, not all persons are appropriate witnesses. Most important, a witness must have knowledge relevant to the dispute at issue. A knowledgeable witness must also be able and willing to provide testimony to the tribunal. Tribunals should provide guidance to the parties, especially when they do not have the assistance of qualified advocates, concerning the qualities needed in a good witness.[75]

Those Unsuited as Witnesses

Canon 1550 — §1. Minors below the fourteenth year of age and those of limited mental capacity are not allowed to give testimony; they can, however, be heard by a decree of the judge which declares such a hearing expedient.

Normally, minors "below the fourteenth year of age" are not permitted to testify.[76] Nor are those of "limited mental capacity" (mente debiles) admitted as witnesses. Since there is no definition of the term "limited mental capacity," the assess-ness of the danger may also suggest that a witness may be permitted to testify with the understanding that the testimony or some portion of it will be exempted from the publication of the acts, provided this exemption from publication does not deny the right of defense of the parties (c. 1598, §1).

[74] While not technically a matter of excluding witnesses, the right of judges to limit the number of witnesses (c. 1553) should also be noted.

[75] In marriage nullity cases, the parties sometimes wish to name their children as witnesses. When the children are minors under fourteen, normally their testimony is not to be admitted (see the commentary on c. 1550, §1). Furthermore, many tribunals have a policy of not seeking testimony from the children in marriage cases involving their parents, even if the children are adults. As a standard practice, such a policy is wise since, presumably, the children are not knowledgeable about the events of the courtship and the earliest years of their parents' marriage, the period of greatest relevance to the tribunal's investigation. The policy of not seeking testimony from children also recognizes that children often find it distasteful to testify about (and perhaps against) their parents and even risk alienating one or both of their parents if they do. Hence, they could claim an exemption under c. 1548, §2, 2°.

The law, however, does not "expressly exclude" children from service as witnesses in marriage nullity cases. Thus, a tribunal policy of this kind, while defensible as a standard procedure, needs to provide room for exceptions. Especially when no other witnesses can supply the relevant information, a tribunal cannot absolutely prohibit the parties from naming as witnesses children fourteen and older who are willing to testify. Children, for instance, while not having "first-hand knowledge" of critical events, may be able to report important information learned secondhand, at a non-suspect time. The assessment of such testimony, however, must be very judicious.

[76] Canon 97, §1 defines a minor as anyone under the age of eighteen. The restriction of c. 1550, §1, however, applies only to those minors under the age of fourteen. Minors fourteen and older may serve as witnesses.

ment of whether there is such a limiting factor is left to the judge.

The rationale for this provision is a presumption that the very young and the seriously mentally impaired are not capable of providing the sort of reliable testimony a tribunal needs. The judge, however, is free to set aside this prohibition by means of a decree which explains the reasons why the witness is to be heard.[77] In fact, in justice, it is incumbent upon the judge to do precisely this in those situations where the witness in question is the only one who has knowledge concerning a matter of importance. In these cases, however, the interrogation of the witness should be limited to the crucial issues, and the questions posed should be adapted to the capacity of the witness.

Those Disqualified from Testifying

§2. The following are considered incapable:
1° the parties in the case or those who stand for the parties at the trial, the judge and the judge's assistants, the advocate, and others who assist or have assisted the parties in the same case;
2° priests regarding all matters which they have come to know from sacramental confession even if the penitent seeks their disclosure; moreover, matters heard by anyone and in any way on the occasion of confession cannot be accepted even as an indication of the truth.

Some potential witnesses are disqualified by the law itself. Obviously, the parties to the trial itself are not witnesses, although their declarations are a form of proof to be considered (cc. 1530–1538). The procurators of the parties are similarly excluded, as are the judge, defender of the bond, advocates, notaries, and all involved in the case.

More significantly, out of respect for the sacramental seal (cc. 983, 1388), the law absolutely forbids a priest or bishop from testifying about anything he has learned in the sacrament of penance. Even the penitent's explicit request that the confessor testify does not release him from the obligation to maintain the confessional seal.[78] Likewise, information revealed in confession cannot be released by an interpreter or by anyone else who may have overheard the contents of a confession (see cc. 983, §2 and 1388, §2).

ARTICLE 2: THE INTRODUCTION AND EXCLUSION OF WITNESSES [cc. 1551–1557]

Who Can Introduce or Renounce Witnesses

Canon 1551 — The party who has introduced a witness can renounce the examination of that witness; the opposing party, however, can request that the witness be examined nevertheless.

A party who had previously proposed a witness may choose to renounce the request that the person be interrogated.[79] Since foregoing the hearing of a witness is a renunciation of a procedural act, [77] As with any decree that is not merely procedural, it must contain the reasons which motivated the decision (cc. 50, 51, 1617).

[78] This is an absolute prohibition, differing in kind from the exemption which can be claimed from providing information learned in other aspects of ecclesial ministry (c. 1548, §2, 1°). To protect the integrity of the penitential relationship, the inviolability of the seal of confession (cc. 983, §1 and 1388, §1) is never to be compromised. On the delicate question of a possible release of the confessor from the obligation of the seal, where one must proceed very cautiously, see D. Brewer, "The Right of a Penitent to Release the Confessor from the Seal: Considerations in Canon Law and American Law," J 54 (1994) 424–476.

[79] Parties may renounce the hearing of a witness for a variety of reasons. For example, if a previously named witness has subsequently suffered health problems, the person who proposed that witness may wish to spare him or her the burden of testifying, especially if there are other witnesses or sources of proof available. Less altruistically, a fear that the testimony of a witness would be damaging to the party's claims might be a motive for renunciation and a motive for the other party to oppose the renunciation.

the norms of canon 1524 must be followed. The renunciation must be made in writing and signed by the party (or by the party's procurator with the necessary special mandate). The renunciation must be communicated to the other party (and to the defender of the bond and promoter of justice if their involvement is required). The other party must accept or at least not oppose the renunciation, and the judge has discretion to admit the renunciation or not. If the other party opposes the renunciation, then the witness is to be interrogated. Judges may choose not to admit the renunciation should they determine that the interrogation is necessary to reach a just decision (c. 1452).

How Witnesses Are Introduced

Canon 1552 — §1. When proof through witnesses is requested, their names and domicile are to be communicated to the tribunal.

§2. The items of discussion about which questioning of the witnesses is sought are to be presented within the time period set by the judge; otherwise, the request is to be considered as abandoned.

If the tribunal is to arrange for the interrogation of witnesses, the person proposing them must provide their full names and addresses. The one naming witnesses is also to identify the sort of information each witness is able to provide. This enables the court to focus its interrogation on areas in which the witness has knowledge, and to avoid questions that would simply waste the time of the witness and the auditor. A party's failure to provide this information about proposed witnesses within the time limit established by the judge is to be interpreted as his or her abandonment of the request to obtain testimony from these witnesses.[80]

Curbing an Excessive Number of Witnesses

Canon 1553 — It is for the judge to curb an excessive number of witnesses.

The right and duty of judges to curb an excessive number of witnesses is an example of their discretion in directing the trial and their responsibility to see that cases are concluded in a reasonable time (c. 1453). If a party lodges recourse against the judge's decision not to interrogate certain witnesses, that recourse is to be decided by the judge expeditissime (c. 1527, §2), a decision that cannot be appealed (c. 1629, 5°).

Notification of Witnesses' Names to the Parties

Canon 1554 — Before the witnesses are examined, their names are to be communicated to the parties; if in the prudent judgment of the judge, however, that cannot be done without grave difficulty, it is to be done at least before the publication of the testimonies.

As a rule, the names of the witnesses nominated by one party are to be made known to the other prior to any attempt to obtain their testimony.[81] It should be noted that the canon requires only that the names of the witnesses be provided, not their addresses or telephone numbers.

This notification provides the opportunity for the petitioner and respondent to lodge an exception requesting that a witness be excluded (cc. 1555, 1491). The judge, however, may determine that because of serious difficulties, the identities of the witnesses are not to be made known before they are interrogated.[82] If so, the judge issues a de-[80] The CLSA's previous translation of c. 1552, §2 stated that the "petition" was to be considered as abandoned. That translation was ambiguous. It is only the request to interrogate the witness which is considered as abandoned, not the libellus itself.

[81] This modifies the norms of the 1917 code as elucidated by the instruction Provida Mater Ecclesia. See Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 982, for a description of the prior practice.

[82] For example, a concern that a party might try to coach a witness or impede him or her from testifying would be a solid reason for the judge to delay the notification. The situations envisioned by c. 1455, §3 provide other exam-cree, explaining the reasons for delaying this notification (c. 1617). The decree allows only a delay in the disclosure; the identities of the witnesses must still be made known to the parties after their testimony has been obtained at some point prior to the publication of the acts.

Exclusion of Witnesses

Canon 1555 — Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1550, a party can request the exclusion of a witness if a just cause for the exclusion is shown before the questioning of the witness.

A party may request that a witness be excluded. The judge, however, has the final authority to determine whether or not to exclude a witness. The right to present proofs, among which proposing witnesses is often the most important (cc. 1527, 1547, 1549), is an integral element of the right of defense.[83] Therefore, a party's objection to the introduction of a witness must indicate a "just cause" for the exclusion. Just causes would include claims that a witness is unsuitable or legally incapable for any of the reasons mentioned in canon 1550. Just causes might also include the contention that the witness has no relevant knowledge, that he or she has been coached, that his or her testimony may be coerced (c. 1538), or that a proposed witness is prejudiced. On the other hand, the possibility that the testimony of a witness might reflect negatively on the party is not a just cause for exclusion.

Recourse against the decision of a judge to admit or to exclude testimony from a witness is to be made before that same judge and must be decided expeditissime (c. 1527, §2). Hence, the judge's resolution of the recourse is not subject to appeal (c. 1629, 5°).

ples of reasons for deferring the disclosure of the identity of witnesses.

[83] ApSig, decr, April 11, 1987, P 77 (1988) 341. Coram Burke, nullity of sentence, November 15, 1990, Stud Can 25 (1991) 510.

Citation of Witnesses

Canon 1556 — The citation of a witness occurs through a decree of the judge legitimately communicated to the witness.

Canon 1557 — A witness who has been cited properly is to appear or to inform the judge of the reason for the absence.

The citation of witnesses is accomplished in a decree which is communicated to the witness in accord with the same norms as those for the citation of the parties (c. 1509).

The duly cited witness has an obligation to present testimony as requested. If he or she is unable to do so, there is an obligation to inform the judge of this fact. In theory, at least, the tribunal could penalize a Catholic witness who fails to comply with the citation (c. 1371, 2°). In practice, however, this is neither prudent nor possible. Since the tribunals of most countries have no power to compel an uncooperative witness to testify, the judge must employ the other legitimate methods permitted by canon 1528 to attempt to secure at least some testimony from a reluctant witness. Should a witness continue to refuse to testify, the judge is to evaluate the significance of this refusal (c. 1531, §2).

ARTICLE 3: THE EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES [cc. 1558–1571]

Place of the Examination

Canon 1558 — §1. Witnesses must be examined at the tribunal unless the judge deems otherwise.

§2. Cardinals, patriarchs, bishops, and those who possess a similar favor by civil law are to be heard in the place they select.

§3. The judge is to decide where to hear those for whom it is impossible or difficult to come to the tribunal because of distance, sickness, or some impediment, without prejudice to the prescripts of cann. 1418 and 1469, §2.

Paragraph one states the standard expectation that witnesses are to testify at the office of the tribunal. The judge, however, is given latitude to make other appropriate arrangements as circumstances warrant.

Paragraph two contains an exception, enumerating certain persons who enjoy the privilege of selecting the place where they are to be interrogated.

Paragraph three describes more fully the discretion of the judge to take testimony in places other than the tribunal office. When illness, distance, or some other impediment makes it impossible or very difficult for a witness to travel to the tribunal office, the judge may select an alternate location (e.g., the offices of a parish in the vicinity of the witness, a conference room in the rest home in which the witness resides). When a witness resides outside of the diocese in which the trial is being conducted, the judge may call upon the assistance of another tribunal to appoint an auditor and arrange for securing the testimony of a witness (c. 1418).

Another possibility is for the judge or auditor to travel outside of his or her own territory to obtain testimony directly from a witness. First, however, the judge or auditor must secure the permission of the diocesan bishop[84] of the place where the testimony is to be taken, and the testimony is to be obtained at the site designated by that bishop (c. 1469, §2).[85]

Manner of the Examination

Canon 1559 — The parties cannot be present at the examination of the witnesses unless the judge has decided to admit them, especially when the matter concerns a private good. Their advocates or procurators, however, can be present unless the judge has decided that the examination must proceed in secret due to the circumstances of the matters and persons.

As a rule, the parties to the case are not permitted to be present for the examination of the witnesses, but their procurators or advocates may be present.

By way of exception, the judge can authorize or even require the presence of the parties, especially in cases involving the private as opposed to the public good. Conversely, the judge may determine that the examination of a particular witness should be carried out in secret without the presence of the parties' procurators and advocates. If either of these exceptions is warranted, the judge should issue a decree summarizing the reasons for the exception (c. 1617).[86]

When the canons speak of the "parties," that usually includes the defender of the bond and the promoter of justice (c. 1434, 1°), unless the clear wording or the context makes the contrary obvious. May a judge, then, determine that the defender and the promoter may not be present for the examination of a particular witness? No. Although the 1983 code creates much greater parity between the advocates and the defender of the bond, it does not create complete parity.[87] In cases involving marriage nullity or the nullity of sacred orders, the judge cannot exclude the defender or promoter because of the norms of canons 1678, §1, 1° and 1711. These give the defender, the advocates, and the promoter the right (ius) to be present for the examination of the parties and wit-

[84] Canon 1469, §2 uses the technical term Episcopi dioecesani and hence, in accord with c. 134, §3, the permission may not be given by a local ordinary or judicial vicar unless he has been specially mandated to do so.

[85] The controversial practice of securing testimony over the telephone is neither authorized by the code, nor is it reprobated (see Bourgon, in CLSGBI Com, 885, note 1). For further comment on this contested issue, see the commentary on c. 1528.

[86] In marriage nullity cases, c. 1678, §2 supersedes the general norm of c. 1559. Thus, judges do not have the discretion to permit the parties to be present for the examination of witnesses in these cases. Also see Comm 11 (1979) 114, 262–263.

[87] C. A. Cox, Procedural Changes in Formal Marriage Nullity Cases from the 1917 to the 1983 Code (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1989) 48–54.

nesses. Laws which restrict the free exercise of a right must be strictly interpreted (c. 18). Therefore, unless a right is clearly restricted, it cannot be infringed. Canon 1559 permits a judge to restrict this right for procurators and advocates only; it does not give a corresponding authority to restrict the right of the defender or the promoter of justice. Certainly, a judge might request that the defender or promoter not be present, perhaps because of a concern that the presence of several people besides the judge would intimidate a timid witness. The defender and promoter, however, retain the right to be present.

Witnesses Examined Individually

Canon 1560 — §1. Each witness must be examined separately.

To preserve the court's ability to obtain evidence that has not been "contaminated" by one witness hearing the testimony of another, all witnesses are to be examined individually. It is for this same reason that judges commonly ask witnesses to promise not to divulge the content of their testimony to anyone until the completion of the trial, and may even bind witnesses to secrecy concerning their testimony (c. 1455, §3).

Possibility of Confrontation

§2. If witnesses disagree among themselves or with a party in a grave matter, the judge, after having removed discord and scandal insofar as possible, can have those who disagree meet together or confront one another.

When there is disagreement concerning serious issues among witnesses or between witnesses and one or both of the parties, the judge has the option of bringing the witnesses together for a confrontation or otherwise directing that the witnesses come to some agreement. This extraordinary step is rarely employed, and great care is to be taken to preclude disputes or scandal if such a confrontation is necessary.

Those Who May Question Witnesses

Canon 1561 — The judge, the judge's delegate, or an auditor examines the witness; the examiner must have the assistance of a notary. Consequently, if the parties, the promoter of justice, the defender of the bond, or the advocates present at the examination have any questions to be put to the witness, they are to propose them not to the witness but to the judge or the one who takes the place of the judge, who is to ask the questions, unless particular law provides otherwise.

The examination of a witness is conducted by the judge, a special delegate of the judge, or an auditor with the assistance of a notary who is charged to make a record of the session. If others are present and wish to pose questions, they are not to do so directly. Rather, they are to propose the questions to the judge or auditor, who determines whether the questions are appropriate. If so, the judge or auditor then poses the questions to the witness. The values behind this canon are (1) to assure that the judge or auditor conducts the interview in an orderly and reasonable fashion, and (2) to protect the witness from being "bombarded" with questions from multiple directions.

This is an area where provision is made for particular law to make other arrangements, permitting the defender of the bond, an advocate, an expert, or another person who is legitimately present to question a witness directly. If particular law makes such provisions, the judge should nonetheless retain overall direction of the questioning in order to minimize the burden on witnesses.

Obligation and Oath to Testify Truthfully

Canon 1562 — §1. The judge is to call to the attention of the witness the grave obligation to speak the whole truth and only the truth.

§2. The judge is to administer an oath to the witness according to can. 1532; a witness who refuses to take it, however, is to be heard without the oath.

At the beginning of every examination, the judge or auditor is to remind the witness of the grave obligation to tell the truth and only the truth. This obligation binds witnesses whether or not they take the customary oath.

Ordinarily, the witness is asked to take an oath to tell the truth (c. 1199). Should a witness choose not to take the oath (c. 1532), however, his or her testimony is still to be taken.

The Manner of Questioning

Canon 1563 — The judge is first of all to establish the identity of the witness, then ask what relationship the witness has with the parties, and, when addressing specific questions to the witness concerning the case, also inquire about the sources of his or her knowledge and the precise time when the witness learned what he or she asserts.

Crucial to the gathering and assessment of the evidence are a number of preliminary matters. Thus, the judge or auditor is first to establish the identity of the witness. Normally, this would be through the presentation of some form of photo identification. The judge is then to establish the relationship which the witness has with the parties to the case. This information assists the court in appreciating the scope of the person's knowledge.

After these preliminaries, the judge or auditor proceeds to substantive questions about the issue(s) in dispute. The judge or auditor is to probe not only what the witness knows, but also how he or she came to know it. Was the information learned by direct observation? Was it learned indirectly, perhaps confided to the witness by one or both of the parties? Was it learned through a document, perhaps one that no longer exists? The time at which a witness learned information is also critical to assessing the value of the testimony. The canonical tradition values information learned at a "non-suspect time" (i.e., a time prior to the presentation of the libellus or the inception of the dispute between the parties) much more highly than information learned at a later time.

The Nature of the Questions

Canon 1564 — The questions are to be brief, accommodated to the mental capacity of the person being questioned, not comprised of several points at the same time, not deceitful or deceptive or suggestive of a response, free from any kind of offense, and pertinent to the case being tried.

The nature of the questions posed to a witness is also crucial. The questions are to be: (1) brief, (2) crafted to correspond to the level of intelligence and sophistication of the witness, (3) simple and focused on one point rather than complicated, (4) never deceitful or tricky, (5) not leading or suggestive of the answer, (6) not offensive, and (7) relevant to the specific issues in the case. Questions that go beyond these limits are illegitimate, and the witness is not bound to respond (c. 1548, §1 obliges witnesses to respond when interrogated legitimately).

The questioning of a witness is an art not easily mastered. The subject matter which an ecclesiastical tribunal needs to probe is often sensitive. Frequently, witnesses are nervous and not very articulate; sometimes they are wary about sharing confidential information. Non-Catholics named as witnesses may be ill at ease, perhaps resentful, and not convinced that the Catholic Church has any right to be conducting the investigation. Thus, to question a witness effectively requires tact, patience, and sometimes gentle probing. In difficult interviews it is particularly tempting for a judge or auditor to "lead a witness." Thus, great care must be taken to assure that the questioning is legitimate and at the service of the truth.

Questions Normally Not Communicated in Advance

Canon 1565 — §1. Questions must not be communicated to the witnesses beforehand.

§2. Nonetheless, if the matters about which testimony must be given are so remote to memory that they cannot be affirmed with certainty unless previously recalled, the judge can advise the witness beforehand on some matters if the judge thinks this can be done without danger.

The questions to be posed to a witness or to the parties are not to be communicated to them in advance. This norm seeks to prevent the coaching of a witness or collusion among the parties or witnesses.

An exception to this norm permits the judge or auditor to advise witnesses of the nature of the questioning in advance when it cannot be reasonably expected that they would accurately recall the information without some time for prior reflection. The decision whether to do this rests solely with the judge or auditor, who is free to do so if there seems to be no danger that it would render suspect the resulting testimony.

Responses of Witnesses

Canon 1566 — Witnesses are to give testimony orally and are not to read written materials unless they are computations and accounts; in this case, they can consult the notes which they brought with them.

The norm is for witnesses to give their testimony orally and without the assistance of any written material, except when the testimony concerns accounts and calculations. This norm recognizes that a face-to-face interview is usually the best means for discovering the truth in all of its dimensions. The personal contact with a witness permits the judge or auditor to pose follow-up questions to important or ambiguous responses as well as to observe body language, gauge facial reactions and tone of voice, and hence make a better assessment of the knowledge and credibility of the witness.

Excursus: The Use of Affidavits

The canons, however, do provide alternative means for securing evidence when a personal interview is either impossible or excessively burdensome. For example, the initial response of a respondent may be in writing (c. 1507, §1). Also, the judge is empowered to obtain testimony through a lay person, through declarations made before public notaries, or "in any other legitimate manner" (c. 1528).

Among these other legitimate means is a form of documentary evidence, the submission of a sworn affidavit offering written responses to questions posed by the judge or auditor.[88] While formal testimony taken from witnesses is always to be preferred, a judge may admit sworn responses to written questionnaires as affidavits. Technically, the person submitting written information is not a "witness" and does not "testify." Rather, the person serves as an affiant and the evidence is evaluated in accord with the norms for assessing documentary evidence. Many tribunals employ this alternative method of gathering evidence. In relying too heavily or resorting too quickly to the use of written questionnaires, tribunals may unnecessarily sacrifice the security and other benefits that can come only from a personal interview. Thus, the practice of using questionnaires as an "ordinary" means of securing proof has been strongly and understandably criticized.[89] Yet, this means of proof has a long canonical tradition and cannot be ruled out a priori. For example, William J. Doheny, the foremost English-language commentator on the procedural law of the 1917 code, noted that documentary and written proof has long been considered a particularly cogent form of evidence at canon law, and he offered numerous citations from the Corpus Iuris to justify his claim.[90] Doheny discussed sworn affidavits as a form of evidence, and cited a Rotal decision[91] which indicated that affidavits may be employed although they are not considered judicial depositions and cannot constitute full proof.[92] Another commentator on the 1917 code, Francis Wanenmacher, likewise spoke of sworn depositions and other written testimonies. While they are "not generally nor per se to be approved," he noted that it "would be too much to say that the judge cannot under any circumstances admit proof of that kind."[93] Wanenmacher cited the 1923 rules of procedure for proving non-consummation cases as one source for accepting the practice of admitting affidavits into evidence.[94] The revised rules of procedure for this process contain similar provisions.[95] Likewise, the current norms for the instruction of petitions for a papal dissolution of a marriage in favor of the faith make limited provision for affidavits or depositions given before a notary public or other trustworthy person. This is permitted for those who are not Catholic and who refuse to appear before a Catholic priest to give evidence.[96]

[88] This author disagrees with Bourgon (in CLSGBI Com, 888) that the use of written questionnaires is "[p]articularly prohibited." L. Wrenn, in Procedures (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1987) 44–46, 52–53, also agrees that written affidavits may be employed.

[89] Grocholewski, "Interrogation by Letter or Telephone," 460–465.

[90] W. J. Doheny, Canonical Procedure in Matrimonial Cases, vol. 1, Formal Procedure, 2nd ed. (Milwaukee: Bruce, 1948) 399, especially n. 22.

In this author's opinion, the problem is not the use of affidavits per se, but the almost total reliance of many tribunals on written depositions to the exclusion of testimony taken in a formal manner. Without obtaining testimony from the parties and witnesses through judicial depositions, the trustworthiness of the evidence is less secure and its quality is apt to be much poorer. On the other hand, the judicious use of a combination of formal testimony supplemented with additional written affidavits provides a better-balanced and more secure foundation upon which the court may reach certitude.

The Record of the Testimony

Canon 1567 — §1. The notary is to write down the response immediately and must report the exact words of the testimony given, at least in what pertains to those points which touch directly upon the material of the trial.

§2. The use of a tape-recorder can be allowed, provided that the responses are afterwards transcribed and, if possible, signed by the deponents.

The responses of the party or witness to the judge's or auditor's questions are to be put into writing immediately by the notary present for the interview. The notary must record both the questions posed and the responses, which are to be in the words of the one giving testimony. The notary's report, however, need not be a transcription of everything said. The notary is charged to record the witness's exact words "at least in what pertains to those points which touch directly upon the material of the trial." Frequently, however, witnesses go off the point, make asides, or engage in significant repetition, none of which is directly relevant to the issue. Hence, the notary's record should focus on evidence germane to the tribunal's search for the truth of the matters at issue.

As an alternative to the notary's report, a tape recording may be made of the testimony. Subsequently, however, a transcript must be made of the tape. It is preferred, although not essential, that the transcript later be reviewed and signed by the one making the deposition.

[91] Coram Florczak, June 5, 1926, #7, SRRDec 18 (1926) 194–195.

[92] Doheny, Canonical Procedure, I:400–401, 406–407.

[93] F. Wanenmacher, Canonical Evidence in Marriage Cases (Philadelphia: Dolphin, 1935) 144 (at #234). Wanenmacher discussed a role for affidavits as public or private civil documents on pp. 210 (at #343), 211–212 (at #345), and 230 (at #373).

[94] SCSacr, Decretum et regulae servandae in processibus super matrimonio rato et non consummato, May 7, 1923, art. 75, AAS 15 (1923) 407. Translated in CLD 1, 784.

[95] CDWDS, Litterae circulares "De processu super rato et non consummato," December 20, 1986, art. 9, ME 112 (1987) 425. Translated in W. H. Woestman, Special Marriage Cases, 3rd ed. (Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1994) 124.

[96] CDF, instr Ut notum est, December 6, 1973, art. 5, in Leges Ecclesiae post Codicem iuris canonici editae, ed. X. Ochoa, vol. 5 (Rome: Commentarium pro Religiosis, 1980) #4244, col. 6704. Translated in CLD 8, 1180–1181.

Other Elements in the Notary's Report

Canon 1568 — The notary is to make mention in the acts of whether the oath was taken, excused, or refused, of the presence of the parties and other persons, of the questions added ex officio, and in general of everything worth remembering which may have occurred while the witnesses were being examined.

In addition to making a record of the testimony, the notary is charged to note who was present for the interview, whether or not the oath was taken (and, if not, why), and to call attention to anything noteworthy which occurred during the interview. For example, such things as changes in the demeanor of the one testifying, his or her excessive nervousness, signs of evasiveness, and refusal to make eye contact may be relevant to the assessment of the credibility of the one testifying. Yet, unless these events or signs are mentioned in the record, the classical principle quod non est in actis, non est in mundo (what is not in the acts does not exist) precludes their use in making the decision.

Concluding the Interview

Canon 1569 — §1. At the end of the examination, what the notary has written down from the deposition must be read to the witness, or what has been recorded with the tape-recorder during the deposition must be played, giving the witness the opportunity to add, suppress, correct, or change it.

§2. Finally, the witness, the judge, and the notary must sign the acts.

At the conclusion of the interview, to assure that the testimony is accurate, the notary is to read the record back to the one testifying, who is free to excise elements of the statement, amend errors, or supplement the testimony. Similarly, if the interview has been recorded, the witness has the right to listen to the tape to request that corrections, additions, or deletions be made. Of course, should the witness wish, he or she may waive this right, or choose to review only selected portions of the testimony. Once this review is completed, the witness, the judge, and the notary are to sign the acts.[97]

Rehearing a Witness

Canon 1570 — Although already examined, witnesses can be recalled for examination before the acts or testimonies are published, either at the request of a party or ex officio, if the judge decides it is necessary or useful, provided that there is no danger of collusion or corruption.

As the instruction of a case develops, new questions often emerge. Thus, provision is made for recalling witnesses for further examination. The judge can recall a witness at his or her own discretion or in response to the request of a party to the case. It is the judge, however, who determines whether such a new examination is either necessary or useful. The judge also is responsible to assure that the information obtained in the new examination is not tainted. This new examination of a witness must occur prior to the publication of the acts (see c. 1598). A reexamination of witnesses after the publication of the acts is governed by the provisions of canon 1600.

Expenses of a Witness

Canon 1571 — Both the expenses which the witnesses incurred and the income which they lost by giving testimony must be reimbursed to them according to the just assessment of the judge.

Witnesses may incur expenses in connection with their testimony. At times, these expenses are negligible, but at other times the expenses may be substantial, including travel expenses or loss of income due to time taken away from employment in order to testify. Witnesses have a right to reimbursement for their legitimate expenses. The judge is to make a determination of the appropriate reimbursement due each witness. While not specifically mentioned in canon 1571, the reimbursement of witnesses is an area for regulation by particular law or tribunal policy (see c. 1649). When the sentence is issued (c. 1611, 4°) or the instance is concluded in another way (cc. 1523 and 1525), the judge is to issue appropriate decrees allocating the expenses incurred during the trial.

[97] If a witness is unable or refuses to sign the record of his or her testimony, the notary and judge or auditor make note of this in accord with c. 1473.

Article 4: The Trustworthiness of Testimonies [cc. 1572–1573]

Obtaining the testimony of the parties and witnesses is only one step in the development of evidence. These testimonies must be sifted, pondered, and assessed so that appropriate conclusions may be drawn from them. The two canons of this title offer the judge basic principles for weighing the value of testimony. Jurisprudence, especially that of the Roman Rota, provides further assistance in this essential and delicate task.

General Criteria of Evaluation

Canon 1572 — In evaluating testimony, the judge, after having requested testimonial letters if necessary, is to consider the following:

1° what the condition or reputation of the person is;

2° whether the testimony derives from personal knowledge, especially from what has been seen or heard personally, or whether from opinion, rumor, or hearsay;

3° whether the witness is reliable and firmly consistent or inconsistent, uncertain, or vacillating;

4° whether the witness has co-witnesses to the testimony or is supported or not by other elements of proof.

It is the judge who is responsible for evaluating testimony. There are a number of touchstones which assist the judge in this task:

1° The character and reputation of the person testifying must be taken into account.[98] Usually, greater weight is attributed to the testimony of a person well known for integrity than to that of a person whose reputation for honesty is tarnished. That does not mean, however, that the judge automatically accepts the former as fully credible and automatically rejects the testimony of the latter as suspect. Reputation is an aid in assessing evidence, not the sole determining factor. A person with a reputation for dishonesty may have been unjustly labeled; a person of great integrity may be in error; and a person who often stoops to dishonesty may, in fact, testify truthfully. The "condition" of a witness refers to a variety of qualities that can affect the quality of that person's testimony. This includes a witness's relationship to the parties, age and life experience, and religious, educational, and cultural background, among other factors. The term "condition" also refers to whether the person is testifying in virtue of some official capacity (see c. 1573).

2° The source of a witness's knowledge is also crucial. When the witness reports what he or she has personally seen or heard, his or her testimony normally has greater weight than when a witness is reporting information learned second hand, or is simply offering an opinion rather than describing events. Canon law admits as proof, however, hearsay evidence and even the opinion of a witness. This is particularly important in marriage cases, where witnesses may rarely be in a position directly to observe events, but where a witness may well have learned information indirectly, or even served as a confidant of one or both of the spouses. A witness with this sort of knowledge is able to offer important and credible reports to the tribunal concerning matters relevant to the issue under adjudication. In weighing this type of testimony, however, the judge must take into account the indirect nature of the witness's knowledge.

[98] Often an ecclesiastical judge has no personal knowledge of the character and integrity of a witness. Given the mention of testimonial letters in the introduction of c. 1572, clearly a judge may seek testimonial letters to assist in establishing the character and reputation of a witness. For marriage nullity cases, c. 1679 provides that credibility testimony regarding the parties to the case may be employed in assessing the value of their testimony.

3° The manner in which the witness presents testimony is also an important touchstone.[99] If the testimony of the witness is internally consistent, it is to be accorded greater weight than if the testimony is riddled with internal contradictions. If the witness speaks with great certitude about some issues, but with hesitation concerning others, that fact too needs to be taken into account when the judge evaluates the various parts of the deposition.

4° The testimony of each party and witness must be assessed in light of all the evidence before the tribunal. If the testimony of a number of witnesses, while exhibiting understandable differences in perspective and detail, is basically consistent and also in accord with other sources of evidence (such as that obtained from documents), its probative value is enhanced. If, however, there is significant contradiction or disagreement between the testimony of one party or witness and that of all the others, the court rightly would doubt the value of the former testimony. When the testimony of the parties to a case is in serious disagreement, it happens frequently that the testimony of the witnesses named by each tends to mirror those disagreements. In these circumstances, the judge's responsibility to proceed ex officio (c. 1452) in order to try to resolve the contradictions becomes critical.[100]

[99] Also see the comments above at c. 1568 on the behavior of a witness during the presentation of testimony.

Deposition of a Single Witness

Canon 1573 — The testimony of one witness cannot produce full proof unless it concerns a qualified witness making a deposition concerning matters done ex officio, or unless the circumstances of things and persons suggest otherwise.

Canon 1573 reiterates a principle that has long been part of the canonical tradition, namely, that the deposition of one witness normally does not provide full proof. Traditionally, the principle was phrased absolutely (unus testis, nullus testis) but it is not an absolute rule. While the norm that a single witness is generally insufficient remains, canon 1573 provides two exceptions.

First, the testimony of a witness acting in an official capacity may be accorded full probative weight. For example, the testimony of a priest concerning what he did or did not do in exercising his priestly office (e.g., in administering the sacrament of baptism) can be accorded full probative value.

Second, in a significant departure from canonical tradition, the law and jurisprudence now recognize occasions when the testimony of a single witness not acting in an official capacity may be afforded full probative value.[101] It is not possible to provide a list of circumstances in which the judge could lawfully accord full probative value to the testimony of a single witness. Ultimately, it [100] Pompedda, "Decision-Sentence," reflects on the dilemma of "uncertain proofs" and emphasizes that such doubt serves as "a further impetus to find the truth of the matter" (87). He refers to the need for judges to have a "sagacious intelligence" and, when faced with an impasse, to strive to resolve the dubia by seeking all reasonable means to discover the truth (93–95).

[101] Pompedda, "Decision-Sentence," 90–91.

is the judge who must determine whether the testimony of a single witness provides a sufficient basis for moral certitude. He or she does so in light of the criteria for evaluating testimony and of the unique circumstances of things or persons present in a particular case. Wrenn uses the example of a marriage lasting only a few weeks and entered for the obvious purpose of gaining legal entrance into the country as a circumstance where the testimony of a single witness could be afforded full probative value.[102] Other circumstances could include testimony provided by a particularly trustworthy witness whose credibility is beyond challenge.[103] Similarly, when a witness has offered particularly insightful testimony that is balanced and internally consistent, based on personal knowledge, and meshes with the circumstances of the case, the judge may responsibly attribute full probative value to such testimony. Full probative force cannot be attributed, however, to the testimony of a witness that is superficial, inconsistent, unbalanced, or flies in the face of contrary indications.

CHAPTER IV
EXPERTS[104]
[cc. 1574–1581]

Notion of an Expert

Lawrence Wrenn defines an expert (peritus) as "a specialist who is learned, experienced, and skilled in his or her science or profession and whose scientific report is required either to prove some fact or to diagnose the true nature of something."[105]

The analyses of those expert in a variety of disciplines are highly valued as a form of proof.[106] The canons of this chapter describe when evidence from experts is either necessary or useful, how experts are named and carry out their function, and how the evidence deriving from experts is to be assessed.

Experts may come from many different fields —psychology, anthropology, sociology, theology, finance, the authentication of documents, etc. In marriage nullity cases, it is common to employ experts in the fields of psychology and psychiatry. Too often, the value of calling on experts from other disciplines is overlooked. For example, experts in the doctrines of differing religious traditions may help a tribunal judge whether a person raised in that tradition simulated by excluding the good of marital permanence or was in such deeply rooted error that it determined the will. Experts in anthropology can help judges understand the cultural roots of marital practices of immigrant peoples. Experts in sociology can shed light on the factors that influence the consent of people due to their careers or socioeconomic condition.

The Necessity of Experts

Canon 1574 — The assistance of experts must be used whenever the prescript of a law or of the judge requires their examination and opinion based on the precepts of art or science in order to establish some fact or to discern the true nature of some matter.

While an ecclesiastical judge always retains the right and sometimes even has a duty to secure [102] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 985. Wrenn also notes that c. 876 establishes circumstances under which the testimony of a single witness is sufficient to prove the administration of baptism.

[103] Bourgon, in CLSGBI Com, 890.

[104] Wrenn, in Procedures, 54–58.

[105] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 985–986.

[106] While maintaining the preeminent role of the judge and the independence of the canonical judgment, Rotal jurisprudence manifests a long tradition of respect for the conclusions of experts. For example, see decisions coram Felici, November 23, 1954, SRRDec 46 (1954) 836; coram Parisella, July 13, 1968, SRRDec 60 (1968) 564–565; coram Parisella, November 25, 1976, SRRDec 68 (1976) 462–463; and coram Masala, December 17, 1985, SRRDec 77 (1985) 604–605.

the services of experts as part of the court's search for the truth, at times the use of experts is required by the law itself. The text of the canon is carefully worded. Experts must be used whenever their examination and opinion, rooted in their field of expertise, is necessary:

1. to establish some fact, or
2. to discern the true nature of some matter.

Thus, if the facts are well established and their meaning is truly clear, there is no need for the use of an expert. If, however, there is need to establish facts or clarify certain ambiguities concerning their significance, experts are to be employed.[107] For example, canon 1680 specifies that one or more experts are to be used in marriage nullity cases involving impotence or defects of consent due to mental illness unless such intervention would be useless.[108]

Admission of Experts

Canon 1575 — After having heard the parties and their suggestions, it is for the judge to appoint the experts or, if the case warrants, to accept reports already drawn up by other experts.

Canon 1576 — Experts are excluded or can be objected to for the same reasons as a witness.

The judge is either to appoint experts after consulting with the parties (including the defender of the bond and the promoter of justice if they are involved) and considering the names they propose, or to admit into evidence the reports that have already been drawn up by experts.[109] The code does not spell out the qualifications necessary in an expert. Clearly, lay persons may serve as experts (see c. 228, §2). There is nothing that would automatically disqualify a person who is not Catholic from service as an expert. The judge, therefore, must determine whether a proposed expert has the background, knowledge, experience, and wisdom to serve as an expert in a particular case.[110]

The question of the admission or exclusion of an expert is handled in the same fashion as the admission or exclusion of a witness (see c. 1555). For example, the reasons which would disqualify a judge from adjudicating a case (c. 1448, §1) would also be reasons for excluding a proposed expert.

While respecting the special competence of a particular expert, the judge must take care to discern whether the service of an individual proposed as an expert would be helpful to the discovery of the truth. For example, in Rotal allocutions of 1987 and 1988, Pope John Paul II warned against the use in marriage nullity cases of psychological experts who operate out of an anthropology at odds with the Christian understanding of human nature.[111]

[107] M. F. Pompedda, "Incapacity to Assume the Essential Obligations of Marriage," in Incapacity for Marriage: Jurisprudence and Interpretation, ed. R. Sable (Rome: Pontificia Universitas Gregoriana, 1987) 208–210. In asserting that the use of experts remains facultative, Pompedda emphasizes that this does not mean that the choice is purely arbitrary. Rather, as a general rule, a judge should not prescind from utilizing such expertise, although there are cases where this is simply not necessary.

[108] See the commentary on that canon for further discussion of the need for experts in marriage cases.

[109] T. G. Doran, "Some Thoughts on Experts," QuadStR 4 (1989) 62, notes that the 1983 code provides for greater judicial discretion in the selection of experts "than did the previous legislation."

[110] A. Mendonça in "The Role of Experts in 'Incapacity to Contract' Cases (Canon 1095)," Stud Can 25 (1991) 431–433, discusses the qualifications of experts that are found in Rotal jurisprudence. Specifically, there is great concern that the expert not only possess the appropriate technical skills but be formed by value systems in alignment with Catholic doctrine.

[111] John Paul II, alloc, February 5, 1987, AAS 79 (1987) 1453–1459; alloc, January 25, 1988, AAS 80 (1988) 1178–1185. Translated in W. H. Woestman, Papal Allocutions to the Roman Rota 1939–1994 (Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1994) 191–203. For reflections on the consequences of differing anthropological perspectives on marriage cases, see G. Versaldi, "The Dialogue between Psychological Science and Canon Law," in R. Sable, ed., Incapacity for Marriage, 25–78.

The Task of Experts

Canon 1577 — §1. Attentive to what the litigants may bring forward, the judge is to determine in a decree the individual items upon which the services of the expert must focus.

§2. The acts of the case and other documents and aids which the expert can need to fulfill his or her function correctly and faithfully must be turned over to the expert.

§3. After having heard the expert, the judge is to determine the time within which the expert must complete the examination and produce the report.

The judge is responsible to delineate clearly the task of the expert. After having heard and considered the points which the parties wish the expert to consider, the judge through a decree frames the questions and issues for the expert's consideration and response. Within these parameters, however, the judge must respect the expert's competence and the methodology of his or her discipline.

The judge is to make available to the expert the materials which he or she needs to conduct a thorough analysis and offer a well-considered professional opinion.[112] The extent of the access to the acts which a judge gives to an expert will depend on the specific role the expert is asked to play. An expert in the authentication of documents might need to see only one part of the acts. A psychological expert in a marriage nullity case, on the other hand, should have access to the testimonies, documents, and other evidence collected in the course of the trial and, ideally, should also be able to examine the parties.[113]

An expert may conclude that further information is needed in order to reach a responsible conclusion. The expert, however, is not an auditor and, therefore, has no right to take additional testimony. Thus, an expert might well request that the judge provide for further examinations of the parties and witnesses. Of course, it is the responsibility of the judge to determine whether such additional instruction of the case is warranted. Normally, however, the judge should respect the request of the expert and strive to secure the data the expert needs, unless there is some persuasive reason to the contrary.

In the course of testing or examining a party, an expert may learn significant information not otherwise contained in the acts of the case. Since the expert shares the court's responsibility to serve the truth, that new information should be brought to the attention of the judge. The judge would then determine whether further questioning of the parties or witnesses or other additional instruction is required to corroborate the new information.[114]

Finally, after consulting the expert, the judge is to fix a realistic time period within which the expert is to complete his or her examination and submit a report. Once the time limit has been established, adjustments to it may be made in accord with canon 1465, §2.

The Expert's Report

Canon 1578 — §1. Each of the experts is to prepare a report separate from the others unless the judge decrees that one report signed by the experts individually be drawn up; if this is done, differences of opinion, if there are any, are to be noted carefully.

§2. Experts must indicate clearly by what documents or other suitable means they gained cer-

[112] For example, in a marriage nullity case DiFelice urged caution when an expert's report was based solely on the declaration of the petitioner. Coram DiFelice, May 6, 1970, SRRDec 62 (1970) 448.

[113] T. G. Doran, in "Some Thoughts on Experts," 64, indicates that the expert's service could involve a direct examination of the parties or an indirect examination through a study of the acts, but that "a peritia should involve both, if possible."

[114] See J. J. García Faílde, "El perito psicólogo y psiquiatra en las causas canónicas de nulidad matrimonial," in Memorias 20 (1996) 107, for the situation when an expert discovers new information. García Faílde notes that the expert must bring the new facts to light, but that the expert's report does not, of itself, provide proof of the new information.

tainty of the identity of the persons, things, or places, by what manner and method they proceeded in fulfilling the function entrusted to them, and above all on which arguments they based their conclusions.

§3. The judge can summon the expert to supply explanations which later seem necessary.

The norm is that each expert prepares an independent report. While written reports are preferable, an oral report is acceptable.[115] If the report is given orally, a notary should be present to prepare a record of the report for inclusion in the acts of the case.

If multiple experts are employed, however, the judge may ask them to collaborate in the preparation of a single report, which, if written, each signs. Should the experts disagree in their conclusions, those differences of opinion are to be noted and explained in the report.

In addition to their findings or conclusions, other important information must be incorporated in the reports of experts. Such information includes:

1. descriptions of the documentation employed in their investigation;
2. brief descriptions of the methodology employed in analyzing the data;
3. explanations of the reasons which form the foundation of the conclusions of the report.

After the expert has submitted a report to the court, the judge is free to propose additional questions to seek further explanation or clarification from the expert.[116]

[115] Doran, "Some Thoughts on Experts," 65. On November 23, 1978, while discussing what eventually became c. 1577, §3, the coetus on procedures considered and rejected a proposal to require that experts' reports be written. See Comm 11 (1979) 122–123.

[116] See B. de Lanversin, "L'importance du can. 1578, §3, dans les procès matrimoniaux ('judex peritus peritorum')," QuadStR 4 (1989) 49–58, for a discussion of the importance of this judicial authority in understanding and weighing the conclusions of experts.

Weighing the Reports of Experts

Canon 1579 — §1. The judge is to weigh carefully not only the conclusions of the experts, even if they are in agreement, but also the other circumstances of the case.

§2. When giving reasons for the decision, the judge must express what considerations prompted him or her to accept or reject the conclusions of the experts.

While fully respecting the competence of experts, the judge cannot abdicate the responsibility for making a judgment about the issues in a case. Canonical tradition considers the judge to be the peritus peritorum, the expert of the experts.[117] In assessing the value of the reports of experts, the judge must take into consideration all of the circumstances of the case. Even when several experts have agreed in their conclusions, judges cannot abandon their own responsibility to sift the evidence.[118] Ultimately, the judgment of the court is a canonical one.[119] While other sciences can and must contribute to that judgment, the conclusions of experts remain one element of the proof, but not the sole determinative one.[120]

Judges are not, however, to act arbitrarily in dealing with the reports of experts. Rather, they must express their reasons for either adopting or rejecting the conclusions of experts.[121] This may be done in a separate decree, or as part of the judicial sentence. It should be noted that the judges must give their reasons not only for rejecting the

[117] Coram Parisella, November 25, 1976, SRRDec 68 (1976) 463.

[118] See Mendonça, "The Role of Experts," 443.

[119] John Paul II, alloc, February 5, 1987, AAS 80 (1987) 1457–1458. Translated in Woestman, Papal Allocutions, 194–195.

[120] For further reflections on assessing the reports of experts, see Z. Grocholewski, "The Ecclesiastical Judge and the Findings of Psychiatric and Psychological Experts," J 47 (1987) 462–466; Mendonça, "The Role of Experts," 440–446; and García Faílde, "El perito psicólogo," 106–108.

[121] Doran, "Some Thoughts on Experts," 65.

conclusions of experts, but also for accepting them.

Expenses of the Expert

Canon 1580 — The judge must justly and equitably determine the expenses and fees to be paid to the experts, with due regard for particular law.

Particular law is to provide for the appropriate remuneration of experts (see c. 1649, §1, 2°). Within the framework of such local legislation, it is the responsibility of the judge to make determinations concerning honoraria for experts.

Private Experts

Canon 1581 — §1. The parties can designate private experts whom the judge must approve.

§2. If the judge allows them, the private experts can inspect the acts of the case insofar as necessary and attend the presentation of the expert testimony; moreover, they can always present their own report.

"Private experts" may be proposed by the parties in ecclesiastical trials. A private expert (selected by a party) needs to be distinguished from an "expert witness" (a witness who happens to have some expertise) and from those experts appointed by the court.[122] Judges retain the responsibility for admitting them or not.[123]

Once admitted, these private experts should be given access to data upon which to draw responsible conclusions. Therefore, "insofar as necessary" (a determination made by the judges),[124] the private expert has the right to study the evidence already assembled by the tribunal, to be present at the examination conducted by the tribunal's own experts, and to present a report. R. Bourgon concludes that private experts "are not allowed to inspect the reports of the appointed experts or to be present when these are questioned about their reports."[125] This author disagrees, and is convinced that judges retain the underlying discretion to allow private experts to review the reports of court-appointed periti or to be present when they are questioned.[126] Clearly, judges need not do so. But, if the judges become convinced that it would aid the search for the truth to permit private experts one or both of these functions, that is not prohibited by canon 1581.

CHAPTER V
JUDICIAL EXAMINATION AND INSPECTION
[cc. 1582–1583]

Canon 1582 — If, in order to decide a case, the judge considers it opportune to visit some place or to inspect some thing, the judge, after having heard the parties, is to order it by a decree describing in summary fashion those things which must be exhibited during the visit or inspection.

[122] A. Mendonça in "The Role of Experts," 430–431, briefly discusses the differences between these three figures.

[123] The use of private experts in public cases is an innovation in the 1983 code. Given the common experience of "dueling experts" in secular legal actions, the judge has the responsibility to assure that the involvement of private experts does not create a dynamic at odds with the chief aim of canonical trials, i.e., seeking the truth. For reflections on this issue, see Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 987.

[124] T. G. Doran, in "Some Thoughts on Experts," 64, emphasizes that the experts are to be given access only to those acts necessary to fulfill their tasks. For example, if certain acts or portions of acts have no relevance to the questions proposed for the experts' consideration, the judge should not make those acts available to them.

[125] Bourgon, in CLSGBI Com, 893.

[126] The 1976 schema on procedural law contained no canon permitting private experts. In its meeting of November 24, 1978, the coetus drafted a new text that eventually became canon 1581. In a series of votes taken concerning this new canon, the members of the coetus decided not to include reviewing the reports and being present for the questioning in the list of things the private experts can normally do (see Comm 11 [1979] 124–125). But that vote concerned the simple question of whether to include those possibilities specifically in the text; it was not a vote to prohibit those practices.

Canon 1583 — When the visit or inspection has been completed, a report about it is to be drafted.

At times, the just resolution of a dispute requires that the judge personally visit some site or inspect some object relevant to the issues in the case. Judicial examination or access (accessus) refers to the judge's visit to a location outside of the courtroom (e.g., a church or, in penal cases, the scene of an alleged ecclesiastical crime). Judicial inspection (recognitio) refers to bringing objects into the court for examination by the judge for possible admission into evidence as exhibits (e.g., photographs of the scene of an alleged crime).

Such a visit or inspection would be ordered by the judge only after first having heard the parties on the question of whether this is relevant and useful. The judge's decree would then specify the things that are to be examined during the visitation or inspection.

Once the inspection has taken place, a document reporting the results of the visit or inspection must be drawn up and included in the acts.[127] This document should clearly express the specific findings of the judge which resulted from the examination (e.g., what was observed, what was learned). The document then becomes part of the evidence and is to be weighed in the context of all other evidence.

CHAPTER VI PRESUMPTIONS [cc. 1584–1586]

Presumptions are a critical, inescapable, yet often neglected source of proof in any trial. While presumptions constitute an "indirect" rather than a direct form of proof, when properly used they are an important tool for discovering the truth and establishing moral certitude. The misuse of presumptions, on the other hand, can create serious problems by obscuring rather than revealing the truth.

Definition and Distinctions

Canon 1584 — A presumption is a probable conjecture about an uncertain matter; a presumption of law is one which the law itself establishes; a human presumption is one which a judge formulates.

The definition of a presumption contained in this canon is simple and precisely worded.[128] First, presumptions always involve "uncertain matters." Where there is full certitude, there is no need for a presumption. Second, a presumption, no matter how well conceived, remains a conjecture. Thus, of their nature, presumptions must always cede to contrary proof.[129] But presumptions are not just any sort of conjecture; they are not even "educated guesses." They are "probable" conjectures supported by well-established facts and solid reasoning. A clear understanding of the nature of presumptions is critical to their proper use in the judicial forum.

The law distinguishes two types of presumptions. First there are presumptions of law (praesumptio iuris). These "legal presumptions" are established by the law itself and have the force given to them by the law.[130] Examples of legal [127] Because of the canonical principle quod non est in actis, non est in mundo (what is not in the acts does not exist), this document reporting the results of the visit or inspection must be included in the acts.

[128] Although the definition of a presumption and distinctions among their types are applicable in Eastern law, there is no comparable canon in the Eastern code. See Abbass, "Contentious Trials," 881–882.

[129] As Bourgon points out in CLSGBI Com, 894, presumptions, whether legal or human, may be overturned directly (by demonstrating that the "fact" being presumed is false) or indirectly (by demonstrating the falsehood of the "factual basis" used in formulating the presumption).

[130] The 1983 code eliminates the distinction made in CIC 1825, §2 between a simple legal presumption, praesumptio iuris simpliciter, and an absolute legal presumption, praesumptio iuris et de iure (i.e., that which was established by the law and considered so firm that it could be challenged only indirectly by attacking the supposed factual basis of the presumption).

presumptions in canon law are the presumption in case of doubt that a previous law is not revoked by a later law (c. 21); the presumption, for purposes of recourse, that an administrator's silence constitutes a negative reply to a petition (c. 57, §2); the presumption that a minor possesses the use of reason at age seven (c. 97, §2); the presumption that a properly celebrated marriage is valid (c. 1060); the presumption of consummation if the spouses have lived together after the exchange of consent (c. 1061, §2); the presumption that the internal consent of the mind conforms with the words and signs used in the celebration of marriage (c. 1101, §1); the presumption that consent to marriage that was inefficacious due to an impediment or defect of form nonetheless persists until its withdrawal has been established (c. 1107); and presumptions regarding paternity and the legitimacy of children (c. 1138). There is also a process for establishing the presumed death of a spouse (c. 1707), which, once established, then carries the force of a legal presumption.

Second, there are "human presumptions" (praesumptio hominis) which, during a trial, are formulated by the judge under the conditions described in canon 1586.

Force of Legal Presumptions

Canon 1585 — A person who has a favorable presumption of law is freed from the burden of proof, which then falls to the other party.

Presumptions of law have significant judicial consequences. Those matters enjoying a presumption of law need not be proved (c. 1526, §2, 1°). In a trial, the position supported by a favorable legal presumption stands unless and until sufficient proof is brought forward to overturn that presumption. Thus, for example, in marriage nullity cases, the validity of the bond is presumed (c. 1060) and the petitioner has the burden of proving otherwise (c. 1526, §1).

The limits of legal presumptions, however, must be clearly understood. Some legal presumptions come into play only if the foundation for the presumption has been proven. For example, in a marriage case the presumption concerning the conformity between internal consent and external words and deeds (c. 1101, §1) comes into play only when there is certitude that an exchange of vows actually took place. Legal presumptions, while exempting a party from the burden of proving the matter presumed, are not of themselves unimpeachable. These presumptions always cede to the truth.

Human Presumptions

Canon 1586 — The judge is not to formulate presumptions which are not established by law unless they are directly based on a certain and determined fact connected with the matter in dispute.

A judge is not to formulate human presumptions unless two clearly specified conditions are met.[131] First, the presumption, which remains a conjecture, requires a solid factual foundation. Without such a foundation, the conjecture is not probable and thus not a valid presumption.[132] Second, the certain fact upon which a presumption is based must have a direct connection with the question at issue. Otherwise, no matter how solid the conjecture may be, it is irrelevant.

Well-formed human presumptions "have long been staples of the jurisprudence of the Rota."[133] In fact, as Doheny rightly noted, "whenever the question of consent is concerned, presumptions must be frequently invoked by the judges in arriv-

[131] CCEO 1265 is worded more positively: "To come to a just sentence, the judge can formulate presumptions which are not established by the law itself as long as they arise from a certain and determined fact which is directly connected with the subject matter of the controversy." This provision concerning human presumptions is also placed first in the discussion, prior to CCEO 1266 on legal presumptions.

[132] Thus, a presumption cannot be based on another presumption. See Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 988.

[133] Beal, "The Substance of Things Hoped For," 771. Also see Wanenmacher, Canonical Evidence, 243–244 (at #391).

ing at their decisions. A great deal of information is necessary to enable them to formulate these presumptions prudently and correctly."[134] In order to form human presumptions rightly, judges must have a clear understanding of their nature and role in the development of proof.

Presumptions involve both inductive and deductive reasoning. John Beal describes well the process through which a presumption is formed. The "inductive moment consists in distilling from the data of experience a general principle that describes the causal relationship that generally exists between two discrete facts." This "generalization from experience" becomes the "major premise of a syllogism" whose minor premise is that the "factual situation foreseen in the generalization was indeed met in the concrete case being adjudged." The conclusion is then deduced from the syllogism.[135]

In marriage nullity cases, sometimes human presumptions may support a conclusion of nullity, but at other times they may support the validity of the bond. For example, a judge rightly might presume that a common life enduring forty-five years supports the presumption of validity. This is a reasonable presumption, but one which may be overturned by contrary evidence.

Presumptions have probative value only for the concrete case in which they are formulated.[136] It is not legitimate to draw up presumptions and apply them automatically or uncritically to entire classes of marriages.[137] Thus, caution is needed in suggesting examples of human presumptions—precisely because genuine presumptions always must be rooted in the facts of specific cases. Nonetheless, jurisprudence provides helpful examples that can guide judges in the task of formulating presumptions appropriately. For instance, presumptions regularly come into play in marriage cases tried on the ground vis vel metus (force or fear). Rotal jurisprudence has traditionally employed presumptions as a mode of proof when there is evidence of strong aversion toward a prospective spouse.[138] When reverential fear is involved, the facts uncovered through documents and the testimony of the parties and witnesses may establish that: (1) the one being pressured was a teenager, (2) he or she was still living at home and financially dependent, and (3) the parents not only demanded that their son or daughter marry but reinforced that demand with weighty threats. On the basis of these facts, a judge may presume that the ensuing fear was sufficiently grave to compel the child to enter marriage. On the other hand, if the son or daughter was twenty-nine years of age, independent financially and emotionally, and the pressure to marry was not backed up with threats, a judge may understandably presume that any fear of going against the wishes of the parents was not so grave as to rob the person of freedom.[139]

[134] Doheny, Canonical Procedure, I:424–425.

[135] Beal, "The Substance of Things Hoped For," 771–772. Pompedda in "Decision-Sentence," 88–90, and J. J. García Faílde, Nuevo derecho procesal canónico: Estudio sistemático-analítico comparado, 3rd rev. ed. (Salamanca: Publicaciones Universidad Pontificia, 1995) 195–198, also describe how judges formulate and apply presumptions.

[136] García Faílde, Nuevo derecho procesal canónico, 199.

[137] Wanenmacher, Canonical Evidence, 242. More recently, the Signatura prohibited the use of a generalized list of presumptions. See ApSig, decr, December 13, 1995, "Formulation of 'Presumptions of Fact,'" RRAO 1996, 34–39.

[138] L. Wrenn, in "Notes, but Mostly Footnotes," J 30 (1970) 210–211, cites presumptions related to aversion used by several Rotal auditors.

[139] Other examples of pertinent presumptions include: (1) presumptions for or against antecedence given to various types of impotence and to certain severe personality disorders (see L. Wrenn, The Invalid Marriage [Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1998] 16–17, 73, 88); (2) presumptions concerning the perpetuity and tenacity of attitudes in cases involving simulation or deeply ingrained error (see Wrenn, "Notes, but Mostly Footnotes," 211–214); (3) presumptions related to the intention of persons who engage in sexual activity with other partners immediately prior to a wedding (see Beal, "The Substance of Things Hoped For," 771); and (4) presuming that a spouse committed adultery in light of a series of proven facts concerning his behavior (see García Faílde, Nuevo derecho procesal canónico, 199–200].

The probative force of human presumptions varies. Some may be little more than suspicions, and are termed "light." Other presumptions may be grave and carry significant weight. Finally, jurisprudence recognizes the possibility of a vehement presumption of great and possibly even full probative value.[140]

While presumptions must be based on certain and determined facts directly connected with the matter at issue, presumptions may be related to incidental questions as well as to the central issue of a trial. For example, in the context of a trial, a question may arise concerning the credibility of a certain witness. Presumptions rooted in a person's reputation for great integrity (or, to the contrary, a reputation for mendacity) may well help the judge reach conclusions about the reliability of this witness's testimony. The presumption says nothing about the specific issue at the heart of the trial, but is directly related to the matter of weighing the evidence given by the witness.

Presumptions also have an auxiliary role in guiding the instruction of a case. For example, a certain constellation of facts may lead a judge to presume that a person was in substantial and determining error concerning the indissolubility of marriage or that a person labored under a serious mental illness. In these circumstances, the judge would conduct additional instruction of the case either to verify or disprove these conclusions.

Because presumptions involve hard work and careful reasoning, there can be a tendency to avoid their use. Or, on the other hand, there can be a tendency either to create presumptions rashly or uncritically to accept presumptions made by others. Yet, in the process of conducting the trial and seeking the truth, judges cannot abdicate their responsibility to formulate and apply well-reasoned presumptions.[141]

Title V[142]
Incidental Cases[143]
[cc. 1587–1597]

The Notion and Proposal of Incidental Cases

Canon 1587 — An incidental case arises whenever, after the trial has begun through the citation, a question is proposed which nevertheless pertains to the case in such a way that it frequently must be resolved before the principal question, even if it was not expressly contained in the libellus which introduced the litigation.

Canon 1588 — An incidental case is proposed in writing or orally before the judge competent to decide the principal case, indicating the connection between this and the principal case.

Before resolving the central issue in a trial, judges may have to resolve one or more secondary questions. These are called "incidental cases." Incidental cases may have been expressly included in the initial libellus, or they may arise during the trial. In either situation, they must be resolved by the judges before they rule on the central issue.

[140] Pompedda, "Decision-Sentence," 90.

[141] M. F. Pompedda in "Decision-Sentence," 85–90, situates his discussion on presumptions in the context of the judge's responsibility to use indirect as well as direct proofs (87) in seeking moral certitude. J. J. García Faílde in Nuevo derecho procesal canónico, 199, notes that presumptions formulated by the judge have a special importance in marriage nullity cases.

[142] CCEO 1267–1277 on incidental cases corresponds to the Latin cc. 1587–1597. Unlike the current Latin code but like its predecessor (CIC 1865–1867), the Eastern code has an additional three canons (CCEO 1278–1280) governing "attempts to a pending suit." An "attempt" is an incidental matter introducing innovations that are against the will of and prejudicial to the interests of one or both parties to a case. For a brief comment on the decision to retain these norms in the Eastern code, see Abbass, "Contentious Trials," 886–888.

[143] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 989–991; M. Ryan, in CLSGBI Com, 895–899; Madero, in Pamplona ComEng, 983–989; J. L. Acebal, in Salamanca Com, 772–777; Arroba Conde, in Valencia Com, 688–692; P. A. Bonnet, in Com Ex IV/2, 1436–1469; L. Madero, in Com Ex IV/2, 1470–1476.

By definition, incidental cases take place only after a trial is initiated by a citation. Thus, the court's initial assessment of its claim to assume competence over some dispute is not strictly speaking an incidental case. Should a challenge to the basis of jurisdiction be raised during the trial, however, the matter is an incidental case that must be resolved (see c. 1460). Examples of incidental cases that might arise include the question of whether to appoint a guardian (cc. 1478–1479), to admit or exclude a witness (c. 1555), or to respond to an exception (c. 1462, §2).

Incidental cases may be raised in written or oral form, but the connection between the secondary question and the principal issue must be clearly delineated. Competence over the resolution of incidental questions belongs to the judge who is responsible for the principal case.

Admission or Rejection

Canon 1589 — §1. After having received the petition and heard the parties, the judge is to decide as promptly as possible (expeditissime) whether the proposed incidental question seems to have a foundation and a connection with the principal trial or rather must be rejected at the outset. If the judge admits the incidental question, the judge is to decide whether it is of such gravity that it must be resolved by an interlocutory sentence or by a decree.

§2. If the judge decides not to resolve the incidental question before the definitive sentence, however, the judge is to decree that the question will be considered when the principal case is decided.

Upon receiving the petition to decide an incidental case, the judge is to give the parties the opportunity to comment on the issue. As soon as possible (expeditissime)[144] the judge then makes the following determinations:

(1) whether the secondary issue has any foundation;
(2) whether the proposed case is truly related to the principal trial, or whether it is an entirely separate question.

If the proposed incidental case has no foundation or has no reasonable connection to the principal issue, the judge, by decree, is to reject it entirely. If the judge admits the question, the court has three options for resolving the incidental case:

(1) when the question is a grave one, it is to be resolved by an interlocutory sentence;
(2) in other circumstances, the incidental case may be resolved by a decree of the judge;
(3) by decree, the judge may decide to resolve the incidental question in the context of the definitive sentence deciding the central issue.

Procedures Used in Incidental Cases

Canon 1590 — §1. If the incidental question must be resolved by sentence, the norms for the oral contentious process are to be observed unless the judge decides otherwise due to the gravity of the matter.

§2. If the matter must be resolved by decree, however, the tribunal can entrust the matter to an auditor or the presiding judge.

If the incidental question is of such a nature that it needs to be resolved by an interlocutory sentence, the matter normally is addressed by employing the oral contentious process.[145] When the issue is very serious or complex in nature, however, the judge has the discretion to order, and the parties have the right to insist, that the incidental question be addressed by means of the ordinary contentious process.

If the incidental matter is to be decided by a decree, the decision may be entrusted to an auditor.[146] The decision may also be made by the presiding judge alone rather than by the college if the principal case has been entrusted to a panel of judges.

[144] The decision of the judge in this matter admits of no appeal (c. 1629, 5°).

[145] See the commentary on cc. 1656–1670.

Revocation or Correction of Decision

Canon 1591 — Before the principal case is completed, the judge or the tribunal can revoke or reform the decree or interlocutory sentence for a just reason either at the request of a party or ex officio after the parties have been heard.

Prior to the completion of the principal case, the college of judges or individual judge may revoke or revise any interlocutory sentence or decree issued in an incidental case. To do so, there must be a just cause. For example, new evidence may have emerged that sheds a different light on the incidental question. Also, for the revocation or revision to be valid (see c. 127, §2, 2°), the parties must be informed about the proposed revision and given the opportunity to comment.

This provision for amendment allows the court to correct any possible errors that might come to light during the instruction of the case concerning the principal issue. The revocation or amendment of the decision in the incidental case may be made by the judge or judges either at their own initiative or at the request of one or more of the parties.

CHAPTER I
PARTIES WHO DO NOT APPEAR
[cc. 1592–1595]

Declaring a Respondent Absent

Canon 1592 — §1. If the cited respondent has neither appeared nor given a suitable excuse for being absent or has not responded according to the norm of can. 1507, §1, the judge, having observed what is required, is to declare the respondent absent from the trial and decree that the case is to proceed to the definitive sentence and its execution.

§2. Before issuing the decree mentioned in §1, the judge must be certain that a legitimately executed citation has reached the respondent within the useful time, even by issuing a new citation if necessary.

The citation issued by a tribunal carries with it the obligation to respond in the way directed by the citation (tribunal appearance, written reply). When a respondent has not replied to the citation or provided a reasonable excuse for being unable to respond at the time or in the manner requested, the judge has the responsibility to declare that person absent from the trial.

In the 1917 code, this institute was known as a decree of contumacy. The current legislation, recognizing that many factors might induce a respondent to ignore a citation, has removed the judgmental language.

Before issuing a decree of absence, the judge must be certain that: (1) there was a legitimate citation, (2) there was no appearance by the cited party, (3) the cited party gave no reasonable excuse for failing to appear, and (4) the cited party also did not respond in accord with canon 1507, §1, which permits a written response. With regard to the first of these, normally there must be evidence that the citation reached the respondent. If the initial citation was delivered by "return receipt" mail, the signed receipt provides such certainty, although there are other ways in which the judge can have such certitude (e.g., the testimony of witnesses verifying that the respondent received the citation). In case of doubt concerning whether a citation reached the respondent, the canon itself suggests the possibility of issuing a second citation. It should be remembered that a respondent who refuses to accept or otherwise evades the notification of a citation is considered legitimately cited (c. 1510). The fact that a respondent cooperates only selectively in the process, however, is not a reason for a declaration of absence.[147]

[146] When this is done, the auditor, who may be a lay man or woman (c. 1428), exercises true decision-making authority.

The absence of a respondent significantly limits the tribunal's ability to discover and rule in accord with the truth. This is especially critical in marriage nullity cases, where testimony from both parties to the partnership provides the possibility of greater insight into its dynamics. Thus, a judge might decide to delay a decree of absence if there is hope that a respondent might be persuaded to reply. Eventually, however, should the respondent not participate, then he or she is to be decreed absent. Like any decree that is not merely procedural, this must be in writing, with a summary of its reasons (cc. 51, 1617).

The consequences of the respondent's absence are most significant. In effect, by their absence respondents waive most of their rights in the trial. In the absence of a respondent, the "case is to proceed to the definitive sentence and its execution" with the judge observing that which is required (servatis servandis). What, however, are those essentials which a judge must observe? The code does not specify what rights a respondent waives and what elements of the process must still be observed. The rules for interpretation enshrined in canons 17 and 19 and the norms governing the Roman Rota, however, can clarify the issue.[148] Article 60, paragraph 3 of these norms provides that those who have been decreed absent are to be notified of the decree of the joinder of the issues and of the definitive sentence.[149] Article 79, by its cross-reference to article 60, clarifies that an absent respondent has effectively waived the right to review the published acts of the case.[150]

Occasionally, respondents may state expressly that they wish no further contact from the tribunal whatsoever. In this case, precisely out of respect for their demands, even the minimal notifications made to absent respondents need not be made.[151]

It should be noted that article 60 of the Rotal norms distinguishes the situation of an absent respondent (art. 60, §3) from that of a respondent who leaves the judgment up to the justice of the court (art. 60, §2). In this latter situation, the Rota does not declare such respondents absent, and they are notified not only of the definition of the issue and the decision but also of any new petitions and all pronouncements of the judge.[152]

The decree of absence is an essential tool protecting a petitioner's right to a just decision. Thus, a respondent cannot derail the ecclesiastical process by refusing to participate. The absence of a respondent, however, might well close important avenues of proof which could support a petitioner's contention.

When the court has been unable to locate the whereabouts of a respondent, it is not appropriate to decree such a respondent absent.[153] The decree [147] A potential exception to this observation emerged in a case coram Colagiovanni, decr, March 30, 1993, ME 119 (1994) 535–544. Two earlier Rotal panels had issued conflicting rulings on whether the first instance decision was null on the basis of the denial of the respondent's right of defense. Eventually, the Colagiovanni turnus ruled that, because the respondent threatened a civil lawsuit, the first instance tribunal was justified both in declaring her absent from the trial (542–543) and in appointing ex officio a procurator for the absent respondent (543).

[148] F. Daneels, "The Right of Defence," Stud Can 27 (1993) 86, also notes that in view of c. 19 and papal teaching, the norms for the Rota provide a guide for local tribunals.

[149] RomRot, Normae, April 18, 1994, art. 60, AAS 86 (1994) 526. For a brief commentary on article 60 of these norms, see J. L. Acebal Luján, "Normas del Tribunal de la Rota Romana: Texto y comentario," REDC 52 (1995) 276.

[150] RomRot, Normae, April 18, 1994, art. 79, AAS 86 (1994) 531. See also Wrenn, Procedures, 62.

[151] Daneels, "The Right of Defence," 86.

[152] Jean Trudeau traces the canonical history of this institute in "La remise à la justice du tribunal dans les causes de nullité de mariage," Stud Can 32 (1998) 129–143. He argues that, although current Rotal norms employ the formula, the lack of any provision for this in the 1983 code means there is no longer any basis for local tribunals to use it. This author, however, is not fully persuaded by Trudeau's conclusion.

[153] A. Stankiewicz, "De citationis necessitate et impugnatione," QuadStR 4 (1989) 81.

of absence presupposes that the respondent has been notified of the process and invited to participate through a prior citation. Rather than issuing a decree of absence, therefore, the court should issue a decree specifying the nature of the efforts made to locate a respondent, concluding that all reasonable efforts to discover the respondent's whereabouts have failed, and ordering the trial to proceed even though it is not possible to cite the respondent.[154]

Subsequent Participation of an Absent Respondent

Canon 1593 — §1. If the respondent appears at the trial later or responds before a decision in the case, the respondent can offer conclusions and proofs, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1600; the judge, however, is to take care that the trial is not prolonged intentionally through longer and unnecessary delays.

When a respondent who has legitimately been decreed absent later chooses to participate, the earlier refusal to reply is not to be held against that person. Within certain limits designed to protect against excessive delays and dilatory tactics, the previously absent respondent may exercise all the usual rights of a party to the case. If the case has already been formally concluded (c. 1599), however, a previously absent respondent can bring forward new proofs only in accord with the provisions of canon 1600.

Absent Respondents and Challenges to the Sentence

§2. Even if the respondent did not appear or respond before a decision in the case, the respondent can use challenges against the sentence; if the respondent proves that there was a legitimate impediment for being detained and there was no personal fault in its not being made known beforehand, the respondent can use a complaint of nullity.

A previously absent respondent, having received notification of the decision, is free to challenge the sentence in accord with the norms of canons 1619–1640. If the respondent can show that he or she was legitimately impeded from participation through no personal fault, then a complaint of remediable nullity of the sentence (c. 1622, 6°) may be lodged. If there was no legitimate impediment, the respondent's absence cannot be used to challenge the sentence on the basis of any alleged denial of the right of defense (c. 1620, 7°). The respondent decreed absent had waived his or her rights and, hence, the court did not deny the right to defense.

Absence of a Petitioner

Canon 1594 — If the petitioner has not appeared on the day and at the hour prescribed for the joinder of the issue and has not offered a suitable excuse:
- 1° the judge is to cite the petitioner again;
- 2° if the petitioner does not comply with the new citation, the petitioner is presumed to have renounced the trial according to the norm of cann. 1524–1525;
- 3° if the petitioner later wishes to intervene in the process, can. 1593 is to be observed.

The absence of a petitioner, while less common, may occur. When petitioners fail to respond to a citation, they are to be cited again. If there is no response to the new citation, the court presumes that the petitioner has renounced the instance, and the norms of canons 1524–1525 apply.[155] As in any renunciation, the instance is not necessarily closed. The respondent must be notified of the petitioner's absence and may well urge that the suit nonetheless [154] See the commentary on cc. 1409, §2 and 1511.

[155] Canon 1594 is an exception to the rule (c. 1524, §3) that a renunciation is not valid unless made in writing and signed by the renouncing party.

go forward. The judge is then to rule whether the suit should continue to be processed despite the petitioner's absence.

If the petitioner's absence did not lead to the closure of the instance, that petitioner may later intervene in the process in accord with the same norms permitting the involvement of a previously absent respondent. On the other hand, if the petitioner's absence resulted in the effective renunciation of the process and a decree closing the instance, that decree extinguished the procedural acts of the process (cc. 1525, 1522). Thus, a subsequent change of mind by a previously absent petitioner would require that he or she submit a libellus seeking a new trial. The substantive acts from the earlier instance may be deemed relevant and incorporated into the new trial, but the trial itself is new and must proceed from the beginning.

Expenses Occasioned by Absence

Canon 1595 — §1. A petitioner or respondent who is absent from the trial and has not given proof of a just impediment is obliged both to pay the expenses of the litigation which have accrued because of the absence and to indemnify the other party if necessary.

§2. If both the petitioner and the respondent were absent from the trial, they are obliged in solidum to pay the expenses of the litigation.

In theory, the expenses incurred because of the absence (without just impediment) of a party are the responsibility of that party. In practice, it may be impossible for a tribunal to collect from an absent party. This responsibility for expenses is one factor that may be taken into consideration if a previously absent party seeks to intervene subsequently. Similarly, if a petitioner's absence is presumed to be a renunciation but a respondent wishes the trial to go forward, the judge may take into consideration the respondent's willingness or unwillingness to accept responsibility for court costs in deciding to continue the trial or decree the process closed.

CHAPTER II
THE INTERVENTION OF A THIRD PERSON IN A CASE[156]
[cc. 1596–1597]

The legislator envisions two possible scenarios. In one case, a third party takes the initiative and seeks to be involved in a trial. In the other, one of the original parties or the judge might conclude that a just resolution of the issues requires the involvement of one or more third parties.

An "Interested" Third Party

Canon 1596 — §1. A person who has an interest can be admitted to intervene in a case at any instance of the litigation, either as a party defending a right or in an accessory manner to help a litigant.

§2. To be admitted, the person must present a libellus to the judge before the conclusion of the case; in the libellus the person briefly is to demonstrate his or her right to intervene.

§3. A person who intervenes in a case must be admitted at that stage which the case has reached, with a brief and peremptory period of time assigned to the person to present proofs if the case has reached the probatory period.

Normally, third parties may seek to intervene at any grade or stage of a trial.[157] They may seek to intervene independently in order to protect their own rights which might be jeopardized, or in an accessory fashion on behalf of the position of one or the other of the parties.

[156] Canons 1276–1277 of the Eastern code are nearly identical with cc. 1596–1597 of the Latin code. The Eastern code, however, makes an additional provision for involvement by third parties, permitting them, under certain circumstances, to attack a definitive sentence prior to its execution (CCEO 1330–1333). There is no parallel provision in the Latin code. For further commentary, see Abbass, "Contentious Trials," 889–890.

[157] There is an exception in penal trials in which a third party may be admitted only in first instance (c. 1729, §2).

The decision whether to admit a third party or not belongs to the judge. The potential third party must first present a libellus requesting admission and establishing the right to intervene. Such a libellus must be handled in accord with the norms for incidental cases (cc. 1587–1591). The judge is to respond to that request expeditissime (c. 1589, §1); hence, there is no appeal from the decree admitting or rejecting the intervention of the third party (c. 1629, 5°).

If the intervention is admitted, the trial continues from the point it had already reached, and procedural acts already placed remain in full force.[158] This prevents third parties from unnecessarily delaying the prosecution of a trial. If the third party is admitted during the instruction phase of a case, the judge assigns a brief but realistic period of time for the third party to present proofs. This deadline is peremptory, meaning that, once it has passed, the right to produce proofs is extinguished. If the third party was admitted only after the conclusion of the case (c. 1599), that party may present proofs only in accord with the provisions of canon 1600.

A "Necessary" Third Party

Canon 1597 — After having heard the parties, the judge must summon to the trial a third person whose intervention seems necessary.

When during the prosecution of a suit it becomes apparent that the involvement of one or more third parties is essential for the court to do justice, the judge is to cite those parties to join the suit.[159] That citation, however, is to be issued only after the judge consults those already involved as parties to the suit. That consultation is required for the validity of the judge's act, although the judge is free to accept or reject the counsel received (c. 127, §2, 2°).

[158] For example, if the joinder of issues was already completed, the involvement of the third party neither requires nor permits a new joinder. Should a third party wish the addition, subtraction, or amendment of a ground, that could be done only in the exceptional circumstances provided by c. 1514.

[159] This is not a citation of a witness to provide testimony. A witness is not a third party. This is a citation of an additional party, someone whose rights are bound up with the issue before the tribunal.

Title VI
The Publication of the Acts, the Conclusion of the Case, and the Discussion of the Case[160]
[cc. 1598–1606]

This title contains norms governing the transition between the instruction or evidence-gathering phase of the trial and the decision-making phase. Three critically important institutes are discussed in this title: (1) the publication of the acts; (2) the conclusion of the evidence-gathering phase and provisions for exceptional gathering of evidence; and (3) the discussion of the case.

The Publication of the Acts

Canon 1598 — §1. After the proofs have been collected, the judge by a decree must permit the parties and their advocates, under penalty of nullity, to inspect at the tribunal chancery the acts not yet known to them; furthermore, a copy of the acts can also be given to advocates who request one. In cases pertaining to the public good to avoid a most grave danger the judge can decree that a specific act must be shown to no one; the judge is to take care, however, that the right of defense always remains intact.

[160] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 991–994; Ryan, in CLSGBI Com, 899–904; Diego-Lora, in Pamplona ComEng, 989–994; Acebal, in Salamanca Com, 778–782; Arroba Conde, in Valencia Com, 693–696; Rodríguez-Ocaña, in Com Ex IV/2, 1477–1520.

The text of canon 1598, §1 reflects compromises resulting from many differing concerns and a great deal of debate during the code revision process.[161] Since the promulgation of the code, the provisions of this canon have continued to receive a great deal of attention in the canonical literature.[162] Papal teaching[163] and Roman jurisprudence since 1983 have emphasized the vital nature of the publication of the acts, but the jurisprudence, while in complete agreement about the fundamental importance of this institute, has not been completely uniform regarding every detail.[164]

The term "publication" may be misunderstood and even create needless fears in the minds of the parties and witnesses. In English, the term "publication" is commonly understood as publicizing something, making it available for public consumption. That, however, is not what is meant in this context. When tribunals communicate with the parties and witnesses, the use of terminology such as "making the acts available for review" may help avoid such misunderstanding.

To interpret and implement the canon properly, it is vital not only to understand the text itself but also to identify and respect the values which the law strives to foster. Two chief values motivate the requirement of the publication of the acts: (1) to provide for the parties' right of defense and (2) to "test" the evidence, thus assuring the tribunal that the truth has been discovered. More will be said about the right of defense below. With regard to the second value, upon reviewing the acts the parties, while perhaps challenging one or two minor points, may indicate that the evidence assembled reflects the truth. This assures the judges that they have a solid basis upon which to rule. On the other hand, the publication of the acts may lead one or both of the parties to challenge certain statements as inaccurate, incomplete, misleading, or totally false. In this respect, publication has some of the benefits of a cross-examination. By identifying disputed claims, the tribunal may then take whatever further steps are needed to clarify the truth.

The canon is precisely worded. Thus, it is essential to examine the text closely in order to know exactly what the law does and does not require.

The General Rule for Publication

1. The publication of the acts occurs only after the evidence has been gathered. For the parties themselves, access to the acts prior to this time is limited to the inspection of documents as provided by canon 1544. In marriage nullity cases, canon 1678, §1, 2° permits the defender of the bond and the advocates of the parties to inspect the acts prior to the publication. But the parties themselves are invited to inspect the acts only after the proofs have been assembled. Withholding publication until all the evi-

[161] For summaries of the discussion on publication of the acts during the drafting process, see Comm 11 (1979) 134–135 and Comm 16 (1984) 68. For a review of the history of the institute and concerns raised during the revision process, see Cox, Procedural Changes, 77–85, and Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 991–992.

[162] Among the many canonists who address the publication of the acts, see: C. Gullo, "La pubblicazione degli atti e la discussione della causa," in Il processo matrimoniale canonico: Nuova edizione riveduta e ampliata, Studi Giuridici XXIX, ed. P. A. Bonnet and C. Gullo (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1994) 677–693; F. Daneels, "The Right of Defence," especially 87–89; A. Farret, "Publication des actes et publication de la sentence dans les causes de nullité de mariage," Stud Can 25 (1991) 115–138; J. G. Johnson, "Publish and Be Damned: The Dilemma of Implementing the Canons on Publishing the Acts and the Sentence," J 49 (1989) 210–240; M. R. Moodie, "Fundamental Rights and Access to the Acts of a Case," Stud Can 28 (1994) 123–154; D. Nau, "Publish and Be Damned: One Practitioner's Experience," J 51 (1991) 442–450; D. A. Smilanic, "The Publication of the Acts: Canon 1598, §1," CLSAP 57 (1995) 377–386; Wrenn, Procedures, 59–62.

[163] John Paul II, alloc, January 26, 1989, AAS 81 (1989) 924. Translation in Woestman, Papal Allocutions, 206.

[164] For examples, see RRAO 1990, 41–42, 47–50, 56–58, 58–61; coram Pinto, decr, May 24, 1985, ME 113 (1988) 314–319; coram Funghini, decr, May 11, 1994, ME 119 (1994) 526–534; coram Colagiovanni, decr, March 30, 1993, ME 119 (1994) 535–544. D. A. Smilanic, in "The Publication of the Acts," 382, briefly discusses different views evident in Rotal jurisprudence.

dence is gathered serves an important value. By reducing the possibility that testimony will be given primarily in reaction against the statements of others, the judge or auditor may more easily obtain a balanced and less defensive account when interrogating the parties and the witnesses. Secondarily, conducting the publication of the acts only after all the evidence is gathered, rather than piecemeal as each new proof is admitted, streamlines the trial and eases the burden on the parties and court officials.

2. The canon places a responsibility on the judge who, by means of a decree, must permit the parties and their advocates to review the acts. Note that the canon uses the Latin et. It is not the parties or their advocates, but the parties and their advocates who must be given this permission. In cases of marriage nullity or the nullity of sacred orders, this permission must be extended to the defender of the bond (cc. 1434; 1678, §1, 2°; 1711).

3. Since canon 1598 does not specifically establish a time limit for reviewing the acts, the judge must define a reasonable peremptory deadline (fatalia legis; see c. 1466). The deadline cannot validly be shortened without the consent of the parties; after hearing the parties it may be extended for a just reason, even without their consent (c. 1465, §2). Given the peremptory nature of the time limit, the right to review the acts ceases once the allotted time has expired.[165] This decree of publication must be communicated to the parties and their advocates in accord with the norms of canon 1509 and the particular law of the tribunal.

4. The permission to review the acts must be extended under penalty of nullity. If the permission was not given or if the notification was not made, the resulting sentence would be open to a complaint of remediable nullity due to an invalid judicial act (c. 1622, 5°). More critically, failure to publish the acts might well be a ground for irremediable nullity as a denial of the right of defense (c. 1620, 7°), as will be discussed shortly.

5. It is vital to note that the validity of the process does not depend on whether the acts were, in fact, reviewed by the parties. It depends on whether a genuine permission was extended to them. The parties may choose not to exercise their right to review the acts, either by so informing the judge or by failing to act within the peremptory time limit.

6. The permission entails reviewing the acts at the tribunal office and not elsewhere. This provides appropriate security for the sensitive information contained in the acts. Thus, normally a party has no right to review the acts at a place of his or her choosing. Parties living outside of the territory of the tribunal trying the case, however, must be allowed to review the acts at the tribunal of their domicile.[166]

7. The permission is to review the acts which are "not yet known to them." A "republication" of acts already known to the parties is unnecessary since for those acts the purposes of publication (protecting the right of defense and testing the truth) would already have been fulfilled.

8. The advocates of the parties, but not the parties themselves, may request a copy of the acts. The advocate is not permitted to give a copy of the acts to his or her client.[167] This norm is designed to balance the parties' right of defense while also assuring the independence and confidentiality of the ecclesiastical process.

[165] RI, n. 25, CorpusIC II, 1122.

[166] A tribunal has a right and responsibility to call on another tribunal to assist in the communication of the acts (c. 1418). See RRAO 1990, 57. If a genuine impediment (e.g., severe illness, military service) precludes a party from coming to the tribunal trying the case, what may be done? The norm of c. 1558, §3, on hearing witnesses outside of the tribunal's offices, is helpful. The judge, by way of exception, could permit the inspection to take place in some other location with due regard for privacy and adequate supervision of the review process.

The Possibility of Exempting an Act from Publication

The expectation of the canon is that all of the acts not yet known to the parties will be made available for inspection. As a result of the debate over the publication of the acts, however, the canon permits certain exemptions from publication. As a law which restricts the free exercise of a right, the exemption must be interpreted narrowly (c. 18).[168] Pope John Paul emphasized that it would "be a distortion of the norm of law and also a grave error of interpretation if the exception were to become the general rule."[169] The exemption, like the canon as a whole, is carefully worded.

1. An exemption from publication may be considered only in cases involving the public good. Marriage nullity cases (c. 1691), cases concerning the separation of spouses (c. 1696), and penal cases (c. 1728, §1) all involve the public good.[170]

2. The only motive permitting the exemption from publication is the avoidance of a most grave danger. The Latin uses the superlative form of the adjective (gravissima pericula). Thus, inconvenience, embarrassment, the preference or request of a party or a witness not to have their testimony made known are not sufficient motives to exempt an act from publication. The canon neither defines what factors constitute gravissima pericula, nor identifies who it is that might be endangered by publication.[171] This wisely respects the judge's discretion to assess the dangers present in a specific case and make an appropriate determination. To assist the judge in exercising this discretion, some commentators point to canon 1548, §2, 2°, which identifies reasons that exempt a witness from the obligation to testify. This parallel can help clarify whether there is sufficient danger to withhold publication of an act.[172]

3. To exempt an act from publication, the judge must issue a decree. While the decree of publication proper is purely procedural in nature and need not contain a summary of its reasons (c. 1617), the decree to exempt an act from publication is not merely procedural. Thus, either the decree of publication itself must identify the exempted act and specify the dangers justifying the exemption, or a separate decree of exemption from publication needs to be included in the acts.

4. Only a specific act (aliquod actum), not the acts as a whole, may be exempted from publication. This might involve all the testimony of one person, or one part of someone's testimony. The canon neither permits a judge to exempt all of the acts from publication, nor limits a judge to exempting one and only one act in a particular case.

5. The decree may stipulate that the act not be shown to anyone. The judge, however, may choose not to extend the exemption so widely. For example, the judge could exempt an act from publication to the parties while permitting their advocates to review the material. This [167] Ryan, in CLSGBI Com, 900–901.

[168] Johnson, "Publish and Be Damned," 213, n. 10.
[169] John Paul II, alloc, January 26, 1989, AAS 81 (1989) 924. Translation in Woestman, Papal Allocutions, 206.
[170] Even if a case is not specifically identified by law as involving the public good, a diocesan bishop may so designate a specific contentious case (c. 1431, §1).
[171] Johnson, in "Publish and Be Damned," 214 and 222, n. 32, indicates that the danger may be to one of the parties, to witnesses, to tribunal personnel, or to the Church itself.
[172] Rodríguez-Ocaña, in Com Ex IV/2, 1485; Wrenn, Procedures, 61.

could be done on the condition that the advocates not communicate the contents of the act to the parties, and would seem to protect the right of defense better than not allowing anyone to see the act.[173] In marriage nullity cases, however, this provision must be interpreted in light of the right of the defender of the bond, the advocates of the parties, and the promoter of justice (if involved in the trial) to inspect the judicial acts even if not yet published.[174]

6. In all cases, the exemption of an act from publication must leave the right of defense intact or the exemption cannot be justified.

Publication and the Right of Defense in Marriage Cases

Controversy over the publication of the acts has not abated in the more than fifteen years since the promulgation of the code. That should not be surprising, since the norm strives to balance important competing rights and interests. Controversy over the canon has centered on its application in marriage nullity cases. The debate has contributed to deeper reflection on the nature of marriage nullity cases[175] and on the meaning of the right of defense (c. 221, §1) in such cases.[176] Lawrence Wrenn has argued that in marriage nullity cases "the right of defense and the right of the parties to know are separable rights" because "the issue is not the good name of either party but the validity of the marriage bond." Hence, as Wrenn understands it, the right of defense belongs primarily to the defender of the bond.[177] Michael Moodie has strongly challenged this, arguing that the role of the defender of the bond does not remove the right of defense from the parties.[178] Rather, Moodie argues, marriage cases always concern a person's state of life, and there is a fundamental right to vindicate one's state of life and protect one's personal dignity. Hence any "infringement upon the right to know would appear to violate fundamental rights of the individual."[179] Alain Farret, based on certain trends in Rotal jurisprudence, argues for an understanding of canon 1598 that is carefully nuanced in light of canon 1691.[180] He concludes that in publishing the acts, the key issue is whether the parties have real knowledge of the facts of the case and the practical opportunity of offering a defense. This allows a judge greater latitude for exempting acts from publication.[181]

Clearly, the right of defense cannot be simplistically identified with the right to review the acts. Otherwise, the exception permitting the exemption of some acts from publication would be a denial of the right of defense. Other canonical processes involving the status of marriages, while administrative in nature and not identical to marriage nullity trials, reinforce this conclusion. For example, the administrative process for a dispensation from a non-consummated marriage requires the intervention of the defender (c. 1701, §1), the hearing of the parties, and the use of many of the norms for ordinary contentious trials and marriage nullity cases (c. 1702). Yet, in this process the acts are not

[173] See Ryan, in CLSGBI Com, 901. D. A. Smilanic, in "The Publication of the Acts," 383–384, notes that "the quality of the advocate's activity is a pivotal point" in Rotal jurisprudence concerning the publication of the acts and the right of defense.

[174] See the commentary on c. 1678, §1, 2°.

[175] Z. Grocholewski, in "Quisnam est pars conventa in causis nullitatis matrimonii?" P 79 (1990) 357–391, argues convincingly that the nullity petition is against the presumption of validity (c. 1060), not against the other spouse. Hence, church authority is the true respondent in marriage nullity cases and is represented by the defender of the bond.

[176] The drafting commission specifically indicated that the publication of the acts was "intimately connected" with the right of defense. See Comm 16 (1984) 68.

[177] Wrenn, Procedures, 61–62; see also 72–73.

[178] Moodie, "Fundamental Rights and Access to the Acts," 127–138.

[179] Ibid., 140–141.

[180] The canon indicates that the norms concerning trials in general and the ordinary contentious process are to be applied in marriage nullity cases unless the nature of the case demands otherwise. See the commentary on c. 1691.

[181] Farret, "Publication des actes et publication de la sentence," 137–138.

to be published (c. 1703, §1). Similarly, the acts are not to be published or inspected in the administrative process for a papal dissolution in favor of the faith, even though the instruction of such cases is quasi-judicial and involves the intervention of the defender of the bond.[182] At the same time, even if the bond as upheld by church authority is the chief respondent, not only the defender but also the petitioner and respondent have significant rights at stake. Thus, when the respondent has not been declared absent from the trial,[183] respect for the right of defense would require only limited use of the exemption provided in canon 1598, §1.

Some Practical Possibilities

When there is a genuine concern that the information contained in the acts might be misused (e.g., risk of damage to the reputation of others, possible scandal or family quarrels, potential civil court actions), judges may consider other possibilities to mitigate the potential dangers.

1. Judges could invoke their authority to oblige the parties to swear an oath to use the information only in the canonical trial and otherwise to observe secrecy regarding the material (c. 1455, §3). There is a lacuna in the law, however, since nowhere does the code spell out the consequence of a party's refusal to take such an oath. May judges deny access to the acts if a party refuses to swear or otherwise solemnly promise to maintain secrecy? The refusal to make such a promise of secrecy would manifest a lack of respect for the fundamental nature of this ecclesiastical process. Such a refusal would seem to constitute the gravissima pericula envisioned by the canon, and this author believes judges are well within their rights to withhold the publication of the acts under these extraordinary circumstances.[184]

2. Certainly, there is no need to reveal the addresses and telephone numbers of the parties and witnesses, information which has no bearing on the right of defense.

3. In addition to excusing witnesses from testifying in the first place, judges could exclude entirely from the acts the testimony of a particularly fearful witness when other sources of evidence make any information provided by that witness unnecessary. The evidence initially presented by that witness, therefore, could not be used in any fashion.

4. Judges might also exclude from the acts materials that might be inflammatory but which have no relevance to the specific ground.[185] This situation tends to arise when tribunals use generalized questions eliciting a wide variety of information rather than more precisely focused interrogatories. For example, if the ground of nullity involves simulation on the part of the petitioner, certain information about the respondent may be vitally important to help identify the petitioner's motive for simulating. Other information about the respondent, however, may have no evidentiary value, and the judges could entirely exclude such information as irrelevant to the issue.

Further Instruction of Case Subsequent to Publication

§2. To complete the proofs, the parties can propose additional proofs to the judge. When these proofs have been collected, it is again an occasion for the decree mentioned in §1 if the judge thinks it necessary.

[182] See the private reply published in RRAO 1998, 29–30.
[183] See the commentary on c. 1592.
[184] A March 30, 1993 decision coram Colagiovanni does not speak directly to this lacuna, but is instructive. The decision upheld the validity of a sentence in which the respondent was not allowed access to the acts of a case because of her threat to initiate a civil lawsuit. See ME 119 (1994) 535–544.
[185] Smilanic, in "Publication of the Acts," 384, notes that what is subject to publication is "all the evidence on which a sentence rests."

Based on their review of the acts, the parties may wish to present additional proofs to rebut allegedly false claims, or to supplement, nuance, or provide a context for other elements of the evidence. The judge determines whether to admit or reject the proposed new proofs (e.g., see cc. 1527, 1533, and 1547). If additional proofs are admitted into the acts of the case, there may be a need for a new decree of publication, permitting the parties to inspect the new evidence. This is not strictly required, however, and the judge may determine that a new publication is unnecessary. Often, there may be little or nothing new or relevant in the "new" proofs, in which case further publication would extend the trial for no benefit. On the other hand, if the additional evidence contains something of significance that sheds new light on the issues in the case, respect for the right of defense would lead the judge to publish the newly acquired acts.

The Conclusion of the Case

Canon 1599 — §1. When everything pertaining to the production of proofs has been completed, the conclusion of the case is reached.

§2. This conclusion occurs whenever the parties declare that they have nothing else to add, the useful time prescribed by the judge to propose proofs has elapsed, or the judge declares that the case is instructed sufficiently.

§3. The judge is to issue a decree that the case has reached its conclusion, in whatever manner it has occurred.

The term "conclusion of the case" (conclusionem in causa) may be somewhat misleading to one not trained in procedural law. The trial is not completed or concluded; rather, the case remains pending, since the decision regarding the doubt (dubium) has not yet been rendered. The instance remains open, and vitally important stages of the trial, such as the discussion of the case and the crafting and publication of the judicial sentence, remain. What is concluded at this point, except under the extraordinary circumstances described in canon 1600, is the evidence-gathering phase of the trial.

The conclusion occurs in one of three ways: (1) the parties to the case declare that they have no further evidence to bring forward; (2) the time limits established by the judge for producing proof have expired; (3) the judges declare that sufficient proof has been assembled to establish the truth of the matter. The recognition of the fact that the instruction is concluded is to be accomplished in the form of a judicial decree.

Admission of New Proofs after the Conclusion

Canon 1600 — §1. After the conclusion of the case, the judge can still summon the same or other witnesses or arrange for other proofs which were not requested earlier, only:

1° in cases which concern the private good of the parties alone, if all the parties consent;

2° in other cases, after the parties have been heard and provided that there is a grave reason and any danger of fraud or subornation is eliminated;

3° in all cases whenever it is likely that the sentence will be unjust because of the reasons mentioned in can. 1645, §2, nn. 1–3 unless the new proof is allowed.

Once the decree concluding the case has been issued, new evidence of any sort may be admitted only under very limited circumstances.[186] This norm is designed to assure that dilatory tactics do not unduly delay the verdict while at the same time providing a protection against an unjust decision. New evidence may be admitted after the conclusion of the case only in three circumstances.

1. New evidence may be admitted when the case involves the private as opposed to the public good[187] and all the parties to the case agree to admit the new evidence.

[186] Similarly, new evidence is admitted on the appellate level in accord with the same limited circumstances (c. 1639, §2).

[187] See the commentary on c. 1431 for the means of distinguishing cases involving the public good from cases involving the private good.

2. New evidence may also be admitted in cases involving the public good even if one of the parties has objected to the proposal to admit new evidence. This may be done when a grave reason (gravis ratio) exists for admitting the new evidence

a) provided that the judges first consult the parties about the matter and
b) provided all danger of fraud or subornation has been removed.[188]

The judges assess whether the reason is grave and have the responsibility to determine whether or not the possibility of fraud or subornation has been removed.

3. In all types of cases, new evidence may be admitted whenever it is probable[189] that, unless the evidence is admitted, the ultimate decision will be unjust and hence subject to a petition for a restitutio in integrum for the reasons described in canon 1645, §2, 1°–3°. Thus, new evidence is to be admitted when:

a) it is probable that the judgment would be rendered on the basis of false evidence (1°), b) a document has been discovered demanding a contrary decision (2°), c) the court has learned that its judgment would be based on the deceitful testimony (dolus) of one of the parties which is harmful to the interests of another party.[190]

Introduction of a New Document after the Conclusion

§2. The judge, moreover, can order or allow a document to be shown, which may have been unable to be shown earlier through no negligence of the interested person.

Beyond the three circumstances just described, judges may admit a document (see cc. 1544–1546) into the evidence when a party was legitimately impeded from presenting it earlier in the trial. On their own authority, the judges may also request a new document at this time.

Publication of New Proofs

§3. New proofs are to be published according to can. 1598, §1.

If and when any new evidence has been admitted into the acts, that new material is to be published in accord with canon 1598, §1. Given the strict rules for admitting evidence subsequent to the conclusion of the case, that new material almost inevitably involves new or very weighty information. Hence, publication is necessary to protect the right of defense.[191]

The Discussion Phase: Time Limit for Arguments and Observations

Canon 1601 — After the conclusion of the case, the judge is to determine a suitable period of time to present defense briefs or observations.

[188] The admission of new evidence is invalid if the parties are not consulted. But, while they must listen to the parties, the judges need not follow their advice or obtain their consent (c. 127, §2, 2°).

[189] The text requires the probability (though not absolute certainty) that injustice may result unless the new evidence is admitted. The mere possibility of an injustice is not sufficient, since the moral certitude required for the ultimate judgment need not exclude every possibility of the contrary (c. 1608, §1).

[190] The existence of fraudulent testimony may not necessarily require the admission of new evidence, since the tribunal may well determine that its decision would not be based on the deceitful claims. If that is the case, the trial may move forward to a decision, although the judge should consider an appropriate penalty for the person who attempted to deceive the court (see cc. 1531, §1 and 1368).

[191] One should note that the reference is to the first and not the second paragraph of c. 1598. When evidence is brought forward subsequent to the initial publication but prior to the conclusion of the case, the judge has the discretion to determine that a new publication is not required (c. 1598, §2). The judge, however, does not have the same degree of flexibility regarding evidence admitted in accord with c. 1600.

The discussion phase of the trial begins after the conclusion of the case. The judge has the authority and duty to establish a reasonable period of time within which the parties, their advocates, the defender of the bond, and the promoter of justice may study the evidence and present their observations and arguments. That period of time is most appropriately specified in the decree of conclusion. The code does not suggest an appropriate length of time, leaving the determination to the judge. In establishing the appropriate time, the judge needs to balance two concerns: (1) avoiding needless delays so that the law's expectation of an expeditious trial (c. 1453) is respected, while (2) providing sufficient time for adequate study of the case. The judge may extend the time limit for just cause provided the trial as a whole is not unduly prolonged (c. 1465, §§2–3).

Norms Governing the Pleadings

Canon 1602 — §1. The defense briefs and the observations are to be written unless the judge, with the consent of the parties, considers a debate before a session of the tribunal to be sufficient.

§2. To print the defense briefs along with the principal documents requires the previous permission of the judge, without prejudice to the obligation of secrecy, if such exists.

§3. The regulations of the tribunal are to be observed regarding the length of the defense briefs, the number of copies, and other matters of this kind.

Normally, the observations and pleadings of the parties are to be presented in writing. Only with the parties' consent[192] may an oral discussion be substituted for written briefs. If an oral discussion is held, a notary is to be present (c. 1605).

Generally, written briefs are typed or prepared using a word processing program. If, however, there is any need or desire that the written briefs be printed for publication, the judge must issue a specific order authorizing this. Such an authorization may be extended only if the obligation of secrecy is fully protected so that the rights and reputations of those involved in the trial are not impaired.

Particular law is to provide appropriate norms with regard to other matters concerning the briefs.

Opportunity for Rebuttal

Canon 1603 — §1. When the defense briefs and observations have been communicated to each party, either party is permitted to present responses within the brief time period established by the judge.

§2. The parties are given this right only once unless the judge decides that it must be granted a second time for a grave cause; then, however, the grant made to one party is considered as given to the other also.

Upon their completion, the pleadings and observations of the parties are made available for review in accord with the tribunal's norms (c. 1602, §3). The parties then have the right to present counterarguments within the time limit established by the judge.

There is a right to only one such rejoinder. For a serious reason, however, the judge may provide the parties the opportunity to present a second (not a third or subsequent) rejoinder. This opportunity cannot be granted to one party alone; if it is extended, all the parties must have the opportunity to present an additional counterargument.

Right of Last Response

§3. The promoter of justice and the defender of the bond have the right to reply a second time to the responses of the parties.

The promoter of justice and defender of the bond, when involved in a trial, have the right to a final response after the rejoinders presented by the parties. An exception to this rule is found in canon 1725; in penal trials the accused (or the advocate or procurator of the accused) has the right to speak last, not the promoter of justice.

[192] The consent of all the parties is required or the action is invalid (c. 127, §2, 1°).

Norms Governing Any Oral Discussion

Canon 1604 — §1. It is absolutely forbidden for information given to the judge by the parties, advocates, or even other persons to remain outside the acts of the case.

§2. If the discussion of the case has been done in writing, the judge can order a moderate oral debate to be held before a session of the tribunal in order to explain certain questions.

To preserve the integrity of the trial and to respect the canonical principle quod non est in actis non est in mundo (what is not in the acts does not exist), under no circumstances may information be given to the judge that is not incorporated into the acts of the case.

When written arguments have been prepared in accord with canon 1602, the judge may but need not call for an oral discussion to clarify various issues.

Record of an Oral Discussion

Canon 1605 — A notary is to be present at the oral debate mentioned in cann. 1602, §1 and 1604, §2 so that, if the judge orders it or a party requests it and the judge consents, the notary can immediately report in writing about what was discussed and concluded.

The presence of a notary at the oral discussions provided by canons 1602 and 1604 enables the judge to assure that significant points which emerge from the debate are incorporated into the acts of the case. Often, the oral discussion will contain nothing new, and the notary will not need to provide any record. On other occasions, however, the discussion may open up a new perspective or shed new light on the facts. When this happens, the judge should order the notary to record the relevant points, or one of the other parties to the discussion may ask the judge to have the notary do so.

The Waiver of a Final Argument

Canon 1606 — If the parties have neglected to prepare a defense brief within the time available to them or have entrusted themselves to the knowledge and conscience of the judge, and if from the acts and proofs the judge considers the matter fully examined, the judge can pronounce the sentence immediately, after having requested the observations of the promoter of justice and the defender of the bond if they are involved in the trial.

The parties may forego their right to present a final argument, either by explicitly renouncing that right and leaving the matter to the conscience of the judge, or by allowing the time limit to present a defense to pass without any action. When this occurs, the judge may proceed immediately to a decision after first requesting the intervention of the defender of the bond and the promoter of justice whenever they are involved in the trial.

TITLE VII
THE PRONOUNCEMENTS OF THE JUDGE[193]
[cc. 1607–1618]

During a trial, judges are empowered to issue three types of decisions corresponding to the nature of the matters to be decided. Two of them, definitive judgments and interlocutory judgments, are defined in canon 1607. A judge may also decide certain matters by means of judicial decrees, which may be either merely procedural or substantive in nature (c. 1617). Decrees are the usual means by which the judge governs the development of a trial.[194]

[193] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 994–997; Ryan, in CLSGBI Com, 904–910; Diego-Lora, in Pamplona ComEng, 994–1001; Acebal, in Salamanca Com, 782–788; Arroba Conde, in Valencia Com, 696–701; C. de Diego-Lora, in Com Ex IV/2, 1521–1612.

Definitive and Interlocutory Sentences

Canon 1607 — When a case has been handled in a judicial manner, if it is the principal case, the judge decides it through the definitive sentence; if an incidental case, through an interlocutory sentence, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1589, §1.

This canon distinguishes the two types of sentences issued by ecclesiastical judges. A definitive sentence resolves the central issue or issues before the court.[195]

Decisions concerning related but incidental matters are rendered in one of three ways.[196] The decision may be issued in a separate interlocutory sentence, it may be incorporated into the definitive sentence, or, if the judge deems a full judicial sentence unnecessary, the question may be decided by means of a decree (c. 1589, §1).

Need for Moral Certitude

Canon 1608 — §1. For the pronouncement of any sentence, the judge must have moral certitude about the matter to be decided by the sentence.

To issue a judgment, the judge must reach moral certainty about the matter to be decided. This, however, is not moral certainty about any and all aspects of a case. Thus, a judge may have the required degree of certainty about the central question at issue while remaining uncertain about one or more related events or their significance.

Moral certitude is distinguished from absolute certitude on the one hand, and probability on the other. Pope Pius XII gave the classic description of moral certitude in an address to the Roman Rota of January 10, 1942.[197] To reach moral certitude, judges must be able to exclude the probability of error but are not held to the impossible and paralyzing standard of excluding all possibility of error.[198]

Reaching Moral Certitude

§2. The judge must derive this certitude from the acts and the proofs.

§3. The judge, however, must appraise the proofs according to the judge's own conscience, without prejudice to the prescripts of law concerning the efficacy of certain proofs.

Moral certitude must be rooted in the evidence contained in the acts of the case.[199] Thus, the judge's merely subjective conviction is not sufficient. The great challenge facing ecclesiastical judges is to sift through that evidence, understand it, and weigh its significance in order to reach certitude about the truth of the matter. Only then will the judgment be just.

The weighing of the evidence is both a science and an art. It is, as well, a great challenge. Judges are charged to assess the evidence and reach a decision according to their own consciences. That judgment of conscience is to be guided by the law and jurisprudence concerning the efficacy of vari-[194] For example, the libellus is accepted or rejected and the parties cited by means of decrees (cc. 1505, §1; 1507); the terms of the controversy are specified by decree (c. 1513). Similarly, decrees are required for citing witnesses (c. 1556), declaring a party absent from trial (c. 1592), etc.

[195] For a discussion of the nature and importance of this judicial act, see Pompedda, "Decision-Sentence," 73–99, esp. 74–77.

[196] See the canons on incidental cases (cc. 1587–1591) for further reflections on interlocutory judgments.

[197] Pius XII, alloc, January 10, 1942, AAS 34 (1942) 338–342; translated in CLD 3, 606–611.

[198] This balanced understanding of moral certitude continues to guide the jurisprudence of ecclesiastical tribunals. See Pompedda, "Decision-Sentence," 85–93. Also see John Paul II, alloc, February 4, 1980, AAS 72 (1980) 172–178. Translated in Woestman, Papal Allocutions, 159–164.

[199] John Paul II, alloc, February 4, 1980, AAS 72 (1980) 175. Translated in Woestman, Papal Allocutions, 161– 162.

ous types of proofs.[200] But the freedom and responsibility of the judges to weigh the evidence in order to discover the truth is crucial. As Pompedda explains, in this process > judicial formalism must not be its first guiding principle. More important is the free weighing of proofs.[201]

Judges are to form their consciences so that their judgments are in accord with the truth. This requires careful study of the evidence assembled and reflection on its significance in light of the Church's teaching and law. As in any process of conscience formation, however, this involves not only study and reflection but also a prayerful commitment to truth and justice.[202]

At times, the evidence can be so persuasive that judges can reach moral certitude without much difficulty. At other times, however, finding the truth is quite challenging and demands intense study and careful assessment. When certainty is elusive, a judge should not give up the search for truth easily; rather, when faced with doubts of law or of fact, those doubts should serve as "a further impetus to find the truth."[203] Pompedda describes vital qualities necessary for judges to fulfill their office faithfully:

> The judge must not only be endowed with a sufficient scientific preparation (canonical), but he must be capable of practical judgment. He must also have some experience of both reality and of human nature. He must have a sagacious intelligence.[204]

Absence of Moral Certitude

§4. A judge who was not able to arrive at this certitude is to pronounce that the right of the petitioner is not established and is to dismiss the respondent as absolved, unless it concerns a case which has the favor of law, in which case the judge must pronounce for that.

When the judges are unable to reach moral certitude that the claim of the petitioner is established, the law requires that they rule in the negative. This rule holds unless the case involves a favor of the law in which case the judges "must pronounce for that" [i.e., for the favored position]. A favor of the law creates an exception to the burden of proof. The person whose position enjoys such a favor is free from the burden of proof (c. 1526, §2, 1°). Several classic favors of the law involve marriage cases. Canon 1060 establishes a presumption in favor of the validity of marriage.[205] Canon 1101, §1 establishes the presumption that the internal consent of the mind is in agreement with the words employed in a marriage ceremony. Another example is canon 1150: "In a doubtful matter the privilege of faith possesses the favor of the law."[206]

When significant doubts of fact remain that seem to preclude moral certitude, before issuing a definitive ruling, judges should take care that "reasonable and prudent efforts have been put [200] Some of those guidelines are codified (e.g., c. 1541 on the weight of public documents, c. 1536 on the judicial confession of a party, c. 1679 on the proof required in marriage nullity cases). Canonical jurisprudence, especially that of the Roman Rota as well as papal allocutions to the Rota, also provide sources of accumulated wisdom to assist judges in assessing the evidence and reaching a decision. For example, these sources are extremely helpful in assessing the reports of experts (see the commentary on c. 1579).

[201] Pompedda, "Decision-Sentence," 85.

[202] Canon 1612, §1 illustrates this need for an attitude of discernment with its requirement that the introduction to the judicial sentence include an invocation of the Divine Name.

[203] Pompedda, "Decision-Sentence," 87.

[204] Ibid., 93.

[205] See the commentary on c. 1060. This presumption does not constitute an exception to the obligation that judges rule against a petition in the absence of moral certitude, but serves to reinforce that requirement.

[206] The proper interpretation and application of this privilege have been disputed. For details, see the commentary on c. 1150. Also see A. Mendonça, "The Correct Interpretation of Canons 1150 and 1608, §4," Stud Can 31 (1997) 475–512.

forth to provide necessary information to resolve those doubts."[207] Accordingly, judges have the duty to supply for the negligence of the parties in order to avoid injustice (c. 1452, §2).[208] If judges still do not have moral certitude, they are bound to rule in the negative.

Collegial Discussion of the Case

Canon 1609 — §1. In a collegiate tribunal the president of the college is to establish the date and time when the judges are to convene for deliberation; unless a special reason suggests otherwise, the meeting is to be held at the tribunal office.

§2. On the date assigned for the meeting, the individual judges are to submit their written conclusions on the merit of the case with the reasons in law and in fact which led them to their conclusions; these conclusions are to be added to the acts of the case and must be kept secret.

§3. After the invocation of the Divine Name, the individual judges are to present their conclusions in order of precedence, always beginning, however, with the ponens or relator of the case. A discussion then follows under the leadership of the tribunal president, especially to determine what must be established in the dispositive part of the sentence.

When the case has been entrusted to a college (panel) of judges,[209] this canon regulates the process by which they jointly discuss and decide the case.[210] The presiding judge is to schedule the day and time for the judges to discuss the case. While the meeting would normally be held at the tribunal office, the presiding judge may designate another place if there is a reason for doing so.

Prior to this meeting, each judge is to study the evidence and prepare his or her preliminary conclusions in writing. The judges must not merely state those conclusions, but include a summary of their reasons in both law and fact. These written opinions (vota) become part of the acts of the case, although normally they are kept secret.

The college of judges meets in a context of prayer, beginning with an invocation of the Divine Name. Next, the judges in order of precedence, beginning with the ponens or relator (c. 1429), make known their conclusions. The presiding judge then leads a discussion, focusing primarily on the dispositive part of the sentence.[211]

Right of Judges to Retract Initial Conclusions

§4. In the discussion each judge is permitted to withdraw from his or her original conclusion. The judge who is unwilling to assent to the decision of the others, however, can demand that his or her conclusions be transmitted to the higher tribunal if an appeal is made.

[207] Pompedda, "Decision-Sentence," 94.

[208] Pompedda's remarks about the responsibility of the judges in this regard merit a fuller quotation: "It is the obligation of the judge to attempt to resolve the dubia which arise in the course of the trial by seeking out that information which could provide answers to the significant issues which remain unresolved in the instruction. It must be remembered that the ecclesiastical judge is the ruler of the cause ('dominus causae'). It would be a negligence of the judge were he not to investigate obvious elements or potential proofs which could afford a basis for moral certitude in the case" ("Decision-Sentence," 94).

[209] The general norms governing collegial acts apply to the acts of a judicial college. See the commentaries on cc. 115, §2; 119, 2°; and 166.

[210] CCEO 1292, §§1–2 differs in some respects. A clause was added to §1 indicating that only the judges of the college may be present for the meeting. Clauses were also added to §2 specifying that (1) the judges are not to indicate their names on their written conclusions and (2) those conclusions are to be authenticated by all the judges; (3) further, a specific reference was made to §4 of the same canon. For additional details, see Abbass, "Contentious Trials," 894–896.

[211] The dispositive part of the sentence is the decision itself, the affirmative or negative response to the doubt (dubium). While the judges will necessarily discuss the reasoning to be articulated in the sentence, the primary purpose of this session of the judges is not to draft the argument but to reach their decision.

In light of the discussion, the judges are free to retract their initial conclusions. While the written vota reflecting their prior conclusions remain a part of the acts of the case, those initial opinions do not bind the judges.

A college often reaches a unanimous verdict. When unanimity is not forthcoming, however, the judges' vote and the court's decision are determined by the majority (see c. 1426, §1). When a split vote occurs, the judge or judges in the minority may demand that their dissenting opinion(s) be transmitted to the higher tribunal "if an appeal is made."[212] The judge or judges in the minority, however, have no right to lodge an appeal. Only the parties (including the defender of the bond and promoter of justice when they are involved) may lodge an appeal.[213]

Deferral of a Decision

§5. If the judges are unwilling or unable to arrive at a sentence during the first discussion, the decision can be deferred to a new meeting, but not for more than a week, unless the instruction of the case must be completed according to the norm of can. 1600.

When, as a result of their discussions, the judges are unable or unwilling to make a final determination, they may defer their decision for a brief period, normally not to exceed a week. This provides time for additional study and reflection. The presiding judge is responsible for scheduling this second and final meeting at which the decision is made. At times, however, the discussion among the judges may lead to the conviction that a just decision is not possible without further instruction of the case. When this occurs, the instruction phase may be reopened (c. 1600) and sufficient time allotted to complete the gathering of additional evidence. Once the new instruction is completed, the new proofs are published, the case is concluded, and the decision-making phase is reinitiated.

The Sentence of a Sole Judge

Canon 1610 — §1. If there is only one judge, he will write the sentence himself.

When the case is entrusted to a sole judge, the provisions of canon 1609 are unnecessary and the judge proceeds to making his decision and drafting the sentence. Prior to finalizing his decision, however, the judge may wish to discuss the evidence with one or more assessors (see cc. 1424 and 1425, §4). Such a discussion brings to the sole judge many of the benefits associated with a college. The assessors may provide alternative points of view and additional insights to help clarify the judge's thinking.

Sentence of a Judicial College

§2. In a collegiate tribunal, it is for the ponens or relator to write the sentence, selecting the reasons from those the individual judges brought forth during the discussion, unless a majority of the judges have already determined the reasons to be presented. The sentence must then be submitted for the approval of the individual judges.

[212] This is a new provision that did not exist in the 1917 code. The Eastern code differs, requiring that the written conclusions of all of the judges, without names indicated, be transmitted to the appellate court (CCEO 1292, §4; note that the CLSA translation does not accurately capture the Latin). See Abbass, "Contentious Trials," 896–897.

[213] In marriage nullity cases, c. 1682, §1 mandates the ex officio transmission of a first affirmative decision for review by the appellate tribunal. Technically, this is not an appeal, although the parties or defender of the bond may lodge appeals which are transmitted along with the case. If no genuine appeal is lodged, do dissenting judges retain the right to demand that their conclusions be transmitted to the higher tribunal as part of the ex officio transmission of the acts? Strictly speaking, c. 1609, §4 indicates that this right exists only "if an appeal is made." In practice, it would be appropriate to forward the dissenting opinion if the judge involved so requests. This would reflect a respect for the judge(s) in the minority, be in keeping with canonical equity, and manifest to the appellate tribunal the care with which the judgment was reached. Morrisey offers a similar opinion in RRAO 1994, 146–147.

In a collegial tribunal, the task of drafting the sentence is entrusted to the ponens or relator (c. 1429). The judges may give explicit instructions to the ponens concerning the line of argumentation to be used. In the absence of such directives, the ponens is to compose the sentence using the reasons which emerged in the judges' discussion. Once drafted, the sentence must be circulated to the individual judges for approval. If one or more of the judges is dissatisfied with the sentence, he or she may request that the ponens redraft the text. At times, the members of the judicial college may choose to meet in order to agree upon the final text.

Time Limits for Issuing Sentences

§3. The sentence must be issued no more than a month from the day on which the case was decided unless in a collegiate tribunal the judges set a longer period for a grave reason.

Whether rendered by a sole judge or a college, the sentence should be drafted and issued within a month of the decision. This norm is intended to prevent any serious delays in the final stage of the instance. When the case was decided by a judicial college, however, for a grave cause the judges may establish a longer period for issuing the sentence. This reflects the understandable reality that the process of having three or five judges come to agreement on a text may occasionally involve delays.

Nature and Essential Elements of a Sentence

Canon 1611 — The sentence must:

1° decide the controversy deliberated before the tribunal with an appropriate response given to the individual doubts;

2° determine what obligations have arisen for the parties from the trial and how they must be fulfilled;

3° set forth the reasons or motives in law and in fact on which the dispositive part of the sentence is based;

4° determine the expenses of the litigation.

This canon defines the nature and essential elements of the judicial sentence. The following canon (1612) deals with the formalities of a sentence.

Most important, the sentence must "decide the controversy." The terms of the controversy were determined at the joinder of issues (c. 1513) or in any subsequent legitimate amendment of the issue (c. 1514). If multiple grounds are at issue, the sentence must respond to each of the questions. Failure to respond to the terms of the controversy may lead to the irremediable nullity of the sentence (c. 1620, 8°). The requirement that the sentence settle the controversy also provides an important principle for the crafting of a judicial sentence. The argument of the sentence must be focused on the specific doubt or doubts (dubium or dubia), and not wander into unnecessary discussions of related but irrelevant information learned during the trial. A sentence will be much more convincing to the extent that its author focuses precisely on a response to the specific controversy.

The sentence must also explicitly specify the obligations of the parties resulting from the sentence. Since the sentence is a juridic act, it must clarify for the parties the consequences of the decision. At times, the law itself requires that a sentence include certain requirements. For example, in marriage nullity cases the sentence must remind the parties of their moral and legal obligations toward children (c. 1689).[214] At other times, the decision itself will impose an obligation which must be clearly communicated to the parties.

Third, the sentence must set forth the reasons motivating the decision both at law and in terms of the facts of each case. In other words, it must contain a reasoned argument in which the evidence adduced in the instruction phase is analyzed in light of the law and jurisprudence to justify the tribunal's decision. It is not enough for the sentence simply to assert a conviction; it must demonstrate the reasoning which led the judges to reach moral certitude. A judicial argument, then, is much more than a summary or recapitulation of the testimony and other evidence. The sentence must establish the canonical bridge linking the specific facts of the case with the relevant law in order to support the decision. A sentence lacking the motives for the decision is remediably null (c. 1622, 2°).

[214] M. S. Foster, "Divorce and Remarriage: What about the Children?" Stud Can 31 (1997) 165–171.

Finally, the sentence is to apportion in a just manner the parties' obligations regarding the expenses of the trial (e.g., costs such as those envisioned in cc. 1571 and 1580). Normally, the particular law or policies of each tribunal would establish a standard schedule of fees and who is responsible for them (c. 1649). This enables the parties to have reasonable expectations regarding costs at the beginning of the trial. Even if a policy is in place, the sentence must apply that policy by specifying costs and addressing questions such as any additional expenses that were incurred. It also must reduce costs or provide gratuitous assistance for those parties unable to pay court costs (c. 1649, §1, 3°).

There is no separate appeal from the determination of expenses and fees, although there is a fifteen day period during which a person may have recourse to the original judge seeking an adjustment of the charges (c. 1649, §2).

Formalities of a Sentence

Canon 1612 — §1. After the invocation of the Divine Name, the sentence must express in order the judge or the tribunal, the petitioner, the respondent, and the procurator, with their names and domiciles correctly designated, and the promoter of justice and defender of the bond if they took part in the trial.

§2. Next, it must briefly relate the facts together with the conclusions of the parties and the formula of the doubts.

§3. The dispositive part of the sentence follows the above, preceded by the reasons on which it is based.

§4. It is to conclude with the indication of the date and the place where it was rendered, with the signature of the judge or, if it is a collegiate tribunal, of all the judges, and the notary.

This canon specifies the external formalities, sometimes termed the solemnities, required in a sentence. The sentence contains the following principal parts: (1) an introduction, (2) a report of certain essential facts, (3) the argument leading to and justifying the decision, and (4) a conclusion.

The Introduction: First, the sentence must contain an invocation of the Divine Name (see the commentary on c. 1608). Then it must include the following data:

1. the name(s) of the judge(s);
2. the names of the petitioner, the respondent, and (if any were appointed) their procurators;
3. the domiciles of the parties in the case (see cc. 102–106);
4. the names of the promoter of justice and the defender of the bond if they took part in the trial.

While not specifically mentioned, the specific title of competence (tribunal jurisdiction) should also be indicated here.

The Facts: Next, the sentence must "briefly relate the facts" along with the conclusions of the parties and the formulation of the doubt (dubium). The description is to be brief and, hence, need not involve a lengthy and detailed narrative. The content of the "Facts Section" will vary depending on the nature of the case at issue. For example, in a marriage nullity case, the relevant facts would include information such as the date and place of the exchange of consent, the length of the common life, whether children were born of the union, and similar information. The report on the facts must also include the specific formulation of the doubt, so as to clarify the exact nature of the issue(s), and the stance of the parties with regard to the issues.[215]

[215] The petitioner, as the initiator of the suit, will normally favor an affirmative response to the doubt. The stance of a

The Argument and Decision: This is the heart of the sentence. It must discuss both the applicable law and relevant facts in light of the specific question(s) at issue (c. 1611, 3°). Thus, the argument normally begins with a discussion in iure, an exposition of the law and jurisprudence applicable to the issues in the case. Next, in light of those issues, the argument must apply the law to the specific facts of the case. This part of the sentence is the most challenging to compose. A judicial sentence must not simply recite the story or sequence of events (e.g., of a marriage), but carefully analyze those events in light of the Church's law and doctrine. This discussion specifies the reasoning which led to the conclusions. That analysis leads to the decision or dispositive section of the sentence. The tribunal's verdict is phrased as a response in the affirmative or in the negative to the doubt(s) (dubium) specified in the joinder of issues (see c. 1611, 1°).

The Conclusion: The sentence concludes by indicating the date and place where it was rendered. It must also include the signature(s) of the judge(s) who issued it (not merely the signature of the presiding judge or that of the ponens) and the signature of the notary. Failure to include these formalities results in the remediable nullity of the sentence (c. 1622, 3° and 4°).

Adaptation of Rules for an Interlocutory Sentence

Canon 1613 — The rules proposed above for a definitive sentence are to be adapted for an interlocutory sentence.

This canon clarifies that the norms concerning definitive sentences (cc. 1608–1612) also apply to interlocutory sentences. Thus, while an interlocutory sentence involves issues of lesser moment, it is a true judicial sentence and must settle the specific controversy, indicate its motives, and follow the basic formalities required for a definitive sentence.[216]

Based on his analysis of the context of this canon, Wrenn concluded that the legislator did not intend that the norms of the following canons (cc. 1614–1616) be applied to interlocutory sentences.[217] Diego-Lora does not explicitly cite Wrenn's conclusion, but likewise argues that canon 1613 refers only to the requirements of canons 1608–1612.[218] Hence, given the context of canon 1613, the specific requirements of canons 1614–1616 concerning the publication of a sentence evidently do not apply to interlocutory sentences. This conclusion is supported by the fact that no appeal is possible against an interlocutory sentence which does not have the force of a definitive judgment (c. 1629, 4°). Thus, the provisions of the interlocutory sentence are published as part of the publication of the definitive sentence, and can be challenged along with the definitive judgment.

Publication of a Sentence

Canon 1614 — The sentence is to be published as soon as possible, with an indication of the means by which it can be challenged. It has no force before publication even if the dispositive part was made known to the parties with the permission of the judge.[219] respondent, however, may vary significantly. The "Facts Section" should briefly indicate how the respondent has reacted to the issue. He or she may be opposed to the petitioner's plea in whole or in part or may agree with it wholly or partially. He or she may fail to respond to the citation and be decreed absent (c. 1592), or his or her whereabouts may be unknown (c. 1409, §2). Finally, anything unusual about the respondent's standing at trial (e.g., he or she was a minor who stood trial through a parent or guardian, cc. 1478–1479) should also be indicated.

[216] One should recall that incidental cases need not be decided in interlocutory sentences, but may be decided within the definitive sentence (c. 1589, §2) or by judicial decrees (cc. 1589, §1 and 1590, §2).

[217] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 996.

[218] Diego-Lora, in Com Ex IV/2, 1580–1582.

[219] CCEO 1297 differs in some respects. For example, to avoid any ambiguity, the term intimetur (communicate) is used rather than the term publicetur here and in CCEO 1298. For comments on the reasons for this and

This very brief canon, along with canon 1615, protects a vital value, namely, that of making the parties fully aware of the decision and its motives. Only in this way will the parties be able either to appropriate the decision and make it their own or lodge a reasoned challenge to the decision. The canon contains three vitally important provisions.

First, the sentence must be published "as soon as possible" (quam primum). While the canon does not further specify the time, justice requires that there be no delays and that the sentence be published immediately upon its completion,[220] or at the least within a day or two. The sentence is to be published even to a party who was decreed absent from the trial (see commentary on cc. 1592–1593).

Second, the parties are also to be informed of the means by which the sentence may be challenged. That information can be included in the text of the definitive sentence itself or in the decree or other document communicated as part of the publication. Such challenges to the sentence include an appeal (cc. 1628–1640) lodged against the substance of the decision and a complaint of nullity against the sentence (cc. 1619–1627) lodged against alleged procedural irregularities or violations of rights.[221] The "indication of the means by which it can be challenged" does not require a complete explanation, but a brief notice of the types of challenges available and direction on how to initiate such challenges.[222]

Finally, the right to challenge a sentence requires that the parties know both the decision and the reasoning justifying it.[223] Therefore, the time period for lodging an appeal does not begin until the sentence is published (see c. 1634, §2). Until it is legitimately published, the sentence has no force, even if the dispositive part (the decision proper) was communicated to the parties. Thus, failure to publish the sentence, while not resulting in the invalidity of the sentence itself, renders it legally ineffective and prevents the trial process from being completed.[224]

Canon 1614 is silent about how to handle the publication of a sentence which contains a discussion of a particular act that was exempted from publication (c. 1598, §1). Wrenn and Ryan both agree that this evidence should still be considered secret at the time of the publication of the sentence and that a portion of the sentence likewise could be restricted from publication.[225] Daneels would also permit this possibility, but only under very exceptional circumstances.[226]

Obviously, it is impossible to publish a sentence to a party who was not able to be located. In these circumstances, provided that all reasonable efforts were made to locate the person, the tribunal can move to the execution of the sentence. This reflects the ancient principle that no one can be held to the impossible.[227] Should the whereabouts of the missing party later come to light, the sentence should be published to that person.[228] other differences, see J. Abbass, "Contentious Trials," 897–899.

[220] Canon 1610, §3 requires that the sentence be drafted and issued within a month of the decision, except when, for grave cause, a college of judges establishes a longer period.

[221] CCEO 1297 does not require that the sentence indicate all of the methods by which it may be challenged, but only the ways in which it may be appealed.

[222] An invitation to contact the judge or an advocate for further information is advisable as part of this indication.

[223] John Paul II, alloc, January 26, 1989, AAS 81 (1989) 924–925. Translated in Woestman, Papal Allocutions, 206–207.

[224] Johnson, "Publish and Be Damned," 223.

[225] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 997; idem, Procedures, 69; Ryan, in CLSGBI Com, 910.

[226] Daneels, "The Right of Defence," 90. He states: "Perhaps, though, a certain analogy can be accepted with c. 1598, §1, with a caution that the exception not become the rule and that the right of defence always remains intact."

[227] RI, n. 6, CorpusIC II, 1122.

[228] Depending on the type of case, the nature of the subject matter, and the reasons why the respondent was not located, the decision may or may not be subject to challenge. See the commentary on challenges against the sentence (title VIII, cc. 1619–1640) and on res iudicata and restitutio in integrum (title IX, cc. 1641–1648).

Methods of Publication

Canon 1615 — Publication or communication of the sentence can be done either by giving a copy of the sentence to the parties or their procurators or by sending them a copy according to the norm of can. 1509.[229]

A sentence may be published in one of two ways. The first method is to hand a copy to the parties or their procurators. Note that this provision is not fulfilled by giving a copy of the sentence to an advocate of the parties, unless that advocate was also appointed a procurator.[230] No special mandate is required for a procurator to accept the sentence (see cc. 1484–1485).

The second method is to send a copy of the sentence to the parties in the same way that citations are communicated (see the commentary on canon 1509).

The 1917 code provided three methods of publishing the sentence. The first was to cite the parties to appear at the tribunal for a solemn reading of the sentence. The second was to inform the parties that the sentence was available for their inspection at the tribunal. Neither of these methods was adopted for the current code.[231] The third was to mail a copy of the sentence to the parties, which corresponds to the second method of the current legislation.

Although it received less attention during the revision process, many of the concerns associated with the publication of the acts have also been raised concerning the publication of the sentence.[232] While this is not necessarily a problem in other contentious trials, in marriage nullity cases the publication is particularly sensitive because of the nature of the sentence. There are two audiences to which a sentence of marriage nullity is directed. First and foremost, the sentence is a legal argument crafted for the court of appeal. In order to address the appellate judges effectively, the sentence necessarily must narrow its focus tightly, discuss jurisprudential issues, strongly assert its conclusions, and perhaps even more strongly respond to counterarguments raised by the defender of the bond or one of the parties. The second audience of the sentence, however, are the two persons whose broken union was the focus of the tribunal's investigation. While the parties need to understand the tribunal's reasoning, the blunt legal manner in which a judicial sentence is crafted is not necessarily the most effective, sensitive, or helpful means to communicate that reasoning to them. A legally well-argued sentence does not communicate the whole picture of the broken relationship. It uses language that may be hard for the parties to understand. Its narrowly focused analysis of the broken relationship from the point of view of the Church's law and jurisprudence may be experienced as cold, harsh, foreign, or insensitive by the parties who lived through those tragic circumstances and whose emotions may still be rubbed raw. Thus, in marriage nullity cases, merely impersonally mailing [229] CCEO 1298, consistent with CCEO 1297, uses only the term intimatio sententiae rather than the term publicatio seu intimatio of the Latin code. This amendment reflected a decision consistently to use one term and avoid the potential ambiguities connected with the Latin code's use of differing terms in cc. 1614, 1615, 1621, 1623, 1630, and 1646, §2. For a fuller treatment of the intent of the drafters of the Eastern code, see Abbass, "Contentious Trials," 899–901.

[230] The possibility of publishing the sentence to an advocate was rejected during the code revision process. See Comm 16 (1984) 68–69.

[231] These options were suppressed in the first schema of the revision process, Comm 8 (1976) 190. On December 13, 1978, the coetus on procedural law considered reinstating the option of a solemn reading, but decided against it (Comm 11 [1979] 142–143).

[232] See the commentary on c. 1598, §1 for further discussion. In addition to the sources cited there, see also J. Bernhard, "A propos de la publication de la sentence dans les procédures en déclaration de nullité de mariage," in Iustus Iudex: Festgabe für Paul Wesemann zum 75. Geburtstag von seinen Freunden und Schülern, ed. K. Lüdicke, H. Mussinghoff, and H. Schwendenwein, (Essen: Ludgerus-Verlag, 1990) 387–399.

the sentence to the parties often is counterproductive and even hurtful. Certainly, in marriage nullity cases judges face a tremendous challenge in composing sentences that are both legally correct and persuasive and pastorally sensitive and constructive. For these reasons, despite the added time required, many judges prefer to invite the parties to come to the tribunal where the sentence can be communicated personally and discussed in a manner that helps the parties to understand the court's findings.

Correction of a Sentence

Canon 1616 — §1. If in the text of the sentence an error in calculations turns up, a material error occurs in transcribing the dispositive section or in relating the facts or the petitions of the parties, or the requirements of can. 1612, §4 are omitted, the tribunal which rendered the sentence must correct or complete it either at the request of a party or ex officio, but always after the parties have been heard and a decree appended to the bottom of the sentence.

§2. If any party objects, the incidental question is to be decided by a decree.

If any of the errors or inaccuracies described in the first paragraph of this canon are discovered in the published sentence, those must be corrected. This, however, may be accomplished without a full challenge against the sentence. The tribunal may make such corrections ex officio or in response to the request of one of the parties.

If a correction needs to be made, the parties must first be notified and given the opportunity to comment. The amendment is then made by appending a decree at the end of the sentence.

If a party objects to the proposed amendment, that objection is dealt with as an incidental question and decided by a decree (not an interlocutory sentence). The presiding judge alone (rather than the full turnus) or an auditor is able to deal with this incidental case (c. 1590, §2). There is no appeal of the decision in this sort of incidental matter unless that appeal is made as part of a wider challenge of the sentence (c. 1629, 4°).

Requirements for Judicial Decrees

Canon 1617 — Other pronouncements of the judge besides the sentence are decrees, which have no force if they are not merely procedural unless they express the reasons at least in a summary fashion or refer to reasons expressed in another act.

In discharging their responsibility to conduct the trial, judges make numerous pronouncements and decisions. The most important of these are sentences, either definitive or interlocutory; other decisions are issued in the form of decrees. This canon reflects the general norm that decrees contain at least a summary of the motivating reasons (c. 51). But canon 1617 goes further, specifying that a judicial decree has no force unless the reasons are included in the decree itself or in some other procedural act to which the decree refers.[233]

Canon 1617 also contains an important exception. When the decree of a judge is merely procedural (e.g., that the parties be cited, that the acts be published), then it need not incorporate the reasons. This is because the reasons for procedural decrees are enshrined in the law and the process itself and require no further explanation.

Decrees and Interlocutory Sentences with Definitive Force

Canon 1618 — An interlocutory sentence or a decree has the force of a definitive sentence if it prevents a trial or puts an end to a trial or some grade of a trial with respect to at least some party in the case.

[233] A new periodical of the Roman Rota, Decreta, now publishes selected decrees which can serve as models for judges in crafting their own decrees. Volume 1 of Decreta, for instance, contains decrees confirming affirmative sentences in marriage cases (c. 1682, §2), admitting or rejecting a libellus (c. 1505), adding a new ground in marriage nullity cases (c. 1683), and dealing with complaints of nullity of sentences (cc. 1620 and 1622).

This canon[234] generically defines the circumstances in which an interlocutory sentence or a decree has the force of a definitive sentence. These include, for example, a decree deciding a peremptory exception (c. 1462), a decree rejecting a libellus (c. 1505), a decree declaring a petitioner absent from the trial (c. 1594), and an appellate court's decree of confirmation of an affirmative marriage nullity decision (c. 1682, §2). Clarifying these circumstances is important because, in a case in which a decree or interlocutory sentence has such a definitive effect, it is treated differently when it comes to the question of an appeal. Decrees or interlocutory sentences that do not have the force of a definitive sentence are not subject to a direct appeal; however, those with the force of a definitive sentence are subject to an appeal (c. 1629, 4°).[235]

TITLE VIII CHALLENGE OF THE SENTENCE[236]
[cc. 1619–1640]

One or more of the parties to a trial may be aggrieved by the decision of the tribunal. In these circumstances, the law provides avenues to challenge the sentence. Ordinarily, two avenues are available. The first, a complaint of nullity against the sentence, allows a party to challenge the decision on the basis of a denial of rights or any significant procedural irregularity. The second, the appeal, allows a party to challenge the decision on the basis of its substance in law or in fact.

The right to challenge a sentence, however, is not unlimited. To prevent dilatory tactics and harassment through unending litigation, canon law provides a measure of juridic stability for the decisions of ecclesiastical tribunals. Thus, to understand fully both the possibilities and limits connected with challenges against a sentence, title VIII needs to be situated within the context of title IX, on the res iudicata (the adjudged matter) which gives certain decisions a stability that is not subject to most challenges. There are also the extraordinary challenges of a sentence known as: (1) a new presentation of a case, which is available for cases involving the status of persons only (c. 1644), and (2) the restitutio in integrum (cc. 1645–1648).

CHAPTER I
COMPLAINT OF NULLITY AGAINST THE SENTENCE
[cc. 1619–1627]

Sanation of Some Null Acts

Canon 1619 — Without prejudice to cann. 1622 and 1623, whenever a case involves the good of private persons, the sentence itself sanates the nullities of acts established by positive law which were not declared to the judge before the sentence even though they were known to the party proposing the complaint.

The important values of assuring that justice is not thwarted by insignificant errors or dilatory tactics and of preserving the security of judicial decisions motivate the provision for the sanation (healing) of some procedural irregularities by the sentence itself. This occurs when the following conditions are verified:

[234] It might have been more logically placed near the beginning of this title, after c. 1607.

[235] Canon 1505, §4 specifies the manner in which recourse can be made against the rejection of a libellus.

[236] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 997–1002; Ryan, in CLSGBI Com, 911–919; Diego-Lora, in Pamplona ComEng, 1001–1013; Acebal, in Salamanca Com, 788–796; Arroba Conde, in Valencia Com, 701–708; Stankiewicz, in Com Ex IV/2, 1613–1642; P. Moneta, in Com Ex IV/2, 1643–1672.

1. the nullity results merely from positive ecclesiastical law and not from the natural law;[237]
2. the party making the complaint knew of the cause of the nullity during the trial but did not raise the question earlier;[238]
3. the matter involves the private rather than the public good;[239]
4. the complaint does not involve one of the causes of remediable nullity (c. 1622), which a party may challenge for three months after the notification of the publication of the sentence (c. 1623).

Causes of Irremediable Nullity

Canon 1620 — A sentence suffers from the defect of irremediable nullity if:

1° it was rendered by an absolutely incompetent judge;
2° it was rendered by a person who lacks the power of judging in the tribunal in which the case was decided;
3° a judge rendered a sentence coerced by force or grave fear;
4° the trial took place without the judicial petition mentioned in can. 1501 or was not instituted against some respondent;
5° it was rendered between parties, at least one of whom did not have standing in the trial;
6° someone acted in the name of another without a legitimate mandate; 7° the right of defense was denied to one or the other party;
8° it did not decide the controversy even partially.

There are eight headings of irremediable or incurable nullity listed here.[240] Each touches on important values that the trial process must preserve. Thus, a failure to foster and protect those values robs the sentence of any force and leaves it vulnerable to challenge. Irremediable nullity results from the following causes:

1. The sentence was rendered by a judge who was absolutely incompetent. Absolute incompetence results from the nature of the issue (e.g., questions reserved to the Rota), the standing of the person (e.g., cases involving heads of state), or the grade of the trial (e.g., a [237] For example, in its essence the right of defense is rooted in the natural law; hence a direct violation of that right is not sanated (see the commentary on c. 1620, 7°). The relative incompetence of a judge or the omission of a required signature are matters of positive law and hence may be sanated if the other conditions are verified.

[238] Wrenn in CLSA Com, 998, explains that the purpose here is to "dissuade parties from delaying to denounce invalid acts until after the sentence, with a view to undermining the entire proceedings."

[239] See the commentary on cc. 223 and 1431 for a discussion of the public good. By definition, cases involving marriage nullity, the separation of spouses, and penalties always concern the public good (cc. 1691, 1696, 1728, §1). When cases involve the private good, the judge proceeds only at the request of the parties. However, when the public good is at issue (i.e., when concerns of significance to the wider community are at stake), once the trial has been initiated, the judge has the duty to seek the truth and do justice (c. 1452).

[240] Canon 1669, however, explicitly establishes the nullity of a sentence reached by the oral contentious process when that process is excluded by law. Is this a ninth example of irremediable nullity? L. Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 1007, concludes the nullity is remediable. M. Ryan and D. Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 912 and 931, L. Madero, in Pamplona ComEng, 1029, and A. Stankiewicz and L. Madero in Com Ex IV/2, 1622 and 1791, however, all hold it is irremediable. This author agrees that the use of the oral contentious process in a case where it is prohibited by law is a ninth example of irremediable nullity. This conclusion is based on the fact that c. 1669 treats this as a very serious form of nullity, making no exception for the appellate court to accept the sentence as sanated due to the passage of time. Unlike the other bases of irremediable nullity, however, the court itself is charged to act ex officio in voiding the sentence and not to wait for one of the parties to lodge a complaint of nullity.

first instance tribunal rendering judgment in second or higher instances), and is defined in canons 1406, §2 and 1440. All other incompetence is relative in nature (c. 1407, §2) and does not result in irremediable nullity.

2. The sentence was rendered by a person who "lacks the power of judging in the tribunal in which the case was decided." In other words, the person must be duly appointed as a judge for that specific tribunal by the ecclesiastical authority responsible for the provision of that office (see cc. 1419–1421).[241]

3. The judge issued the sentence coerced by force or grave fear. This canon applies the general norm concerning force (c. 125, §1) to ecclesiastical trials. In the case of grave fear, however, there is a modification. Generally, acts placed out of grave fear are valid "unless the law provides otherwise" (c. 125, §2). For ecclesiastical trials, canon 1620, 3° provides otherwise, and a sentence coerced by grave fear is irremediably null.

4. An ecclesiastical trial must be initiated through a judicial petition or libellus (cc. 1501–1504) lodged by someone with a right to do so (e.g., cc. 1674, 1708, 1721). In the absence of any such petition, signed by the petitioner or his or her procurator (c. 1504, 3°), the process is not a genuine trial and has no force. Similarly, the petition must be lodged against some respondent. If there is no respondent, there is no trial.[242] One should note that this cause of irremediable nullity does not apply to cases in which a respondent cannot be located or is decreed absent from trial. In these situations, there is a respondent, even if that person is not involved in the trial.

5. Canons 1478, 1480, and 1674 (for marriage cases) clarify who has standing in court. A minor (see c. 97, §1) normally stands trial through a parent or guardian, although in some circumstances he or she may stand trial personally (c. 1478, §3). The question of a petitioner's right to stand in court should be resolved at the time of the presentation of the libellus, and the petition rejected when the petitioner lacks standing (c. 1505, §2, 2°). If, nonetheless, a sentence is issued in a case where any of the parties did not have standing in court, that sentence is irremediably null.

6. A mandate is a legally binding authorization to act in the name of another party. A procurator must present a mandate before representing a party in court (c. 1484, §1).[243] The mandate may be provided by the party directly or, in certain circumstances, may be granted by the judge.[244] An ordinary mandate provides a limited authorization for the procurator to act in the name of a party; without a special mandate, however, certain actions cannot be undertaken (see c. 1485). If one person acts in the name of another without a legitimate mandate or acts beyond the scope of a mandate, the right of de-

[241] This is rooted in the ancient rule of law that what judges do outside the scope of their office has no legal force. RI, n. 26, CorpusIC II, 1122.

[242] A person may request an ecclesiastical authority to clarify some matter that does not involve a respondent (e.g., baptismal status, qualification for an ecclesiastical office). In these cases, the responses of the ecclesiastical authority may be juridic acts with canonical consequences, but they are administrative in nature and do not involve a trial.

[243] See the commentary on c. 1484, §2 for the narrowly defined circumstances when a procurator may act without a mandate.

[244] Canon 1481, §3 allows the judge ex officio to appoint a "defender" (defensor) in contentious trials involving minors or the public good, except for marriage cases. Similarly, the judge may appoint or admit a guardian or curator for minors or those with diminished mental capacity or deprived of the administration of goods (c. 1478). F. Morrisey discusses the possibility of a judge appointing a procurator in marriage nullity cases in RRAO 1995, 105–106.

fense of the party is impaired, and the judicial actions of the procurator are invalid. If not corrected during the course of the trial (e.g., by the party personally placing the act or extending the mandate of the procurator who then places the act), the sentence is irremediably null.[245]

7. The right of defense is a natural human right as well as an ecclesiastical right enjoyed by the Christian faithful (see c. 221, §1).[246] Its denial offends against human dignity, and results in the irremediable nullity of the sentence. The canon speaks of a denial of the right of defense. Thus, it is important to distinguish the following:

a) The failure of a party to exercise the right of defense is not in any way a denial of that right.[247] Thus, if a party communicates a waiver of his or her rights, or if the tribunal legitimately decrees a party absent from the trial (c. 1592), no complaint of nullity can later be upheld on the basis of canon 1620, 7°.

b) Actions which might in some way limit a person's right of defense without denying it do not lead to the nullity of the sentence. Thus, a judge has the right to curb an excessive number of witnesses (c. 1553) or exclude a specific witness for a just cause (c. 1555). Similarly, a judge may decide to exclude an expert (c. 1576) or not admit an expert designated by a party (c. 1581). Even actions that may impair the right of defense to some degree do not necessarily amount to a denial of the right of defense.[248]

The jurisprudence of the Roman Rota and the Apostolic Signatura helps to clarify the content of the right of defense.[249] In brief, the right of defense can be said to include the rights (a) to be notified of the trial, (b) to know the issue, (c) to present proofs, (d) to know the proofs relevant to deciding the issue, (e) to present arguments, and (f) to respond in defense of one's position.[250]

8. The object of the trial is formulated at the joinder of the issues, phrased in the form of one or more questions or doubts (the dubium or dubia, c. 1513). That formulation of the issue

[245] It should be noted that null judicial acts normally lead only to remediable nullity (see c. 1622, 5°). Because the right of defense is intimately involved in the null acts of a person acting without a mandate, however, the more severe remedy of irremediable nullity applies.

[246] John Paul II, alloc, January 26, 1989, AAS 81 (1989) 922–927. Translated in Woestman, Papal Allocutions, 204–208.

[247] If, however, a person fails to exercise his or her rights due to the manifest negligence of the tribunal to provide reasonable information concerning those rights, then the failure might amount to a denial. The manifest negligence of a person's advocate could also contribute to a denial of the right of defense.

[248] G. Erlebach, "Le fattispecie di negazione del diritto di difesa causanti la nullità della sentenza secondo la giurisprudenza Rotale: criteri generali e parte statica," ME 114 (1989) 508–513.

[249] Two recent Rotal decisions available in English are coram Burke, November 15, 1990, ME 119 (1991) 406–409, translated in Stud Can 25 (1991) 510–512; coram Burke, May 22, 1997, Stud Can 32 (1998) 517–520. Also see coram Parisella, July 3, 1980, SRRDec 72 (1980) 462–464; coram Pompedda, July 23, 1986, SRRDec 78 (1986) 480–482; coram Pinto, decr nullitatis sententiae, May 24, 1985, Decreta 3 (1985) 140–144; ApSig, coram Sabattani, January 17, 1987, ME 113 (1988) 272–275. For a discussion of the jurisprudence and further reflections, see Daneels, "The Right of Defence," 77–95; G. Erlebach, La nullità della sentenza giudiziale "ob ius defensionis denegatum" nella giurisprudenza rotale, Studi Giuridici XXV (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1991); Moodie, "Fundamental Rights and Access to the Acts of a Case," 123–154; F. Morlot, "Le droit de défense, en particulier dans la publication des actes," Stud Can 30 (1996) 133–162.

[250] The right of defense also includes the rights to have access to the published sentence and to challenge that sentence. These rights, however, come into play only after a sentence is issued. They could give rise to a challenge on the basis of c. 1620, 7° only to a subsequent sentence or decree of confirmation, not to the original sentence itself.

may be changed, but only as provided by canon 1514. If the sentence does not settle the controversy as formulated in the dubia, at least in part, then the sentence is irremediably null. Clearly, if the sentence does not give an affirmative or negative response to the dubium, the sentence is null. This type of nullity would also seem to apply when a sentence is manifestly incoherent in its application of the law to the facts. A sentence may "resolve" the dubium only in the purely formal sense of issuing a conclusion. But when that conclusion bears little or no reasonable relationship to the proofs adduced or the arguments made, then just as surely it fails to settle the controversy even partially.

Proposing a Complaint of Irremediable Nullity

Canon 1621 — The complaint of nullity mentioned in can. 1620 can be proposed by way of exception in perpetuity and also by way of action before the judge who rendered the sentence within ten years from the date of the publication of the sentence.

A complaint of nullity on the basis of one or more of the causes of nullity indicated in canon 1620 must be initiated by someone with the right to propose such an action or exception[251] as identified by canon 1626, §1. No one else has the standing in court to challenge the sentence.

The right to lodge most actions is extinguished by the period of prescription provided by law (c. 1492, §1). Canon 1621 establishes a period of ten years from the date of publication of the sentence[252] to lodge the action of a complaint of irremediable nullity. The action is to be lodged before the tribunal that issued the original judgment. An action bearing on the status of persons, however, is not extinguished (c. 1492, §1), an application of the underlying principle that cases involving the status of persons never become res iudicata (c. 1643). In a marriage case, therefore, the radical right to propose an action remains available. To prevent the frivolous or vindictive use of the Church's tribunals, however, the right to lodge an action is circumscribed after two concordant decisions in favor of nullity by the requirement that the interested party meet the burden of making a new presentation of the case.[253]

The right to lodge most exceptions, however, is perpetual in nature (c. 1492, §2). Thus, canon 1621 specifies that a complaint of irremediable nullity can be made in perpetuity by means of an exception. The exception is also to be lodged before the tribunal that issued the original judgment.

Causes of Remediable Nullity

Canon 1622 — A sentence suffers from the defect of remediable nullity only if:

1° it was rendered by an illegitimate number of judges contrary to the prescript of can. 1425, §1;

2° it does not contain the motives or reasons for the decision;

3° it lacks the signatures prescribed by law;

4° it does not indicate the year, month, day, and place in which it was rendered;

5° it is based on a null judicial act whose nullity was not sanated according to the norm of can. 1619;

6° it was rendered against a party legitimately absent according to can. 1593, §2.

[251] See the commentary on cc. 1491–1500 on the nature and norms for actions and exceptions.

[252] There is a difference in the wording of cc. 1621 and 1623 regarding the point at which the time limit begins. Canon 1621 indicates that the time begins "from the date of the publication of the sentence" while c. 1623 indicates that it begins "from the notice of the publication of the sentence." CCEO 1303, §2 and 1304, §2 eliminate this discrepancy, indicating that the time limit runs from the communication (ab intimatione) of the sentence. The CLSA translation, however, is inaccurate in not reflecting this clarification. See Abbass, "Contentious Trials," 900–901.

[253] See the commentary on c. 1684.

In contrast to the causes of irremediable nullity listed in canon 1620, there are other less serious procedural irregularities known as remediable nullities, since they may be sanated by the action of the law itself.

1. Certain cases are to be entrusted to a college of judges rather than to a sole judge (c. 1425, §1). If a sentence was not issued by the legitimate number of judges, it is remediably null.

2. If, contrary to the requirements of canons 1611, 3° and 1612, §3, the sentence does not contain the reasons for the decision, it labors under remediable nullity.

3. The sentence is remediably null if, contrary to canon 1612, §4, it does not contain the signatures required by law.

4. Similarly, if it does not indicate the date and place where it was issued (contrary to c. 1612, §4), the sentence is remediably null.

5. If the sentence is founded on a judicial act that is null and void, and if the nullity of that act was not sanated (c. 1619), then the sentence may be challenged as remediably null. Examples of such acts would be the relative incompetence of a judge to try the matter (c. 1407, §2) or the mistaken admission of a document into the acts prior to the joinder of issues (c. 1529).

6. If the sentence was rendered against a party who was decreed absent from the trial but had a just reason that impeded compliance with the tribunal's citation (c. 1593, §2), that party may lodge a complaint of remediable nullity. It should be noted that this possibility is not available to the party who was not truly impeded but simply chose not to take part in the trial.

Time for Proposing a Complaint of Remediable Nullity

Canon 1623 — A complaint of nullity in the cases mentioned in can. 1622 can be proposed within three months from the notice of the publication of the sentence.

Complaints of remediable nullity can be lodged only within a period of three months after the publication of the sentence.[254] This is a peremptory time limit which cannot be extended and after which the right to propose a challenge ceases (see c. 1465, §1). Thus, the law itself sanates the causes of remediable nullity once the time limit has passed.

Competent Judge to Hear a Complaint of Nullity

Canon 1624 — The judge who rendered the sentence deals with the complaint of nullity. If the party fears that the judge who rendered the sentence challenged by the complaint of nullity is prejudiced and therefore considers the judge suspect, the party can demand that another judge be substituted according to the norm of can. 1450.

Unless it involves a sentence issued by the Roman Rota (c. 1445, §1, 1°), or unless it is lodged together with an appeal (c. 1625), the complaint of nullity is to be lodged before the judge who issued the sentence. If the party making the complaint fears that the judge will not address the complaint in an unbiased manner, he or she may demand that another judge hear the complaint. While canon 1624 refers only to canon 1450, it necessarily incorporates the norms of canons 1449 and 1451 that stipulate how to handle the incidental question of an objection against a judge. If the objection to the judge is upheld, a [254] There are differences in the wording of cc. 1621 and 1623 and their counterparts in the Eastern code concerning the point at which time limits begin to run. See the commentary on c. 1621 for a brief discussion.

new judge is substituted to decide the complaint of nullity.

Linking a Complaint of Nullity with an Appeal

Canon 1625 — A complaint of nullity can be proposed together with an appeal within the time established for an appeal.

A complaint of nullity may be filed in its own right, in which case it follows the norms of canon 1624. It may also be lodged jointly with an appeal, in which case it will be handled by the appellate tribunal (see cc. 1438, 1439, 1444, and 1632). The time limit of fifteen canonical days provided to lodge an appeal (c. 1630, §1) is much shorter than the period of three months within which a complaint of remediable nullity may be lodged. If an appeal is initiated within the allotted time, nothing prevents the person appealing from adding a complaint of irremediable nullity at any point during the appeal, or of remediable nullity within the three-month time limit.[255] If the appellate court upholds the complaint of nullity, it does not rule on the substantive issues but remands the case to the previous instance.[256]

Who May Lodge a Complaint of Nullity?

Canon 1626 — §1. Not only the parties who consider themselves aggrieved can introduce a complaint of nullity but also the promoter of justice and the defender of the bond whenever they have the right to intervene.

This canon identifies those who have standing to lodge a complaint of nullity. The parties to the case, if they consider themselves aggrieved, may do so. Likewise, if they have been involved in the case, the promoter of justice and defender of the bond have the right to lodge a complaint of nullity. This right to lodge a complaint of nullity also belongs to the promoter or defender of the bond of a tribunal of higher grade.[257]

Retraction/Amendment of Sentence by Judges

§2. The judge can retract or emend ex officio a null sentence, which that judge has rendered, within the time limit for acting established by can. 1623 unless an appeal together with a complaint of nullity has been introduced in the meantime or the nullity has been sanated through the expiration of the time limit mentioned in can. 1623.

Even if a complaint of nullity has not been proposed, when judges recognize a cause of nullity in their sentences, they may on their own authority retract or correct the invalid judgments. Technically, the judges here do not propose complaints but simply remedy the errors. The judges must do this, however, within the three-month time period provided in canon 1623. Judges are not free to act in this fashion if an appeal joined to a complaint of nullity has already been lodged (c. 1625). This reflects the canonical principle that a judge is absolutely incompetent to deal with a matter pending before a superior tribunal (c. 1440).

When remediable nullity is involved, the judges may be able to correct the flaw. For example, the signatures or data missing in accord with canon 1622, 3° or 4° may be completed. When the cause of nullity cannot be remedied so easily, judges may retract their sentences and take the steps necessary to resolve the problems. For example, a sentence may be redrafted to include the missing reasoning (c. 1622, 2°). If a party was legitimately absent (c. 1622, 6°), the judges may retract a sentence, reopen the instruction in accord with canon 1600, and then follow the normal procedure of publication, conclusion, argument, and decision.

[255] Also see the commentary on c. 1629, 2°.

[256] See ApSig, private reply, April 17, 1989, in RRAO 1990, 46, which stated: "A court of appeal cannot simultaneously declare the sentence of a lower tribunal null and also look into the merits of the case; the nullity of a sentence of the first grade having been declared, the case is to be remanded to the tribunal of first instance that it may again take up the merits of the case."

[257] A. Mendonça, "The Structural and Functional Aspects of an Appeal Tribunal in Marriage Nullity Cases," Stud Can 32 (1998) 479.

Does this ability to correct or amend a sentence apply to cases of irremediable nullity? At first glance, canon 1626, §2 would seem to permit this, since it refers to any invalid judgment. Diego-Lora, however, contends that this provision "can only be justified in cases of remediable nullity" which, he argues, explains the application of the three-month time limit of canon 1623.[258] Stankiewicz, on the other hand, argues that the power is not limited only to cases of remediable nullity.[259] This author agrees with Stankiewicz. As ministers of justice, judges would be negligent if they became aware of and then simply ignored a cause of irremediable nullity in one of their sentences. Thus, within the three-month period, judges may retract a sentence vitiated by irremediable nullity. Because irremediable nullity is more serious, the judges will not be able simply to correct the sentence. Rather, some or all parts of the process would need to be repeated in a way that resolves the underlying cause of nullity.

Process to Address Complaints of Nullity

Canon 1627 — Cases concerning a complaint of nullity can be treated according to the norms for the oral contentious process.

When a complaint of nullity, remediable or irremediable, is lodged, the judge may employ the oral contentious process (cc. 1656–1670) to resolve the issue expeditiously. The ordinary contentious process, however, must be employed if one of the parties requests it (c. 1656, §1)

[258] Diego-Lora, in Pamplona ComEng, 1005–1006. Ryan, in CLSGBI Com, 914, and Arroba Conde, in Valencia Com, 704, while not specifically raising the question, assume that the provision applies only to causes of remediable nullity.

[259] Stankiewicz, in Com Ex IV/2, 1640.

CHAPTER II
APPEAL[260]
[cc. 1628–1640]

An appeal is a challenge to the substance of a decision rather than to any procedural irregularity or violation of rights. All that is needed is for one with the right to appeal to provide notice of the appeal. Thus, no specific line of argumentation is required of the appellant, although failure to bring forth persuasive arguments would certainly impede the possibility of a successful appeal.

Right of Appeal

Canon 1628 — A party who considers himself or herself aggrieved by any sentence as well as the promoter of justice and the defender of the bond in cases which require their presence have the right to appeal the sentence to a higher judge, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1629.

The canon specifies who has the right to lodge an appeal, with due regard for certain sentences not admitting any appeal (c. 1629). The right belongs to a party to the case at issue who feels aggrieved by the decision, as well as to the promoter of justice and defender of the bond if they were involved in the case. No one else has the standing to initiate an appeal.

The appeal is made to the appropriate hierarchically superior tribunal as defined in law (see c. 1632).

Decisions Not Subject to Appeal

Canon 1629 — There is no appeal:

1° from a sentence of the Supreme Pontiff himself or the Apostolic Signatura;

2° from a sentence tainted by a defect of nullity, unless the appeal is joined with a complaint of nullity according to the norm of can. 1625;

[260] For an excellent review of the appellate tribunal and appeal process, see Mendonça, "The Structural and Functional Aspects," 441–500.

3° from a sentence which has become a res iudicata;

4° from a decree of a judge or from an interlocutory sentence which does not have the force of a definitive sentence, unless it is joined with an appeal from a definitive sentence;

5° from a sentence or a decree in a case where the law requires the matter to be decided as promptly as possible (expeditissime).

Certain decisions are not subject to any appeal. As limitations of rights, these exemptions from appeal must be understood narrowly (see c. 18). The underlying reasons justifying exemption from appeal vary, and may be rooted in the nature of the authority who issued the ruling or based on the nature of the matter decided. At times, the prohibition is absolute, admitting no exceptions; in other circumstances a direct appeal is prohibited, but an appeal may be made in conjunction with some other challenge to the sentence.

Specifically, because of the supreme authority of the pope (c. 333, §1), rulings of the Supreme Pontiff or the Apostolic Signatura may not be appealed (1°). Due to its nature, a judgment that is an adjudged matter (res iudicata, cc. 1641–1644) may not be appealed (3°), nor may any judgment concerning an issue which the law requires to be decided expeditissime or "as promptly as possible" (5°). An interlocutory sentence that does not have the force of a definitive sentence may not be appealed except when the appeal is lodged jointly with an appeal of the definitive sentence (4°). Finally, an appeal cannot be lodged against a judgment which is null (2°). Since a null judgment is legally non-existent, it logically cannot be appealed, since there is "no-thing" against which to appeal. The nullity of such a judgment, however, may not necessarily be obvious or may not have yet been recognized at law. Thus, an appeal is permitted when joined with a complaint of nullity (c. 1625). If the complaint of nullity is upheld, the sentence is decreed null and the appellate court does not address the substantive issues connected with the appeal.[261] If the complaint of nullity is rejected, the sentence has legal standing and the appeal is handled on its merits.

Introduction of an Appeal

Canon 1630 — §1. An appeal must be introduced before the judge who rendered the sentence within the peremptory period of fifteen useful days from the notice of the publication of the sentence.

§2. If an appeal is made orally, the notary is to put it in writing in the presence of the appellant.[262]

Although the appeal is directed toward the appropriate hierarchically superior court, it is to be lodged with the judge who issued the judgment. This serves the practical value of enabling that judge to transmit the entire acts of the case along with the appeal to the designated appellate tribunal.

The appeal is to be lodged within fifteen useful days (tempus utile; see cc. 201, §2 and 203) after the notification of the publication of the sentence. This is a peremptory time limit, which means that the right to appeal is lost if it is not lodged within that time frame (cc. 1465, §1 and 1467). In cases which involve the status of persons and hence are never res iudicata (c. 1643), the peremptory nature of the time limit is somewhat mitigated in that a new challenge to the status quo remains [261] ApSig, private reply, April 17, 1989, RRAO 1990, 46–47.

[262] CCEO 1311 is similar although, reflecting a decision to employ consistent terminology, it refers to the communication of the sentence (intimatione) rather than to the notification of publication. See the commentary on cc. 1615 and 1621. CCEO 1312, concerning an appeal against a decision of a delegated judge, has no counterpart in the Latin code. The CLSA translation of CCEO 1312 is inaccurate; for a better translation and brief commentary, see Abbass, "Contentious Trials," 888–889.

theoretically possible through a new presentation of the case (c. 1644, §1). Some commentators, therefore, conclude that in cases involving the status of persons, the time limit is not peremptory.[263] This, however, contradicts the text of the canon. For this author, the failure to lodge the appeal within the peremptory time (unless one is legitimately impeded) constitutes a waiver of the right to appeal but not a waiver of the right subsequently to question the status of persons. If there are not two concordant judgments, an "appeal" which arrives after the time limit should be treated as a new presentation of the case, asking the higher level tribunal to proceed to a resolution of the question of status.[264] If there are two concordant decisions, then the request must be handled as a new presentation of the case.[265]

Of course, a person may be legitimately impeded from lodging an appeal within the time limit. For example, because of travel he or she may not have received the notice of the publication of the sentence. In such a case, the useful time begins to run from the time the party had the knowledge and opportunity to act.

Normally, an appeal is to be presented in writing. If it is made orally, however, a notary must immediately draw up the appeal in writing in the presence of the one making it. While the notary's signature alone is sufficient to verify the fact of the appeal (c. 1437, §2), the one appealing should be asked to sign the document of appeal prepared by the notary.

Incidental Question about Right of Appeal

Canon 1631 — If a question arises about the right to appeal, the appellate tribunal deals with it as promptly as possible (expeditissime) according to the norms of the oral contentious process.

If a question emerges concerning the right of a party to appeal, this is the first issue that must be addressed by the appellate court. For example, a question of the right to appeal arises when a party lodges an appeal after the deadline but claims that he or she was impeded from doing so within the deadline. This question is handled by the oral contentious process (cc. 1656–1670) unless a party insists on the ordinary contentious process (c. 1656, §1). The decision concerning the right of appeal is to be made expeditissime, which means that it is not itself subject to further appeal (c. 1629, 5°).

Appropriate Appellate Court

Canon 1632 — §1. If the appeal does not indicate the tribunal to which it is directed, it is presumed to be made to the tribunal mentioned in cann. 1438 and 1439.

§2. If the other party has appealed to another appellate tribunal, the tribunal of higher grade deals with the case, without prejudice to can. 1415.[266]

This canon establishes a presumption at law, namely, that if there is no indication of the tribunal to which the appeal is directed, it is to be considered as directed to the usual appellate court as determined by canons 1438–1439. As is the case with any presumption, however, it must cede to the truth. Thus, the one appealing may clarify his or her intention to appeal to another competent appellate court, such as the Roman Rota (c. 1444, §1, 1°). If this is done before the usual appellate court has cited the parties, then the case can be transmitted in accord with the clarification. But if the usual appellate court has already cited the parties, any other tribunal is prevented from hearing the appeal (c. 1415).

[263] For example, Moneta, in Com Ex IV/2, 1655–1656.

[264] Since there were not two concordant decisions, however, this new presentation would not require the presentation of new and weighty evidence or arguments. See ApSig, private reply, June 3, 1989, RRAO 1989, 56.

[265] For further discussion of this question, see Mendonça, "The Structural and Functional Aspects," 475–477.

[266] There is no counterpart in the Eastern code. See Abbass, "Contentious Trials," 883–884.

It may happen, however, that more than one party appeals. For example, both a defender of the bond and a respondent might appeal an affirmative decision in a marriage nullity case. If the appeals are directed to different appellate courts, the matter is to be heard at the tribunal of the higher grade. This normal procedure does not apply, however, if the tribunal of the lower grade has already cited the parties, for the tribunal of the higher grade would then be prevented from hearing the case in that instance (c. 1415).[267]

Time for Pursuing an Appeal

Canon 1633 — An appeal must be pursued before the appellate judge within a month from its introduction unless the judge from whom appeal is made has established a longer period for a party to pursue it.

The law distinguishes between lodging the appeal and pursuing the appeal. Once an appeal is lodged (c. 1630), through an action as simple as a letter or other notice indicating the decision to appeal, the one appealing has a time limit of one month (thirty consecutive days; see c. 202, §1) to pursue that appeal before the appellate judge. If the appeal is not pursued within that time, it is considered as abandoned (see below, c. 1635). There are two exceptions to this rule. First, the judge who issued the original decision may extend the time limit for the party to pursue the appeal. Second, the time limit may be suspended by the law itself in accord with the norm of canon 1634, §2 (see below).

Means of Pursuing an Appeal

Canon 1634 — §1. To pursue an appeal it is required and suffices that a party calls upon the services of a higher judge for an emendation of the challenged sentence, attaches a copy of this sentence, and indicates the reasons for the appeal.

§2. If a party cannot obtain a copy of the challenged sentence from the tribunal from which appeal is made within the useful time, the time limits do not run in the meantime; the impediment must be made known to the appellate judge who is to bind the judge from whom appeal is made by a precept to fulfill that judge's duty as soon as possible.

§3. Meanwhile the judge from whom appeal is made must transmit the acts to the appellate judge according to the norm of can. 1474.

The first paragraph defines what is involved in pursuing the appeal. The requirements are minimal in that it is required and suffices that the party appealing:

1. request the assistance of the appellate tribunal to change the judgment;
2. attach a copy of the sentence being challenged;
3 indicate the reasons for appealing against the sentence.

Paragraph two provides a protection of the right of the one appealing.[268] The canonical time limit of thirty days is intended to give the one lodging an appeal the opportunity to study the judgment and prepare appropriate arguments. If the one appealing is unable to obtain a copy of the [267] Provided the person lodges the appeal legitimately (i.e., before the judge who issued the original decision), this conflict between courts of appeals will never occur. The judge would wait until the peremptory time limit has passed in order to give every party the right of appeal. If there is more than one appeal and they are directed to different courts, the judge applies the principle of this canon and sends the appeal to the tribunal of higher grade. If, however, a party incorrectly sends an appeal directly to an appellate court, without the original judge having any awareness of that action, then a tribunal of lower grade might already have the case and be acting upon it, thus bringing the law on prevention into play.

[268] There is no parallel to paragraph two in the Eastern code. See Abbass, "Contentious Trials," 884–885.

judgment, then he or she does not have that opportunity. In this case, the thirty-day time limit is automatically suspended and the party retains the right to pursue the appeal.[269] The one appealing is to inform the judge of the appellate tribunal of the difficulty. The appellate judge is then to issue a precept (see c. 49) obliging the original judge to provide the copy to the one appealing.

Paragraph three would probably be more appropriately incorporated into canon 1630. It simply states the requirement that, when the original tribunal is notified of the appeal, all the acts of the case are to be forwarded to the appellate court. This is to be done as soon as possible, certainly within the thirty-day period provided for a party to pursue the appeal.[270] A notary is to certify the authenticity of the transmitted acts (c. 1474). If the acts are in a language unknown to the higher tribunal, an accurate translation is also to be provided.

Abandonment of Appeal

Canon 1635 — Once the deadline for appeal has passed without action either before the judge from whom the appeal is made or before the appellate judge, the appeal is considered abandoned.

The appeal is to be considered as abandoned if either of the time limits provided in canons 1630, §1 or 1633 passes without an action being taken. The language of the canon seems strange as applied to the original fifteen-day time limit for lodging an appeal. It might have been more precise to say that once that time limit passes, any attempt to lodge an appeal is to be considered as having no effect. In this situation, an appeal was not deserted; rather, it never existed. Nonetheless, the practical consequences are the same.

Abandonment of an appeal carries with it all of the canonical consequences connected with renunciation (see cc. 1524–1525). Depending on the nature of the case, the case may become a res iudicata (c. 1641, 2°) and the sentence is to be executed appropriately. In cases involving the status of persons, including cases of marriage nullity, the matter does not become res iudicata. The judgment, however, may be executed if there are two conforming decisions (cc. 1644, §1 and 1684).

Renunciation of Appeal

Canon 1636 — §1. The appellant can renounce the appeal with the effects mentioned in can. 1525.

§2. If the defender of the bond or the promoter of justice has introduced the appeal, the defender of the bond or the promoter of justice of the appellate tribunal can renounce it, unless the law provides otherwise.

Whoever pursues an appeal may voluntarily renounce it at any point in the instance. To do so validly, the renunciation should fulfill the requirements of canon 1524, §3.[271] The effects of renunciation of an appeal are described in canon 1525. Although canon 1636 does directly refer to it, another effect of the renunciation of an appeal is that, unless it involves the status of persons, the matter becomes a res iudicata (c. 1641, 3°).

If either the promoter of justice or defender of the bond lodged appeals, the comparable officers of the appellate tribunal have the right to renounce the appeal. This renunciation also must meet the requirements of canon 1524, §3.

[269] A sentence that has not been legitimately published has no force (see the commentary on c. 1614).

[270] A more specific and limited time is provided in marriage nullity cases where all the acts are to be forwarded to the appeal tribunal within twenty days of the publication of the sentence (c. 1682, §1).

[271] The renunciation must be (1) in writing, (2) signed by the party or a procurator with the special mandate to do so, (3) communicated to the other party who must accept or not oppose it, and (4) admitted by the judge.

Effect of Appeal on the Parties

Canon 1637 — §1. An appeal made by the petitioner also benefits the respondent and vice versa.

§2. If there are several respondents or petitioners and the sentence is challenged by only one or against only one of them, the challenge is considered to be made by all of them and against all of them whenever the matter sought is indivisible or a joint obligation.

Canon 1637 establishes certain parameters and presumptions governing the appeal process. Paragraph one deals with a case involving one petitioner and one respondent. If either party appeals, the other party is equally affected and has equal rights in the prosecution of the appeal.

Paragraph two deals with cases involving multiple petitioners or respondents. When the matter at issue is neither indivisible nor a joint obligation, one person may lodge an appeal affecting only some of the other parties. When the obligation is joint or the matter indivisible, however, the appeal necessarily affects all the parties. Therefore, the law automatically considers the appeal as being made by all against all (ab omnibus et contra omnes).

Specifying the Focus of an Appeal

§3. If one party introduces an appeal against one ground of the sentence, the other party can appeal incidentally against other grounds within the peremptory period of fifteen days from the day on which the original appeal was made known to the latter, even if the deadline for an appeal has passed.

§4. Unless it is otherwise evident, an appeal is presumed to be made against all the grounds of a sentence.

When an appeal is lodged by one party against only a part of the sentence (e.g., against only one of two or more grounds), the other party or parties are to be informed of the fact and extent of the appeal. They then have the right to lodge what is known as an "incidental appeal" against other grounds of the sentence. Even if the time limit established in canon 1630, §1 has already expired, the right to lodge an incidental appeal extends for fifteen consecutive days from the time the notification of the appeal was communicated.[272]

Paragraph four establishes the presumption of law that an appeal is considered to be made against the judgment in its entirety, including each and every ground, unless the appeal clearly indicates otherwise. If the appeal is narrowly targeted and if no incidental appeals are lodged against other parts of the judgment, then the uncontested parts of the judgment are not considered in the appeal.[273]

Suspensive Effect of Appeal

Canon 1638 — An appeal suspends the execution of the sentence.

The general principle for the ordinary contentious process is that the appeal suspends the execution of the judgment.[274] There are, however, exceptions to this rule. In some circumstances, the judge has the discretion to order a provisional execution of a judgment (c. 1650, §§2–3).

Other challenges to the sentence do not have such an automatic suspensive effect. A complaint of nullity against a sentence does not carry sus-[272] Unlike c. 1630, §1, this norm does not provide for the time limit to be counted as canonical days (tempus utile). For the computation of time, see cc. 200–203.

[273] An exception would be a marriage nullity case in which the entire judgment must be transmitted ex officio to the appellate court (c. 1682, §1). In that case, the entire judgment must be considered at the appellate level, even if technically only a part of the judgment is being formally appealed.

[274] See cc. 1650–1655 for the norms governing the execution of a sentence.

pensive effect. A new presentation of the case after two concordant sentences does not have automatic suspensive effect (cc. 1644, §2; 1684, §2), although the judge may decide to decree a suspension of execution (c. 1650, §3).

A petition for restitutio in integrum, however, does suspend the execution of the sentence provided that execution is not already under way or unless the judge decrees otherwise (c. 1647).

Admission of New Grounds/Proofs

Canon 1639 — §1. Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1683, a new cause for petitioning cannot be admitted at the appellate grade, not even by way of useful accumulation; consequently, the joinder of the issue can only address whether the prior sentence is to be confirmed or revised either totally or partially.

§2. New proofs, however, are admitted only according to the norm of can. 1600.

As a general rule, a new ground may not be admitted at the appellate level (whether second, third, or higher instance). The issue joined before the court of appeals, therefore, is controlled by the manner in which the issue was joined in the previous instance or instances. The question to be addressed is whether that previous judgment is to be upheld, modified, or overruled.

An exception to this rule is provided for in marriage nullity cases in which an appellate court may admit and judge a new ground of nullity as if in first instance.[275]

In second and higher instances, new proofs may be admitted, but only under the provisions of canon 1600.[276] Thus, while the appellate court is free to further instruct a case, normally the judgment on appeal is made on the basis of the evidence previously obtained.

Appellate Procedure

Canon 1640 — The appellate grade must proceed in the same manner as first instance with appropriate adjustments; immediately after the issue has been joined according to the norm of can. 1513, §1 and can. 1639, §1 and unless the proofs possibly must be completed, the discussion of the case is to take place and the sentence rendered.

In general, the court of appeals follows the procedure provided for trials of first instance. The law envisions, however, that a trial on the appellate level be a simpler and less time-consuming process. Thus, the procedures governing first instance trials are to be modified to take into account the nature of the appellate process. What are the key differences?

First, if the matter would normally be reserved to a college of judges (c. 1425, §1) but was nonetheless rendered in first instance by a sole judge (c. 1425, §4), the court of second instance must be constituted as a college and proceed in a collegial manner (c. 1441).

Second, except in marriage nullity cases, the appellate court is limited to joining the issue on the question of whether to confirm, modify, or overturn the judgment of the previous tribunal (c. 1639, §1).

Finally, the law normally does not envision gathering additional proofs at the appellate level. In fact, new proofs may be gathered only under limited circumstances (cc. 1639, §2; 1600). Thus, on appeal, usually the trial moves immediately from the joinder of the issues (c. 1513) to a discussion of the case (cc. 1601–1606), and then to the decision, the drafting of the sentence, and its publication (cc. 1607–1615). If new proofs need to be gathered by the appellate tribunal, then the norms governing the collection of proofs and the publication of the acts apply.

[275] See the commentary on c. 1683.

[276] This second paragraph of c. 1639 might better have been attached to c. 1640, since it contains an exception to the general provision that the procedure on the appellate level is the same as that of first instance.

TITLE IX[277]
RES IUDICATA AND RESTITUTIO IN INTEGRUM[278]
[cc. 1641–1648]

CHAPTER I
RES IUDICATA
[cc. 1641–1644]

Among other safeguards to protect against endless lawsuits, canon law provides the institute known as res iudicata.[279] This is sometimes referred to as the "closed judgment" or "adjudged matter." A res iudicata is a definitive judicial sentence resolved in such a way that it is no longer subject to a direct challenge by means of an appeal (see the commentary on c. 1642, §1).

While a matter that is res iudicata cannot be appealed, in cases of manifest injustice it may be directly challenged by a petition for restitutio in integrum (see cc. 1645–1648).

Situations Resulting in a Res Iudicata

Canon 1641 — Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1643, a res iudicata occurs:

1° if a second concordant sentence is rendered between the same parties over the same issue and on the same cause for petitioning;

2° if an appeal against the sentence has not been introduced within the useful time;

3° if at the appellate grade, the trial has been abated or renounced;

4° if a definitive sentence has been rendered from which there is no appeal according to the norm of can. 1629.

This canon defines the circumstances under which a judicial decision becomes res iudicata. This canon must be understood in the light of canon 1643 which stipulates that a case involving the status of persons never becomes res iudicata[280] even if one or more of the provisions of canon 1641 are verified.

First, a res iudicata occurs when two concordant sentences have been issued concerning the same parties, regarding the same basic issue being petitioned (de eodem petito), and based on the same juridic facts or basis of petitioning (ex eadem causa petendi). Of course, those conforming sentences must have been issued by different tribunals ruling in different instances.[281]

Second, a judgment becomes res iudicata subsequent to the issuance of a sentence that is not challenged by an appeal within the peremptory time limit provided (see cc. 1630, §1, 1633, 1634, §2, and 1635).

Third, a judgment that was appealed becomes res iudicata if the appeal is renounced (see cc. 1524–1525) or the trial abated at the appellate level (see cc. 1520–1523).

Finally, by definition, a definitive sentence is res iudicata if it concerns one of the matters against which no appeal is permitted (c. 1629).[282]

[277] Article X of the Eastern code corresponds with title IX of the Latin code in providing norms for res iudicata and restitutio in integrum. The Eastern code, however, contains additional norms for challenges based on the opposition of third parties (CCEO 1330–1333). For a discussion of these norms, see Abbass, "Contentious Trials," 889–890.

[278] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 1002–1005; Ryan, in CLSGBI Com, 919–923; Diego-Lora, in Pamplona ComEng, 1013–1019; Acebal, in Salamanca Com, 797–801; Arroba Conde, in Valencia Com, 709–713; Diego-Lora, in Com Ex IV/2, 1673–1721; J. de Salas Murillo, in Com Ex IV/2, 1722–1738.

[279] An excellent analysis of this institute is provided by J. G. Johnson, "Res iudicata, restitutio in integrum, and Marriage Cases," Stud Can 28 (1994) 323–327.

[280] For the types of cases that involve status of persons, see the commentary on c. 1643.

[281] For reflections on conformity of sentences in marriage nullity cases, see the commentary on c. 1684.

[282] See the commentary on c. 1629, 1°, 2°, and 5°. Numbers 3 and 4 of c. 1629 do not apply, with 3° being tautological and 4° involving a decree or sentence that is not definitive in nature, and hence not a matter that becomes res iudicata.

Effect of a Res Iudicata

Canon 1642 — §1. A res iudicata possesses the stability of law and cannot be challenged directly except according to the norm of can. 1645, §1.

When a sentence becomes a res iudicata, it acquires a high degree of canonical stability, becoming "immune to any future direct attack."[283] This canon provides that a res iudicata can be "challenged directly" only through the institute known as restitutio in integrum (c. 1645, §1).

If a "direct" challenge is prohibited except through restitutio in integrum, does the law envision any "indirect" challenge? Specifically, is a res iudicata subject to a complaint of nullity in accord with canons 1620 or 1622? Wrenn states that the judgment "is so firm and final that it no longer admits either of appeal or complaint (querela) but only of reinstatement."[284] This author, however, disagrees.[285] When a sentence is vitiated by a cause of irremediable nullity (c. 1620), those causes of nullity are not sanated and remain open to challenge by an action for ten years and by means of exception in perpetuity (c. 1621).[286] A matter that is res iudicata would not, however, be open to a complaint of remediable nullity (c. 1622) once the three-month time limit (c. 1623) has passed.

[283] Johnson, "Res iudicata," 325.

[284] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 1002. Ryan agrees with Wrenn on this point (CLSGBI Com, 920).

[285] Diego-Lora likewise holds that a res iudicata remains open to an indirect challenge by means of a complaint of nullity. See Com Ex IV/2, 1686, 1697–1698, and Pamplona ComEng, 1014. Arroba Conde, in Valencia Com, 709, agrees with this conclusion. These commentators note that a complaint of nullity is not a direct challenge to the adjudged matter itself, but rather a challenge to the validity of the process employed to issue the decision.

[286] CCEO 1323, §1 supports this conclusion by specifically providing for a challenge to a res iudicata through a complaint of nullity. Unlike the Latin code, the Eastern code also allows a challenge by third parties.

Rights Flowing from a Res Iudicata

§2. It establishes the rights between the parties and permits an action for execution and an exception of res iudicata which the judge can also declare ex officio in order to prevent a new introduction of the same case.

The existence of a res iudicata has important legal consequences establishing rights that can be vindicated either by means of an action or an exception (cc. 1491–1495).

As an action: Unless the judge has already executed the judgment ex officio, any of the parties can petition for the execution of that judgment in accord with canon 1650, §2.

As an exception: Should anyone attempt to introduce the same case anew before any tribunal, a party may lodge the exception that there is no right to present the new petition because the matter is res iudicata. Similarly, the judge before whom the new petition has been presented need not wait for another party to lodge an exception, but may ex officio reject the new petition on the basis of the existence of a res iudicata.

Status-of-Persons Cases

Canon 1643 — Cases concerning the status of persons, including cases concerning the separation of spouses, never become res iudicata.

A case involving the "status of persons" never becomes a res iudicata, even if it otherwise fulfills all of the requirements of canon 1641. Nonetheless, such cases may attain a significant degree of judicial security in accord with the provisions of canon 1644.

Since canon 1643 creates an exception to the law, it must be interpreted strictly (c. 18). Thus, this norm applies only to those types of cases clearly involving the status of the persons themselves; it does not apply to other issues that may significantly affect the person (e.g., the exercise of a right or the holding of a particular ecclesiastical office) but do not change that person's underlying status. Which cases, then, involve the status of persons? This canon itself, reflecting an authentic interpretation of the 1917 code,[287] specifies that cases involving the separation of spouses (cc. 1692–1696) concern the status of persons. Canon 1691 expressly specifies that all marriage nullity cases, whether handled in the ordinary contentious process or the documentary process, involve the status of persons. Cases declaring the nullity of sacred orders (cc. 1708–1712) certainly involve the status of persons, as do cases involving the validity of religious profession (cc. 656, 658). Some commentators argue that penal actions involve the status of persons.[288] Others hold the contrary[289] and many are silent on the matter. This author agrees that of their nature penal actions are not status-of-persons cases.[290] This position is consistent with canon 1731, which recognizes that a judgment in a penal trial may become a res iudicata. Furthermore, canon 1728, §1, unlike canon 1691 in marriage cases, applies the norms for cases pertaining to the public good to penal trials, but not the norms for cases involving the status of persons.

New Presentation of a Case

Canon 1644 — §1. If a second concordant sentence has been rendered in a case concerning the status of persons, recourse can be made at any time to the appellate tribunal if new and grave proofs or arguments are brought forward within the peremptory time limit of thirty days from the proposed challenge. Within a month from when the new proofs and arguments are brought forward, however, the appellate tribunal must establish by decree whether a new presentation of the case must be admitted or not.

Since cases involving the status of persons do not become res iudicata, they remain radically open to challenge. Nonetheless, it is in the interest neither of the spiritual welfare of the parties, nor of the community of the Church, for frivolous or vindictive lawsuits to continue interminably. Thus, after two concordant decisions, cases involving the status of persons attain an important measure of judicial security.[291]

Once there are two concordant decisions, the aggrieved party does not enjoy the right simply to appeal those two judgments.[292] The threshold is raised and, instead of appealing, a party may seek recourse only by means of a "new presentation of the case" (nova causae propositio). The petition for a new presentation of the case must be lodged before a tribunal with jurisdiction superior to the two courts that rendered the first two decisions.[293]

This extraordinary challenge requires that the aggrieved party be prepared to bring forward "new and grave proofs or arguments." This requirement is not met simply by presenting the names of additional witnesses or by merely asserting that the party believes the two conforming sentences are wrong. It must be shown that addi-[287] CodCom, responsa, April 8, 1941, AAS 33 (1941) 173. Translation in CLD 2, 552.

[288] Arroba Conde, in Valencia Com, 710.

[289] Diego-Lora, in Com Ex IV/2, 1707.

[290] Of course, some penal actions, such as dismissal from religious life (cc. 694–704) or dismissal from the clerical state (c. 1336, §1, 5°), affect the status of persons. But these are not status-of-persons cases, i.e., cases where a person's status is the primary focus of the inquiry.

[291] See the commentary on c. 1684 for reflections on conformity of sentences in marriage nullity cases.

[292] One should recall that the requirements for lodging and pursuing an appeal (cc. 1630 and 1634) are relatively minimal in nature.

[293] In the Latin church, this almost always involves a petition to the Roman Rota as the ordinary court of third and further instance (c. 1444, §1, 2°). In Spain, however, the Spanish Rota is competent in third instance (see J. L. Acebal, in Salamanca Com, 708–709), and a new presentation of the case may be lodged there. For the Eastern Catholic churches, the patriarchal tribunal is competent in third and further instances (CCEO 1063, §§3–4). In those particular churches sui iuris not subject to a patriarchal tribunal, particular law may provide an alternative tribunal competent to accept cases in third instance (CCEO 1065).

tional witnesses or other modes of proof bring forward genuinely new information of significant value, evidence that has the potential to shed a truly different light on the judgment. Likewise, the proposed argumentation must reflect a truly new, weighty, and compelling reading of the applicable law and facts.[294]

The new and grave proofs or arguments must be presented within a peremptory time limit of thirty continuous days (see cc. 201–203) from the lodging of the challenge. Hence, if those new proofs or arguments are not brought forward within that peremptory time, the request for a new presentation of the case is to be rejected.

Once the challenge has been lodged and the new proofs and arguments presented, the appellate judges have one month (30 consecutive days; see c. 202, §1) to consider the request and issue a decree either admitting or rejecting the new presentation of the case. This decree must contain at least a summary of the reasons for the judges' decision (c. 1617). The canon as well as the norms for the Roman Rota are silent concerning what happens if the appellate tribunal fails to act within the one-month period provided. By analogy with canon 1506 on the presentation of an initial libellus, the interested party could certainly insist on a ruling. It would not be realistic, however, to expect a response within ten additional days, and there is no provision for an "automatic" admission of a petition for a new presentation of the case.

A decree rejecting a new presentation of a case is subject to appeal, since it is a decree which has a definitive effect (cc. 1618 and 1629, 4°).

Should a new presentation of the case be admitted and lead to a decision contrary to the earlier conforming decisions, any party to the case aggrieved by the new judgment is free to appeal against it in accord with the usual norms governing appeals (cc. 1628–1640).

[294] RRAO 1993, 33. Also see RRAO 1990, 68–69.

Petition for New Presentation Not Automatically Suspensive

§2. Recourse to a higher tribunal in order to obtain a new presentation of the case does not suspend the execution of the sentence unless either the law provides otherwise or the appellate tribunal orders its suspension according to the norm of can. 1650, §3.

Although not constituting a res iudicata, two conforming decisions in a case involving the status of persons have significant juridical effects and permit the execution of the judgment (cc. 1650–1655).[295]

In the event a new presentation of the case is proposed, that petition does not suspend the execution of the sentence. There are two exceptions to this rule:

1. The law may provide otherwise and mandate an automatic suspension of execution for certain types of judgments. In fact, the code contains no such alternative provision for judicial trials involving the status of persons.[296]

2. Upon receiving the petition for a new presentation of a case, the appeal tribunal may issue a decree suspending the execution of the judgment in accord with canon 1650, §3.

If the execution of the sentence was suspended and the petition for a new presentation of the case subsequently is rejected, the tribunal would then move to the execution of the judgment (c. 1650). If the execution was not suspended and the new [295] See the commentary on c. 1684 for the specific application of this general rule to two concordant judgments in marriage nullity cases.

[296] For cases not involving the status of persons, the law provides for the suspension of the execution of a decision when that decision is challenged in penal cases (c. 1353) and in the administrative processes for the removal or transfer of a pastor (cc. 1747, §3; 1752).

presentation of the case is rejected, the acts of execution retain full force. If the new presentation is admitted and eventually results in a decision contrary to the earlier conforming decisions, the new decision should incorporate a revocation or amendment of the decree of execution in conformity with the new judgment. If the original decree of execution, in accord with canon 1650, §3, provided for some guarantee in the event of a subsequent contrary judgment, the provisions for the guarantee would then be activated unless further appeals or challenges of the judgment have been lodged.

CHAPTER II
RESTITUTIO IN INTEGRUM
[cc. 1645–1648]

Lawrence Wrenn defines restitutio in integrum as a "legal remedy by which a person who has been seriously injured by a judicial sentence that was manifestly unjust can, for reasons of natural equity, be restored by a competent judge to the status quo ante, i.e., before the injurious sentence."[297] Sometimes translated as "reinstatement" or "total reinstatement," this institute was modified significantly in the code revision process.[298] While no longer technically referred to as an "extraordinary" remedy, in practice its application would be rare given the requirement that there be clear proof of injustice in the original decision.

Clear Proof of Injustice

Canon 1645 — §1. Restitutio in integrum is granted against a sentence which has become res iudicata provided that its injustice is clearly established.

Restitutio in integrum is a remedy to be used when a matter is res iudicata provided that there is manifest proof of injustice. While a potentially invalid sentence may be challenged by a complaint of nullity (see the commentary on cc. 1619–1627), a restitutio in integrum is the only challenge available against a valid sentence that is res iudicata.[299]

Wrenn argues that, as a result of the changes made in the 1983 code, a petition for restitutio may be lodged against even "a first instance decision in a marriage case" despite the fact that these never become res iudicata.[300] Most commentators disagree with this conclusion.[301] John Johnson discusses Wrenn's opinion at length. He concludes that > Wrenn's reasons, taken individually or cumulatively, are finally not convincing.... Nevertheless, I do not find my own analysis to be so overpowering as to deprive his conclusions of all force.[302]

Johnson then carefully examines Wrenn's argument in the light of hypothetical cases where use of the remedy might be considered, concluding that experimenting with the use of restitutio in marriage cases might be justifiable but only under extremely rare circumstances.[303] Further, Johnson argues, any attempt to use it would be "rather risky" because it would likely raise "messy" procedural wrangles, especially with courts of appeal, that might well complicate rather than promote the effort to redress an injustice.[304] This author shares Johnson's skepticism and is of the opinion that evidence of manifest injustice in

[297] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 1004.

[298] For a detailed summary of the history of this institute, see Salas Murillo, in Com Ex IV/2, 1723–1726.

[299] As noted above, CCEO 1323, §1 provides for an additional challenge against a valid sentence by a third party.

[300] Wrenn, Procedures, 79. Also see idem, in CLSA Com, 1004.

[301] Ryan, in CLSGBI Com, 922; Diego-Lora, in Pamplona ComEng, 1016; Sallas Murillo, in Com Ex IV/2, 1727–1728.

[302] Johnson, "Res iudicata," 340.

[303] Ibid., 340–345.

[304] Ibid., 345. Thus, while very skeptical of Wrenn's position, Johnson is not willing to close the door totally to the possibility of a restitutio in marriage cases.

cases involving the status of persons would better be addressed through a complaint of nullity of sentence or a new presentation of the case.

The Five Manifest Injustices

§2. Injustice, however, is not considered to be established clearly unless:

1° the sentence is based on proofs which afterwards are discovered to be false in such a way that without those proofs the dispositive part of the sentence is not sustained;

2° documents have been revealed afterwards which undoubtedly prove new facts and demand a contrary decision;

3° the sentence was rendered due to the malice of one party resulting in harm to the other party;

4° a prescript of the law which is not merely procedural was clearly neglected;

5° the sentence is contrary to a previous decision which has become res iudicata.

A restitutio in integrum may be granted only when it is evident (constare) that the original judgment was unjust. What is required to conclude that a sentence was manifestly unjust? Canon 1645, §2 stipulates that such injustice is established if any one of the following factors was present:

1° The original judgment must have been based on proofs that subsequently have been discovered to be false. Whatever the source of that false evidence, be it honest mistake or deliberate deceit, it must have been so important that without it the original decision would not have been rendered. In other words, due to the false evidence, the dispositive part of the sentence (i.e., the decision of the tribunal in response to the issue) no longer has a foundation. Thus, discovering that some of the evidence in a case was false is not sufficient to prove injustice provided the rest of the evidence provides a solid basis for the tribunal's decision.

2° Documents are later discovered that undoubtedly establish new facts, facts which demand a contrary decision. Again, the mere presentation of newly discovered relevant documents is insufficient. The probative force of the new documents must be incontrovertible and must establish facts that prove the original decision was not in accord with truth and justice.[305]

3° The original judgment was rendered due to the deceit (dolus) of one of the parties that harmed the other party or parties.[306] Such fraudulent manipulation of the trial would also provide a basis for a complaint of nullity of the sentence on the ground of the denial of the right of defense (c. 1620, 7°). Unless instigated or encouraged by one of the parties, the deceit of a witness or other person involved in the trial does not give rise to an action for restitutio under this heading, but may do so in terms of false proofs (1°).

4° Injustice may be proven if there was evident neglect of a provision of law that was not merely procedural. In other words, procedural flaws in themselves are not to be considered evidence of injustice unless they caused substantive injustice.[307]

5° A restitutio is granted against a judgment that was contrary to a previous decision that [305] See the commentary on the nature and trustworthiness of documentary evidence (cc. 1540–1543).

[306] See the commentary on canon 1098 for a discussion on the meaning of the term dolus.

[307] While the cases did not involve petitions for restitutio, Mendonça gives examples of two Rotal decisions in which procedural formalities were seriously flawed, yet where the Rota concluded that the spirit and substance of the law had been observed. See A. Mendonça, "The Application of the Principle of Equity in Marriage Nullity Cases," J 55 (1995) 670–679.

had become res iudicata. Of course, this provision does not apply if a previous restitutio had been granted against that res iudicata, or if that decision had been declared null as the result of a complaint of nullity.

The nisi clause in this text (the injustice "is not considered to be established clearly unless")[308] indicates that this list is taxative, i.e., that it contains the only causes of injustice which can be the foundation of restitutio in integrum. Canon 1460, §2, however, speaks of the possibility of a restitutio in integrum in the situation where an exception has been made against a judge on the basis of relative incompetence (c. 1407, §§1–2). If in response to the exception the judge decrees the tribunal to be competent, there is no appeal against this ruling. The canon, however, indicates that a complaint of nullity and restitutio in integrum are not prohibited against the sentence as a whole on the basis of the relative incompetence of the judge. Relative incompetence is not listed as one of the causes of injustice providing a basis for restitutio in canon 1645, §2. The only one of the five categories under which it might fall is 4°, neglect of a provision of law that is not merely procedural. Yet, the rules governing relative incompetence are strictly procedural laws. To provide the basis for a restitutio, an incorrectly issued decree of competence would need to be not merely procedurally erroneous, but also substantively unjust.

Issues to Be Adjudicated before the Original Judge

Canon 1646 — §1. Restitutio in integrum for the reasons mentioned in can. 1645, §2, nn. 1–3 must be sought from the judge who rendered the sentence within three months computed from the day the person became aware of these same reasons.

This first paragraph governs petitions for restitutio in integrum based on numbers one through three of canon 1645, §2 only. Unless the injured party is a minor (see the commentary on c. 1646, §3 below), such a petition is to be presented within a period of three months. This time limit is computed from the day on which the party became aware of the injustice, not from the day of the publication of the sentence. Thus, many years might pass between the issuance of the judgment and the discovery of its injustice. Petitions for restitutio on the bases of paragraphs one to three must be lodged before the judge who delivered the original judgment.[309]

Issues to Be Adjudicated before the Appellate Tribunal

§2. Restitutio in integrum for the reasons mentioned in can. 1645, §2, nn. 4 and 5 must be sought from the appellate tribunal within three months from the notice of the publication of the sentence; if in the case mentioned in can. 1645, §2, n. 5 notice of the previous decision occurs later, however, the time limit runs from this notice.

This second paragraph governs petitions for restitutio in integrum based on items four and five of canon 1645, §2 only. Unless the injured party is a minor (see the commentary on c. 1646, §3 below), such a petition is to be presented within a period of three months from the notification of the publication of the sentence. This norm presumes, therefore, that the parties to the case are aware of the existence of the factors described in items four and five. When, however, the injured party had not received notice of the prior judgment that had become res iudicata, the three-month time limit to petition for a restitutio begins with the notification of the existence of that previous judgment.

[308] Canon 39, while referring directly to conditions in administrative acts rather than laws, explains the significant legal effect of the Latin terms si, nisi, and dummodo.

[309] If so much time has passed that the original judge is no longer available, the petition is lodged before the original tribunal where the judgment was issued.

Special Protection for Minors

§3. The time limits mentioned above do not run as long as the injured person is a minor.

In canon law, a minor is a person under the age of eighteen (c. 97, §1). Historically, the institute of restitutio in integrum developed as an extraordinary remedy to protect the rights of minors involved in litigation.[310] While its use has been expanded, this paragraph provides special protection for minors. Whatever the foundation that would justify restitutio, the time limits for seeking that remedy do not apply as long as the injured party is a minor. The minor's right to petition for a restitutio perdures until the person celebrates his or her eighteenth birthday, when the time limits begin to run in accord with the previous two paragraphs.

Effects of a Petition for Restitutio

Canon 1647 — §1. The petition for restitutio in integrum suspends the execution of a sentence if execution has not yet begun.

§2. If from probable indications there is a suspicion that a petition has been made in order to delay the execution, however, the judge can decree execution of the sentence, though with suitable guarantees to the one seeking the restitutio that there will be indemnity if the restitutio in integrum is granted.

The law gives a petition for restitutio in integrum suspensive effect preventing the execution of the judgment.[311] There are two exceptions to this general rule. First, if the execution of the judgment has already been completed or even initiated, the petition for restitutio does not suspend that execution. Second, judges before whom petitions for restitutio are lodged retain the discretion to order a provisional execution of the sentences. Judges may exercise this power only if they are convinced that the request for reinstatement is merely a delaying tactic designed to prevent the execution of the sentence. When exercising the power to order the judgment executed despite the petition for restitutio, however, the judges must provide guarantees indemnifying the party petitioning for a restitutio.

[310] Johnson, "Res iudicata," 327.

[311] This differs from the provisions for a new presentation of the case (see the commentary on c. 1644, §2).

Effects of Grant/Denial of a Petition for Restitutio

Canon 1648 — If restitutio in integrum is granted, the judge must pronounce on the merits of the case.

When a petition for a restitutio in integrum is denied, the original judgment retains its full force. If it has not yet been executed, the execution may begin immediately.

If the petition for a restitutio in integrum is granted, however, the original judgment is completely overturned, leaving the original controversy at the heart of the trial unresolved. The law could have provided that the matter then be returned to the original court for the process to resume.[312] Instead, this canon stipulates that the judge or judges who granted the restitutio must then proceed to rule on the merits of the case. The judge would conduct the renewed trial according to the process suitable for the issue at stake (e.g., ordinary contentious process, oral contentious process, documentary process).[313]

[312] This is the situation, for example, when a second instance tribunal declares the nullity of a first instance sentence. See commentary on c. 1625.

[313] A restitutio in integrum could be granted only against the second of two conforming decisions rather than against both. If so, the first judgment remains in force, and the new trial is conducted at the same grade (instance) as that of the judgment that was overturned.

Title X
Judicial Expenses and Gratuitous Legal Assistance[314]
[c. 1649]

Particular Law on Fees and Legal Aid

Canon 1649 — §1. The bishop who directs the tribunal is to establish norms concerning:

1° the requirement of the parties to pay or compensate judicial expenses;

2° the fees for the procurators, advocates, experts, and interpreters and the indemnity for the witnesses;

3° the grant of gratuitous legal assistance or reduction of the expenses;

4° the recovery of damages owed by a person who not only lost the trial but also entered into the litigation rashly;

5° the deposit of money or the provision furnished for the payment of expenses and recovery of damages.

Rather than attempt the impossible task of providing detailed norms for the universal Church, this canon provides that the bishop governing each tribunal is to enact particular law to govern tribunal fees and legal aid.[315] Among other things, those norms would need to implement the provisions of canons 1523 and 1525 concerning expenses when a trial is abated or renounced.[316]

Whatever the determination of particular law, the provisions should be made clear to the parties at the beginning of the trial (c. 1464). Thus, when the specific determination of the expenses is made in the sentence (see c. 1611, 4°), the assessment of fees will not be seen as arbitrary, but as the application of the previously communicated policy.

Among the five areas listed, it is vital that realistic provisions for free legal aid or reduction of expenses (3°) be enacted. Otherwise, the exercise of the rights enunciated in canon 221 may be impaired or thwarted. Canon 1334 of the Eastern code specifies the following:

> The poor, that is, those who are totally unable to pay the court costs, have the right to gratuitous legal assistance; those who can pay only part of the court costs, to a diminution of expenses.

While the Latin code, unfortunately, has no parallel explicit proclamation of this right, the right to legal assistance nonetheless exists, is recognized implicitly, and must be respected.

Recourse against Court Fees

§2. There is no separate appeal from the determination of expenses, fees, and recovery of damages, but the party can make recourse within fifteen days to the same judge who can adjust the assessment.

There is no distinct appeal to a tribunal of higher grade concerning the provisions of a sentence regarding the apportionment of expenses. Within fifteen days of the notification of the fees,[317] how-

[314] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 1005; Ryan, in CLSGBI Com, 924; Diego-Lora, in Pamplona ComEng, 1019–1020; Acebal, in Salamanca Com, 801–802; Arroba Conde, in Valencia Com, 712–713; E. de León, in Com Ex IV/2, 1739–1744.

[315] CCEO 1335 is worded slightly differently, noting that the "statutes of the tribunal" are to provide norms for this purpose. This wording is more precise, since interdiocesan tribunals may not be subject to a specific bishop.

[316] Particular law should also make a determination concerning the payment of the fees associated with appeal of cases to the Roman Rota. According to the current policy for the United States, a stipend of between $750 and $850 is to be forwarded to the Rota with an appeal (RRAO 1994, 26). The Rota does not determine whether only one or both of the parties are responsible for this stipend, permitting the local tribunal to implement the norm provided that policy would "in no way compromise the right of appeal of one of the partners to the Apostolic Tribunal" (RRAO 1998, 31–32).

[317] The translation used in CLSGBI Com and Pamplona ComEng incorrectly states that the time limit is ten days. The Latin is quindecim dies, fifteen days.

ever, a party who is aggrieved at the provisions for expenses may have recourse to the judge who issued the sentence. That judge is free to modify the amount.

If a party lodges an appeal against the judgment as a whole, may that appeal include a complaint about the determination regarding expenses contained in the sentence? Certainly nothing can prevent a party from raising that issue. The court of appeals, however, does not have jurisdiction over the internal administration of the tribunals it oversees. The appellate court cannot legitimately usurp the role of the bishop as moderator of his tribunal. Thus, in response to a complaint about provisions for expenses, the court of appeals would probably be able to act only if it found evidence that the original tribunal violated its own policies concerning expenses.

TITLE XI
THE EXECUTION OF THE SENTENCE[318]
[cc. 1650–1655]

Lawrence Wrenn defines the execution of a sentence as that "judicial act by which the vindicated party in the trial is actually provided what was awarded in the sentence."[319] The canons of this title establish when a sentence may be executed, who is responsible for the execution, and how a sentence is executed. They also provide norms governing the role of the executor.

Execution of a Sentence That Has Become Res Iudicata

Canon 1650 — §1. A sentence that has become a res iudicata can be executed, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1647.

A sentence that has become res iudicata can be executed. The judge may issue the decree of execution ex officio or may do so in response to the request of a party to the case.

If, however, a petition for restitutio in integrum has been filed, that petition has suspensive effect and the judge is not to begin[320] the execution of the sentence unless a specific decree has been issued permitting the execution despite the petition for restitutio.[321]

Execution of a Sentence That Is Not Res Iudicata

§2. The judge who rendered the sentence and, if an appeal has been proposed, also the appellate judge can order ex officio or at the request of a party a provisional execution of a sentence which has not yet become res iudicata, after having set suitable guarantees, if the case warrants, for provisions or payments ordered for necessary support; they can also do so if some other just cause urges it.

If a judgment has been reached that is not res iudicata, that judgment may nonetheless be accorded a provisional execution. For example, a decision may have been reached in one instance only. Since there are not two concordant decisions, that sentence has not attained the status of res iudicata. Yet, if the law does not mandate a review of the matter at issue and if the parties are satisfied with the judgment and will not challenge it, the case is effectively settled and the judgment may be executed. Or, if the matter has been appealed and the appellate tribunal nonetheless deems that a provisional execution is warranted, it may issue a decree executing the sentence.

The judge who rendered the sentence is the one with authority to issue the decree executing

[318] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 1005–1006; Ryan, in CLSGBI Com, 924–927; Diego-Lora, in Pamplona ComEng, 1020–1024; Acebal, in Salamanca Com, 802–804; Arroba Conde, in Valencia Com, 713–715; de León, in Com Ex IV/2, 1745–1757.

[319] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 1005.

[320] If the process of executing the sentence has already begun, the judge is not obliged to halt the process. And if the execution of the sentence was already completed, the judge is not to rescind the execution.

[321] See the commentary on c. 1647, §2.

the judgment. If an appeal was filed, the appellate judge likewise has the authority to order the provisional execution of the sentence. When the case involves the provision of basic sustenance to a person, the decree of execution must provide sufficient guarantees of support during the period of provisional execution. In like manner, a judge may include similar guarantees protecting a party's needs or rights if some other just cause warrants.

Suspending the Execution or Requiring Safeguards

§3. If the sentence mentioned in §2 is challenged, the judge who must investigate the challenge can suspend the execution or subject it to a guarantee if the judge sees that the challenge is probably well founded and irreparable damage can arise from execution.

This paragraph concerns a case in which a judicial sentence

1. has not become res iudicata and
2. has been challenged either by appeal (cc. 1628–1640) or by a complaint of nullity of sentence (cc. 1619–1627) and a decree of provisional execution of the judgment already has been issued.

Before being able to rule definitively, the judge responsible for considering the challenge may realize that the challenge is solidly founded and that irreparable harm may result from the execution of the sentence. In these circumstances, the judge has the authority either to suspend the execution of the sentence or to incorporate appropriate safeguards into that execution to prevent the potential damage.

The Executory Decree

Canon 1651 — Execution cannot occur prior to the executory decree of the judge which declares that the sentence must be executed. This decree is to be included in the text of the sentence or issued separately according to the particular nature of the cases.

The execution of the judgment requires a judicial decree of execution. This decree should not only order the execution but also specify the means to be used in executing the judgment.

Depending on the nature of the case, the decree of execution may be issued as a separate document or incorporated into the text of the sentence itself. For example, in a marriage nullity case there can be no decree of execution for an affirmative sentence issued in first instance, since two concordant decisions are required to establish freedom to marry. The conforming sentence or decree of ratification of that sentence in second instance, on the other hand, should incorporate a decree of execution.

Rendering of Accounts as an Incidental Case

Canon 1652 — If the execution of a sentence requires a prior rendering of accounts, it is an incidental question which the same judge who rendered the sentence ordering the execution must decide.

This canon governs trials involving disputes over property. In some circumstances, such a judgment may be executed without an exact rendering of accounts. In other circumstances, the nature of the judgment may require a full accounting before it can be properly executed. In these situations, the judge who rendered the decision is to arrange for that accounting according to the norms for incidental cases (cc. 1587–1591). Since the law itself proposes this particular incidental case, the provision of canon 1588 requiring a petition from one of the parties is unnecessary.

The Execution Proper

Canon 1653 — §1. Unless particular law establishes otherwise, the bishop of the diocese in which the sentence was rendered in the first grade must execute the sentence personally or through another.

The law distinguishes between the specifically judicial acts of rendering a sentence (cc. 1610–1613) and issuing a decree of execution (c. 1651), and the actual execution of those judicial acts, which is understood as an administrative act.[322]

Unless particular law provides otherwise, the diocesan bishop[323] of the tribunal where the first instance judgment was rendered is responsible for the execution of the sentence. The execution may be handled personally or through a delegate, who is to fulfill that responsibility in accord with the canons of this title.[324]

Particular law is given a strictly limited role in the Church's procedural law. The latitude provided for particular law to establish norms for executing sentences reflects the realization that, to be effective, such an execution must take into account the unique cultural, educational, and linguistic backgrounds of the persons involved. Whether designated by particular law or delegated by the diocesan bishop, in practice the judicial vicar is frequently entrusted with the responsibility of executing sentences. The bishop, however, may entrust that responsibility to any other qualified person, cleric or lay.[325]

Remedying a Failure to Execute a Sentence

§2. If he refuses or neglects to do this, the execution of the sentence, either at the request of an interested party or even ex officio, pertains to the authority to whom the appellate tribunal is subject according to the norm of can. 1439, §3.

Failure to execute a sentence, except under the circumstances provided in canon 1654, §2, creates a serious injustice, since it prevents the judgment from coming into full force. Thus, if the diocesan bishop fails to see to the execution of the sentence originally issued by his court, the responsibility devolves on the ecclesiastical authority who oversees the appellate tribunal to which that first instance tribunal is subject.[326] That authority might be the archbishop of the metropolitan tribunal (c. 1438, 1°), the diocesan bishop of a tribunal designated as the court of second instance by the Apostolic See (c. 1438, 2°), or the episcopal moderator or governing bishops of an interdiocesan or national second instance tribunal (c. 1439, §3).

This authority may intervene and execute the sentence ex officio or, more likely, at the request of one of the parties aggrieved by the fact that it has not been executed.

Execution of Sentences of Religious Tribunals

§3. Among religious the execution of the sentence pertains to the superior who rendered the sentence to be executed or the superior who delegated the judge.

When the trial was conducted before a religious tribunal, the authority responsible to execute the sentence is the major superior who personally judged the case or who delegated the judge who tried the case.[327] Should the one re-[322] de León, in Com Ex IV/2, 1746, 1754; Diego-Lora, in Pamplona ComEng, 1022.

[323] Since the term "diocesan bishop" is employed, local ordinaries such as a vicar general or episcopal vicar do not have the authority to execute a sentence without a special mandate to do so (c. 134, §3).

[324] Since the execution of a judicial act is an administrative function, the norms of cc. 40–45 are also applicable and may help executors resolve doubts about the correct means of fulfilling their functions.

[325] Wrenn indicates that only by exception should the judge act as executor (CLSA Com, 1006). His understandable concern seems to be emphasizing the distinction between judicial and administrative authority. Nothing in the law, however, prevents the bishop from entrusting this responsibility to judges who, in this situation, would be exercising delegated administrative power rather than distinctly judicial authority.

[326] The canon is poorly drafted, since it evidently should have referred to both cc. 1438 and 1439. The Eastern code is clearer (CCEO 1340, §2).

[327] See the commentary on c. 1427 which specifies the proper judge for various types of disputes involving reli-sponsible to execute the sentence fail to do so (similar to the problem envisioned in c. 1653, §2), recourse would be taken to the appropriate superior as specified in the constitutions of the particular institute or society.

Role of the Executor

Canon 1654 — §1. Unless the text of the sentence leaves it to the judgment of the executor, the executor must execute the sentence according to the obvious sense of the words.

§2. The executor is permitted to deal with exceptions concerning the manner and force of the execution but not concerning the merit of the case. If it is discovered from another source that the sentence is null or manifestly unjust according to the norm of cann. 1620, 1622, and 1645, the executor is to refrain from executing it and, after having informed the parties, is to refer the matter to the tribunal which rendered the sentence.

Unless something is expressly left to the executor's discretion in the sentence or decree of execution, the executor must execute the judgment "according to the obvious sense of the words." Should there be any doubt, the executor should seek clarification from the one who issued the judgment.

The executor is not merely a robot, however, and enjoys some latitude as provided in the law. If an exception is raised concerning the manner and force of the execution, the executor may deal with that on his or her own authority. The executor may not, however, deal with any exception concerning the merits of the case, a matter which is the exclusive province of the tribunal.

Finally, an executor is bound not to execute the judgment if he or she encounters convincing evidence either:

(1) that the judgment is null (cc. 1620, 1622), and hence able to be challenged by a complaint of nullity of sentence; or

(2) that the judgment is manifestly unjust for one of the reasons specified in canon 1645, §2, and hence open to a petition for restitutio in integrum.

In this situation, the executor is to inform the parties of his or her inability to execute the judgment and then immediately refer the matter and any new information discovered to the tribunal that rendered the decision.

Time for Fulfillment of Obligations

Canon 1655 — §1. In real actions, whenever the petitioner is awarded something, it must be handed over to the petitioner as soon as there is a res iudicata.

§2. In personal actions, when the guilty party is condemned to furnish a movable thing, to pay money, or to give or do something else, the judge in the text of the sentence or the executor according to his or her judgment and prudence is to establish a time limit to fulfill the obligation; this time limit, however, is not to be less than fifteen days nor more than six months.

Normally, upon execution of a sentence, its provisions take immediate effect. This canon contains norms for establishing reasonable time limits to fulfill the obligations required by certain types of judgments.

Paragraph one refers to trials where the central issue involved real actions, that is, disputes about the ownership of property whether movable or immovable. When the tribunal's judgment determined that the property belongs to the plaintiff, the execution of the sentence should provide for the immediate transfer of the disputed property. This reflects the fact that, since the communication of the citation, the matter in dispute had ceased to be a res integra (see the commentary on c. 1512). Thus, since the possessor had been on notice that the property was under dispute and subject to the court's judgment, he or she cannot claim a need for further time to transfer possession to the plaintiff.

gious, whether individuals, houses, provinces, or juridic persons.

Paragraph two governs trials where the central issue involved personal actions, that is, disputes over the rights and obligations of persons. When the tribunal's resolution of the dispute includes the requirement to hand over some object, pay monetary compensation, or perform some other action to make restitution to the injured party (e.g., a public retraction or apology), the executor may establish a time limit within which the obligation must be fulfilled. Depending on the nature of the obligation and the arrangements required to fulfill it, the executor is to establish an appropriate time limit ranging from fifteen days to six months.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bibliographical material for canons 1501–1655 can be found after the commentary on canon 1691.

SECTION II
THE ORAL CONTENTIOUS PROCESS
[cc. 1656–1670][1]

Origin of the Process

A frequent complaint about the procedural law governing contentious trials in the 1917 code was that it was encumbered with unnecessary and outdated procedural formalities that inevitably resulted in long, protracted trials. Thus, early in its deliberations, the coetus of the code revision committee responsible for procedural law formulated a proposal for a streamlined judicial process. This initiative was eventually promulgated as the oral contentious process.

Although the oral contentious process is one of the procedural innovations of the revised code, it has historical precedents. In part, the oral contentious process was inspired by the summary procedure introduced by Clement V (1305–1314) in his decretal Saepe, which became, in practice at least, the normal form of canonical procedure until the promulgation of the 1917 code.[2] In part, the new process was modeled on the "contentious trial before a single judge" in the procedural law promulgated in 1950 by Pius XII for the Eastern churches[3] and a similar process in the Code of Civil Procedure for the Vatican City State.[4] In addition to these canonical antecedents, the elaboration of the oral contentious process was also deeply influenced by trends in continental European legal scholarship that emphasize the values of oral testimony and discussion, direct personal interchanges between the parties and the judge, public trials, and the expeditious resolution of cases.[5]

Cases for Which the Oral Process Can Be Used

Canon 1656 — §1. All cases not excluded by law can be treated in the oral contentious process mentioned in this section unless a party requests the ordinary contentious process.

§2. If the oral process is used outside of the cases permitted in law, the judicial acts are null.

Despite the apparent openness to the use of the oral contentious process in paragraph one, its use is expressly prohibited for marriage cases (c. 1690), penal cases (c. 1728, §1), and cases involving the validity of ordination (c. 1710). Its use is allowed for cases involving the separation of spouses (c. 1693, §1), complaints of nullity against a sentence even in marriage and penal cases (c. 1627), resolution of incidental cases by interlocutory sentences (c. 1590, §1), and questions about the right to appeal (c. 1631). Even when the law does not preclude the use of the oral process, either party or, in cases where their intervention is required, the defender of the bond or promoter of justice can petition that the ordinary process be employed, and the judge must honor this request. However, there are two exceptions to this rule: the judge rather than the parties has discretion to use the oral process or not for the resolution of incidental cases, and the use of the oral process to resolve disputes concerning the right of appeal is mandatory.

If the oral contentious process is used in cases not permitted by law, all subsequent judicial acts are null. This nullity results both when the oral

[1] CCEO 1343–1356 treat this institute as "The Summary Contentious Process" in chapter 2 of title XXV: "The Contentious Trial."

[2] In Clem. V, 11, 2.

[3] Pius XII, mp Sollicitudinem nostram, June 6, 1950, cc. 453–467, AAS 42 (1950) 98–99.

[4] A. Stankiewicz, "Il processo contenzioso orale," Apol 64 (1992) 570.

[5] L. Madero, "El proceso contencioso oral," IC 24 (1984) 219–265.

process is used for cases expressly excluded by law and when the judge ignores a party's request that the ordinary process be employed.

Single Judge

Canon 1657 — The oral contentious process takes place in the first grade before a single judge according to the norm of can. 1424.

A single judge is the norm for this process at first instance. However, the use of two assessors is recommended (c. 1424). Since the oral process is designed to allow direct contact between the judge and the parties and witnesses, no mention is made of the use of an auditor. When a case has been resolved by a single judge at first instance, the appellate court normally consists of a single judge as well (c. 1441). A collegiate tribunal is necessary at any grade of trial for the judicial resolution of incidental cases when the principal case has been entrusted to a college (c. 1590, §1) and for the resolution of complaints of nullity when the impugned sentence has been issued by a college (c. 1624). The Roman Rota always proceeds collegially regardless of the process used.[6]

The Petition

Canon 1658 — §1. In addition to the things enumerated in can. 1504, the libellus which introduces the litigation must:

1° set forth briefly, completely, and clearly the facts on which the requests of the petitioner are based;

2° indicate the proofs by which the petitioner intends to demonstrate the facts but which cannot be presented at once, in such a way that the judge can collect them immediately.

§2. The documents on which the petition is based must be attached to the libellus, at least in an authentic copy.

Since a trial according to the oral process is brief, the petition initiating this process must be more complete than that for the ordinary process. In addition to the items mentioned in canon 1504, the petition must contain a thorough narration of the facts on which the case is based, a complete listing of the proofs on which the petitioner intends to rely, and any relevant documents in the petitioner's possession. The indication that the judge is to proceed to collect proofs immediately (statim) suggests that he begins to collect proofs even before the hearing. These proofs are primarily documents, but they may include the testimony of witnesses who can be heard only by rogatory commission (see. c. 1418) or through a written affidavit.

Citation

Canon 1659 — §1. If the attempt at reconciliation according to the norm of can. 1446, §2 proved useless and the judge thinks that the libellus has some foundation, the judge is to order within three days by a decree appended to the bottom of the libellus that a copy of the petition be communicated to the respondent, giving to the latter the opportunity to send a written response to the tribunal chancery within fifteen days.

§2. This notification has the effect of the judicial citation mentioned in can. 1512.

Once a petition has been received, a tribunal is constituted. The judge's first responsibility is to ascertain whether an out-of-court settlement is possible. If efforts at conciliation prove fruitless, the judge is to determine within three days whether the petition should be accepted. The accepted petition along with proposed proofs and attached documents is then communicated to the other party. Appended to the petition is a judicial decree offering the other party an opportunity to respond in writing to the issues raised in the petition within fifteen useful days. This response should be as thorough as the original petition and should include a listing of all proofs the party intends to propose and all relevant documents in the respondent's possession. In fact, the judge's decree may request that the respondent produce documents mentioned by, but unavailable to, the petitioner. The response should also include any exceptions the party intends to raise and, if the party wishes, a request that the dispute be resolved by the ordinary process. The judge's decree has the legal effect of a judicial citation.

[6] Stankiewicz, 583.

Rejoinder by the Petitioner

Canon 1660 — If the exceptions of the respondent demand it, the judge is to establish a time limit for the petitioner to respond, in such a way that from the points brought forth by both of the parties the judge clarifies the object of the controversy.

The respondent's reply to the citation may raise questions about the legal issues to be resolved in the dispute or, in the case of exceptions and countersuits, issues that were not dealt with in the petition. The judge may allow the petitioner a peremptory time period within which to reply to the respondent's rejoinder.

Joinder of Issues

Canon 1661 — §1. When the time limits mentioned in cann. 1659 and 1660 have elapsed, the judge, after an examination of the acts, is to determine the formula of the doubt. Next, the judge is to cite all those who must take part to a hearing which must be held within thirty days; the formula of the doubt is to be attached to the citation of the parties.

§2. In the citation the parties are to be informed that they can present a brief written statement to the tribunal to verify their claims at least three days before the hearing.

When the limits for replies have elapsed, the judge joins the issues ex officio on the basis of the submissions of the parties. There is no provision for recourse by the parties to seek a revision of the grounds (c. 1513, §3). Instead, in a decree summoning the parties to a hearing to be held within thirty days of the joining of the issues, the judge informs the parties of the grounds that have been set. If a party has not petitioned for the use of the ordinary contentious process by the time of the joinder of the issues, he or she is estopped from making such a petition subsequently.[7]

The judge also cites parties, witnesses, and experts to be present at the hearing. At the same time, the parties are to be informed that they may present a brief written statement of their positions. These written statements are to be submitted at least three days prior to the hearing. Although the code is silent on the issue, fairness seems to demand that these written statements be made available to the opposing parties before the hearing.

The Hearing

Canon 1662 — At the hearing the questions mentioned in cann. 1459–1464 are treated first.

Canon 1663 — §1. The proofs are collected at the hearing without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1418.

§2. A party and his or her advocate can be present at the examination of the other parties, the witnesses, and the experts.

The hearing is the centerpiece of the oral contentious process. The judge directs the hearing and the parties and their advocates have the right to be present for the whole session. After disposing of any exceptions or motions, the judge proceeds to collect the outstanding evidence. Since no opportunity is foreseen for re-examining witnesses once the hearing has concluded, the judge must strictly enforce the norm requiring that the party seeking to introduce a witness inform the judge in advance of the hearing of the issues about which the witness ought to be questioned (c. 1552, §2). The judge personally interrogates the parties, witnesses, and experts. The parties or their advocates can suggest additional questions to the judge and, at the discretion of the judge, the parties' advocates can be permitted to address questions directly to a party or witness (cc. 1561, 1670).

[7] Madero, 272.

The Role of the Notary

Canon 1664 — The notary must put into writing the responses of the parties, the witnesses, and the experts and the petitions and exceptions of the advocates, but in a summary fashion and only in those matters pertaining to the substance of the dispute; the deponents must sign these acts.

A notary must be present at the hearing to record the responses of the parties and witnesses to the judge's questions and any exceptions or petitions made by the advocates. The code does not, however, foresee the creation of a verbatim transcript of the hearing. Only a summary of the testimony relevant to the points in dispute needs be taken down. To determine the matters that ought to be recorded, the notary must have legal as well as stenographic skills. The notary's summaries must be reviewed and signed by the deponents.

Limits on New Evidence

Canon 1665 — The judge can admit proofs which are not brought forth or sought in the petition or response only according to the norm of can. 1452. After even one witness has been heard, however, the judge can only decide about new proofs according to the norm of can. 1600.

Evidence that was not presented or asked for in either the petition or the rejoinder of the respondent cannot be admitted at the hearing unless the judge believes that the failure to admit this evidence will result in an unjust decision. Once even a single witness has testified at the hearing, the judge can allow the admission of proofs not previously requested only under the conditions that would allow for the collection of new evidence after the conclusion of the case in the ordinary process.[8]

These rather severe restrictions on the freedom of the judge to admit evidence not mentioned in the petition and response of the parties are necessitated by the short time frame of the oral contentious process. All of the outstanding evidence is collected in one or, at most, two sessions. To admit evidence about which one or both parties had no prior notice leaves little time in which to prepare a defense or to unearth contrary evidence.

Conclusion of the Case and Oral Discussion

Canon 1666 — If all the proofs were not able to be collected during the hearing, a second hearing is to be scheduled.

Canon 1667 — When the proofs have been collected, the oral discussion takes place at the same hearing.

Unlike the ordinary contentious process, the oral process requires no formal decree publishing the acts of the case. Since the parties either had access to evidence prior to the hearing or assisted at its collection during the hearing, publication of the acts is superfluous. There is also no decree formally concluding the probatory phase of the trial. When all the evidence has been collected, the advocates are invited to discuss the case orally, perhaps after a brief recess.

The oral discussion requires of advocates skills different from those needed for the preparation of written briefs. It also requires that the judge have the skill to maintain courtroom decorum and prevent the discussion from degenerating into a shouting match while at the same time listening attentively to the substantive arguments being raised by the advocates. The notary is to take down a summary of the arguments made by the advocates to assist the judge in his deliberation.

[8] See the commentary on c. 1600.

Pronouncement of the Judge

Canon 1668 — §1. Unless the discussion reveals that something must be supplied in the instruction of the case or something else turns up which prevents a proper pronouncement of the sentence, at the completion of the hearing the judge in private is to decide the case immediately; the dispositive part of the sentence is to be read at once before the parties who are present.

§2. The tribunal can defer the decision up to the fifth useful day because of the difficulty of the matter or for some other just cause.

§3. The complete text of the sentence with the reasons expressed is to be communicated to the parties as soon as possible, ordinarily in not more than fifteen days.

Unless it becomes clear that additional evidence is needed, the judge is to decide the case at the end of oral discussion. He retires to consider the evidence and deliberate in private. The dispositive section of the decision is then read to the parties. If the difficulty of the issues prevents the judge from reaching a decision within a brief time after the conclusion of the hearing, the reading of the decision can be deferred for up to five days. The complete written text of the decision with reasons in law and in fact is to be communicated to the parties promptly, normally within fifteen days of the announcement of its dispositive section. The communication of the full text of the sentence to the parties is comparable to the publication of the sentence. Thus, it should be effected by one of the methods mentioned in canon 1615 and the peremptory period for lodging an appeal runs from the date of this notification.

Appellate Tribunal

Canon 1669 — If the appellate tribunal discovers that the oral contentious process was used at a lower grade of a trial in cases excluded by law, it is to declare the nullity of the sentence and remit the case to the tribunal which rendered the sentence.

In the case of an appeal, the appellate court is to declare the nullity of the sentence ex officio if it detects that the oral contentious process was employed to resolve a case for which the law expressly bars its use.

The nullity in this case is irremediable. Just as canon 1400, §2 removes controversies arising from acts of administrative power from the scope of the judicial process altogether and renders judges absolutely incompetent, so the various canons that expressly prohibit the use of the oral contentious process for certain types of cases withdraw these matters from the scope of the oral contentious process. Thus, the nullity of the sentence in these cases is irremediable because of the absolute incompetence of the judge (c. 1620, 1°).[9] After declaring the nullity of the sentence, the appellate tribunal remands the case to the lower tribunal for a new trial according to the ordinary contentious process.

Canon 1656, §1 distinguishes between "cases not excluded by law" for treatment according to the oral contentious process and cases in which one of the parties has requested the use of the ordinary contentious process. The repetition of the phrase "cases excluded by law" in canon 1669 suggests that the unlawful use of the oral contentious process results in the irremediable nullity of a sentence only when the law itself expressly bars the use of the oral process for particular types of cases, not when the oral process was employed despite a request of a party for the ordinary process. Only in the former case is the appellate tribunal authorized to declare the nullity of the sentence of the lower court ex officio.

Nevertheless, since the judge is bound to honor the request of a party for the ordinary process, use of the oral contentious process is not "permitted in law" when a party has made such a request (c. 1656, §2). Thus, failure to honor a party's request for the use of the ordinary process results in the nullity of all subsequent judicial acts (c. 1656, §2). Consequently, in a case affecting the public good, the failure to honor a party's request for the use of the ordinary process results in the remediable nullity of the sentence because the decision is based on null and as yet unsanated judicial acts (c. 1622, 5°). A party or, if he or she has intervened, the defender of the bond or promoter of justice can propose a complaint of nullity to the original judge within three months of the notification of the sentence (c. 1623) or join the complaint to an appeal of the sentence. In cases affecting only the private good, null judicial acts are sanated by the sentence unless a party denounced them to the judge prior to the sentence (c. 1619).[10]

[9] Stankiewicz, 581.

Derogation from Procedural Norms

Canon 1670 — In other matters pertaining to the manner of proceeding, the prescripts of the canons for the ordinary contentious trial are to be observed. In order to expedite matters without prejudice to justice, however, the tribunal, by a decree expressing the reasons for its decision, can derogate from procedural norms which have not been established for validity.

The canons dealing specifically with the oral contentious process are to be supplemented as needed by the norms for the ordinary process. However, the judge has discretion to derogate from procedural norms whose observance is not required for validity.[11] These derogations are to be in the form of written decrees that explain the reasons for the departure from ordinary procedure. This provision for derogations from procedural norms is itself an exception to the general principle that procedural laws are not subject to dispensation (c. 87, §1).

[10] Ibid., 580–581.

[11] In the order in which they come into play in a contentious trial, procedural norms whose observance is required for the validity of the process include: cc. 1507; 1433; 1478, §§2–4; 1437, §1; 1598; 1611; 1612, §§3–4; 1614; 1622, 2°–4°.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bibliographical material for canons 1656–1670 can be found after the commentary on canon 1691.

Part III
CERTAIN SPECIAL PROCESSES
[cc. 1671–1716]

Part three of Book VII provides supplementary norms governing processes where the unique nature of the cases requires adjustments to the basic procedures. Besides norms governing various marriage processes (cc. 1671–1707), this part also contains a title governing cases for declaring the nullity of sacred orders (cc. 1708–1712) and a title on methods of avoiding trial (cc. 1713–1716). The norms of the Eastern code are largely identical except for the chapter on methods of avoiding a trial.[1] [1] CCEO 1164–1184 develops methods of avoiding a trial with much greater precision and detail. The Eastern code treats these norms in the title on trials in general, just before the norms on the contentious trial.

CANONS AND COMMENTARY

TITLE I
MARRIAGE PROCESSES[2]
[cc. 1671–1707]

This title contains the norms governing marriage nullity cases (cc. 1671–1691), cases of the separation of spouses (cc. 1692–1696), the process for the dispensation of a ratum et non consummatum marriage (cc. 1697–1706), and the process to be employed in investigating the presumed death of a spouse (c. 1707).

CHAPTER I CASES TO DECLARE THE NULLITY OF MARRIAGE
[cc. 1671–1691]

Marriage nullity cases form the vast majority of ecclesiastical trials.[3] The procedures governing these cases are a means employed by the Church to serve its mission. In particular, the procedural law governing marriage nullity processes was designed to foster and to protect critically important values such as fidelity to truth, the protection of the rights and the spiritual welfare of persons, the Church's witness to the sacredness of marriage, canonical equity, and the Church's common good.[4] Thus, to avoid legalism or a pure juridical formalism, these procedures must always be understood and implemented in light of those foundational values.

The code structures marriage nullity procedures as a species of trials in general (cc. 1400–1500) and of the ordinary contentious process (cc. 1501–1655). This is specified in canon 1691, which

[2] For a brief history of the development of matrimonial procedures, see L. Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 1009–1011. For reflections primarily from the viewpoint of changes made in the current legislation governing matrimonial processes, see J. Llobell, in Com Ex IV/2, 1812–1828.

[3] In 1996 there were 60,677 formal marriage nullity cases introduced and 61,806 were closed. Of those closed, 49,512 received decisions in favor of nullity, 2,690 received negative decisions, and the remainder were perempted or renounced. Secretaria Status, Statistical Yearbook of the Church 1996 (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1998) 421 and 440.

[4] For a discussion of the purpose of marriage nullity processes and the values which the tribunal system strives to foster, see C. A. Cox, Procedural Changes in Formal Marriage Nullity Cases from the 1917 to the 1983 Code, CanLawStud 528 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1989) 299–345.

along with the other "general norms" for marriage nullity cases (cc. 1689–1690) might have been more appropriately placed in the first article at the beginning of this chapter rather than in the seventh and concluding article. All of the canons of this chapter, then, specify and adapt the overall trial procedure for marriage nullity cases.

During the code revision process, suggestions were made to revise more drastically the procedures for handling such cases. Some recommended completely abandoning a judicial approach in favor of some other model. Others recommended that a modified judicial approach be maintained, but that marriage cases not be treated using a "contentious" process. These recommendations for more thoroughly rethinking the process were not admitted.[5]

In his 1998 allocution to the Roman Rota, Pope John Paul II announced the creation of an interdicasterial commission "charged with drafting an instruction on the conduct of trials concerning marriage cases."[6] Presumably, this may be similar to the instruction Provida Mater Ecclesia issued subsequent to the promulgation of the 1917 code.[7] As of the spring of 1999, the interdicasterial commission has prepared an initial draft of such an instruction that is being circulated to episcopal conferences and other consultative groups for evaluation. There is no indication, however, when the proposed instruction might be forthcoming. If and when one is issued, the instruction's provisions would guide the interpretation and implementation of the current law (c. 34).

ARTICLE 1: THE COMPETENT FORUM[8] [cc. 1671–1673]

The Church's Fundamental Right to Judge

Canon 1671 — Marriage cases of the baptized belong to the ecclesiastical judge by proper right.

This proclamation of the Church's right to adjudicate marriage cases in which at least one of the spouses is baptized specifies the right to judge cases concerning spiritual matters or connected to spiritual matters claimed in canon 1401, 1°. In comparison to its counterpart in the 1917 code (CIC 1960), canon 1671 does not claim this as an "exclusive" right of the Church, although canon 1401 claims such exclusivity. In reality, ecclesiastical tribunals do not insist on exclusive jurisdiction and recognize certain rights of other churches and of civil society to rule on some aspects of marriage.[9]

Canon 1671 claims a right to treat marriage cases involving all validly baptized persons, not just those baptized in the Catholic Church or who have been received into full communion with it. This claim is rooted first in the Church's teaching on the nature of baptism, which incorporates a [5] It is beyond the scope of this commentary to delve further into this topic. For an in-depth review of various recommendations, see C. A. Cox, Procedural Changes, 108–204. For a brief discussion of unadopted proposals for changes within the context of the current system, see idem, "The Procedural Law That Might Have Been: Some Proposed Changes That Were Not Adopted during the Code Revision Process," J 50 (1990) 613–642. Since the promulgation of the code, there has been little formal discussion of the question of alternatives, since canonists have rightly focused on implementing the current legislation. Yet, interest in alternative approaches remains. For example, see the brief comments coram Burke, May 22, 1997, Stud Can 32 (1998) 516–517, and F. G. Morrisey, "Decimo anno...On the Tenth Anniversary of the Code of Canon Law," Stud Can 28 (1994) 120.

[6] John Paul II, alloc, January 17, 1998, AAS 90 (1998) 784. Translated in Origins 27 (February 27, 1998) 585.

[7] SCSacr, instr Provida Mater Ecclesia, August 15, 1936, AAS 28 (1936) 313–361. Translated in CLD 2, 471–530.

[8] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 1011–1012; D. Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 932–934; L. Madero, in Pamplona ComEng, 1030–1032; J. L. Acebal, in Salamanca Com, 809–811; J. Martínez Valls, in Valencia Com, 720–721; Llobell, in Com Ex IV/2, 1829–1848.

[9] For example, the Church respects the regulations of the Orthodox and other ancient Christian churches of the East regarding impediments and the requirement of the priestly blessing (sacred rite) to enter marriage (see CCEO 780, §2 and 781). Ecclesiastical tribunals also respect the determinations of civil authority concerning the civil effects of marriage even for baptized Catholics (see cc. 1059, 1672 and CCEO 780, §1; 1358).

person into the Church of Christ (see c. 96) even if that person is not in full communion with the Catholic Church.[10] Furthermore, the Church teaches that the valid marriage of two baptized persons is a sacrament (see c. 1055), and without doubt that sacramental dignity is a "spiritual matter" as understood in canon 1401, 1°.

Since canon 1671 asserts the Church's right to adjudicate concerning the nullity of marriages in which one or both of the spouses was baptized, what of marriages in which neither party was baptized? Does the Church have any claim to judge their status? Normally, the Church leaves judgments concerning the marriages of persons who are not baptized to civil authority, provided the civil authority respects the divine and natural law. The Church claims jurisdiction to deal with such cases not by proper right over the union itself, but indirectly. The Church has the right and duty to serve those who seek its ministry. Accordingly, the Church respects the right of non-baptized persons seeking to be baptized in the Church or non-baptized persons hoping to marry a Catholic to seek a ruling regarding their marital status (see cc. 1476 and 1674).[11]

Finally, although this canon is situated within the context of marriage nullity cases, the right claimed here also is understood to include the right to judge in ratum et non consummatum dissolution cases (cc. 1697–1706) and privilege-of-the-faith cases (cc. 1141–1150 and norms for papal dissolutions in favor of the faith[12]).

[10] Merely ecclesiastical laws normally bind only those baptized or received into the Catholic Church. Here we have, however, an express provision to the contrary (see c. 11).

[11] See the summary of a Signatura response to a non-Catholic respondent concerning the Church's right to judge the marriages of non-Catholics in RRAO 1997, 25–26. Also see J. L. Acebal Luján, "La declaración de nulidad del matrimonio de dos acatólicos: Texto y comentario," REDC 49 (1992) 691–697.

[12] CDF, instr Ut notum est, December 6, 1973, in Leges Ecclesiae post Codicem iuris canonici editae, ed. X. Ochoa, vol. 5 (Rome: Commentarium pro Religiosis, 1980) #4244, cols. 6702–6705. Translated in CLD 8, 1177–1184. See also the commentary on c. 1150.

Competence Regarding the Civil Effects of Marriage

Canon 1672 — Cases concerning the merely civil effects of marriage belong to the civil magistrate unless particular law establishes that an ecclesiastical judge can investigate and decide these cases if they are done in an incidental or accessory manner.

This canon recognizes the right and duty of civil authorities to regulate the merely civil effects of marriage dealing with issues such as custody, alimony and child support, inheritance and other property issues, the restoration of the legal use of a maiden name, etc.

When particular ecclesiastical law makes appropriate provision, a judge handling a petition for marriage nullity may also decide such issues but only as incidental matters. A tribunal is not to accept a suit in which the civil effects of marriage are the principal issue. This provision primarily relates to tribunals in regions where particular law established in concordats between the Holy See and various countries (see c. 3) gives ecclesiastical tribunals sufficient civil standing to decide such questions in a way that will be honored by the civil authorities.

Identifying the Competent Ecclesiastical Court

Canon 1673 — In cases concerning the nullity of marriage which are not reserved to the Apostolic See, the following are competent:

1° the tribunal of the place in which the marriage was celebrated;

2° the tribunal of the place in which the respondent has a domicile or quasi-domicile;

3° the tribunal of the place in which the petitioner has a domicile, provided that both parties live in the territory of the same conference of bishops and the judicial vicar of the domicile of the respondent gives consent after he has heard the respondent;

4° the tribunal of the place in which in fact most of the proofs must be collected, provided that consent is given by the judicial vicar of the domicile of the respondent, who is first to ask if the respondent has any exception to make.

The general norms governing the legal competence or jurisdiction for a tribunal to adjudicate a petition are found in canons 1404–1414. Canon 1673 contains special provisions that apply to marriage nullity cases only.[13]

Cases reserved to the pope are enumerated in canon 1405, §1. Of these, only two numbers might apply to persons in marriage nullity cases: (1) unions involving heads of state (c. 1405, §1, 1°) or (2) unions involving persons in which the pope has specially reserved judgment to himself (c. 1405, §1, 4°).

Of the four bases of competence in marriage nullity cases, the first two have no conditions attached to them. The other two can be employed only when certain conditions are fulfilled. There is, however, no hierarchy of claims requiring the choice of one tribunal over the others. Thus, a prospective petitioner has the right to approach a tribunal under any of the four titles of competence. Of course, all four titles of competence may possibly be located in the same place; in this situation, only one tribunal is available to a petitioner.

Additionally, in assessing whether a particular tribunal is competent, the ritual church sui iuris within which the parties are inscribed must also be taken into account. For example, even if the marriage was celebrated within its boundaries, the tribunal of a Latin diocese is not competent to treat the marriage case of two Eastern Catholics.[14]

[13] For a discussion of the major changes in the norms governing competence in marriage nullity trials and the rationale for those changes, see Cox, Procedural Changes, 14–28.

[14] The complex possibilities for court competence may be confusing. For a very helpful analysis, see J. H. Provost, "Canon 1673: Competency of Tribunals of Latin and Eastern Churches," RRAO 1997, 91–97.

Place of Contract (1°)

The tribunal of the place where the marriage was celebrated is competent to accept a petition in marriage nullity cases. If the union in question is the convalidation[15] of a previous exchange of consent without canonical form, the place of contract is the tribunal where the convalidation was celebrated (not the tribunal of the prior ceremony).

Canon 1673, 1° applies the provisions of canon 1411, §1 on the forum of contract to marriage nullity cases. Unlike canon 1411, §1, however, the present canon does not permit the parties mutually to agree on some other tribunal.

Domicile or Quasi-Domicile of the Respondent (2°)

In canon law, traditionally the respondent's forum is privileged since the initiation of a suit places a burden on the respondent. This privilege is expressed in the ancient maxim actor sequitur forum partis conventae, the petitioner follows the forum of the respondent.[16] Thus, the tribunal of the place where the respondent has a domicile or quasi-domicile has unconditioned competence to accept a marriage nullity petition.

The terms "domicile" and "quasi-domicile" are defined in canon 102.[17] A respondent may have a domicile and a separate quasi-domicile. When this is verified, a prospective petitioner would have the right to approach the tribunal of either place.

[15] For a discussion of simple convalidation, see the commentary on cc. 1156–1160.

[16] See the commentary on c. 1407, §3 for further reflections on the history and rationale of this maxim. The privilege given to the forum of the respondent, however, does not prevent the petitioner from approaching another competent tribunal.

[17] Canon 104 provides for a common domicile for spouses. In marriage nullity cases, however, the parties are separated. Since domicile is lost by departure without the intent of returning (c. 106), it must be presumed that the separated spouses no longer have a common domicile or quasi-domicile.

Domicile of the Petitioner (3°)

The tribunal of the place in which a petitioner has a domicile[18] may be competent. Before the tribunal of the petitioner's domicile can admit a libellus, however, certain conditions must be verified. The conditions are introduced by the Latin term dummodo ("provided that"). In the canonical tradition, this term indicates that the conditions affect the validity of the act.[19] Two conditions apply:

> 1. The respondent must live within the territory of the same episcopal conference.[20] The boundaries of episcopal conferences may coincide with the boundaries of a particular nation, or they may include several different countries. For the United States, the territories of Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands, while part of the nation, are not part of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops.
>
> 2. The judicial vicar of the respondent's domicile must consent to the tribunal of the petitioner's domicile as the place for the trial "after he has heard the respondent" (ipsa audita).

This second condition raises a number of questions requiring careful consideration. Since those considerations apply to the similar condition regulating the "forum of proofs," they will be discussed below.

The Forum of Proofs (4°)

The tribunal of the place where, in fact, most of the proofs are to be collected may be competent, provided the judicial vicar of the respondent consents after first having asked the respondent if she or he has any exceptions to make. The wording used in 4° to describe the consultation with the respondent differs slightly from that of 3° in that it refers specifically to inquiring if the respondent has any exceptions to raise.[21] In practice, the purpose of hearing the respondent is broader than simply seeking out objections; rather, it is to assure that respondents will be able to participate fully and vindicate their rights in the process.

The use of this title of competence—unlike use of the domicile of the petitioner—does not require that the respondent live within the territory of the same conference of bishops.

By proofs must be understood all the types of proof discussed in canons 1526–1586 and 1679. Several factors help in determining whether a tribunal legitimately may claim to be the forum where most of the proofs must be collected. First, the proofs must be found in the diocese of that tribunal, not in the region or nation.[22] Second, the quality or weight of proofs rather than their numerical majority is crucial.[23] Often one witness with extensive knowledge may be able to offer far more important testimony than another five less knowledgeable witnesses combined. Furthermore, it is not only the witnesses and other proofs identified by the petitioner that must be taken into account, but also those identified by the respondent or ex officio by the judge.[24]

[18] See the commentary on c. 102. Unlike the case of the respondent described above, in this case only the tribunal of the petitioner's domicile, not of his or her quasi-domicile, has a claim to jurisdiction.

[19] Canon 39, while not speaking of laws themselves, explicitly applies this understanding to administrative acts. See J. Ochoa, "I titoli de competenza," in Il processo matrimoniale canonico, Studi Giuridici XXIX, ed. P. A. Bonnet and C. Gullo (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1994) 104.

[20] The Eastern code has a slightly different provision. CCEO 1359, 3° specifies that the respondent must reside within the "same nation."

[21] CCEO 1359, 3° and 4° eliminates this discrepancy and uses the same phrase (ea audita) in both numbers.

[22] ApSig, decl, April 27, 1989, AAS 81 (1989) 893. Translated in RRAO 1989, 46. F. Daneels briefly comments on the Signatura's declaration in "The 'Forum of Most of the Proofs,'" J 50 (1990) 289–309, which also contains a translation of the declaration.

[23] ApSig, decl, April 27, 1989, AAS 81 (1989) 893. Translated in RRAO 1989, 46.

[24] Ibid. Also see Z. Grocholewski, "Current Questions Concerning the State and Activity of Tribunals with Par-

The Required Consent of the Respondent's Judicial Vicar

The use of both the domicile of the petitioner and the forum of proofs requires the consent of the respondent's judicial vicar after he has consulted with the respondent. It is not correct to speak of the respondent's judicial vicar "granting competence." Rather, the vicar's consent fulfills a condition that allows a tribunal to declare itself competent in virtue of the law.

A number of important clarifications about this condition have been made in response to questions raised since the promulgation of the 1983 code. First, who is the judicial vicar involved when an interdiocesan tribunal handles marriage cases for the respondent's diocese? An authentic interpretation issued February 28, 1986 clarified that the judicial vicar concerned was that of the respondent's diocese of domicile, not the judicial vicar of the interdiocesan tribunal. If the diocese of the respondent's domicile has no judicial vicar, then the consent of the diocesan bishop is required.[25]

Second, the consent of the respondent's judicial vicar cannot be presumed after a time limit established by the tribunal seeking consent.[26] In the absence of a reply, the tribunal seeking consent may not proceed, but should again contact the respondent's judicial vicar to inquire about the delay.[27]

Third, the respondent's judicial vicar may seek additional information from the tribunal requesting consent in order to make the appropriate determination.[28] Similarly, a respondent may seek additional information in determining his or her stance with regard to the trial.[29]

Fourth, by what means may a judicial vicar "hear" the respondent? A general decree of the Apostolic Signatura dated May 6, 1993 declared that the practice of the petitioner's tribunal directly contacting and hearing the respondent "cannot be allowed." Rather, the respondent's own judicial vicar must contact the respondent.[30] The judicial vicar, however, may hear the respondent and express the consent through another, such as an adjutant judicial vicar or a delegate.[31]

Fifth, what does it mean for the judicial vicar to hear the respondent? For example, if the respondent makes no reply whatsoever, can the judicial vicar still give consent? Yes.[32] Provided there is certainty that the respondent received the invitation to comment, the judicial vicar has, in fact, heard the respondent.[33] In these circumstances, the purpose of this norm, assuring that respondents have the opportunity to voice their concerns, has been accomplished. Although the respondent's silence cannot be construed as agreement with the process, ticular Reference to the United States of America," in Incapacity for Marriage, ed. R. Sable (Rome: Pontificia Universitas Gregoriana, 1987) 243.

[25] CodCom, responsa, February 28, 1986, AAS 78 (1986) 1323. For a translation and brief discussion of the interpretation, see L. Wrenn, Authentic Interpretations on the 1983 Code (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1993) 23.

[26] ApSig, decl, April 27, 1989, AAS 81 (1989) 892. Translated in RRAO 1989, 45. While the Signatura's declaration spoke directly of the forum of proofs, a private reply clarified the fact that the requirement also applied to the forum of the petitioner. See RRAO 1989, 47–49.

[27] If the respondent's judicial vicar still does not reply, the petitioner's tribunal could seek a prorogation of competence from the Apostolic Signatura (see the discussion at the next heading of the commentary on this canon entitled "Other Sources of Tribunal Competence").

[28] ApSig, decl, April 27, 1989, AAS 81 (1989) 893. Also see RRAO 1996, 46–47.

[29] Daneels, "The 'Forum of Most of the Proofs,'" 296, n. 8.

[30] ApSig, decr, May 6, 1993, AAS 85 (1993) 969–970. Translated in RRAO 1995, 16–20. For the nature and force of general decrees, see the commentary on cc. 29 and 30. Also see J. L. Acebal Luján, "El fuero competente matrimonial, c. 1673, 3°: Texto y comentario," REDC 51 (1994) 185–189.

[31] While judicial power may not be delegated (c. 135, §3), the granting of consent is not a judicial but rather an administrative function. See ApSig, private reply, October 21, 1991, RRAO 1992, 44–46.

[32] Martínez Valls, in Valencia Com, 721, reaches the same conclusion.

[33] This is the wording of c. 1673, 3° (ipsa audita). Similarly, by giving the respondent the opportunity to make an exception, the judicial vicar has certainly fulfilled the requirement of c. 1673, 4° (qui prius ipsam interroget, num quid excipiendum habeat).

silence nonetheless is a response. In this situation, the judicial vicar should assess the meaning of the silence in light of the respondent's right of defense and may give the consent requested.[34]

Sixth, if the respondent raises objections, must the judicial vicar automatically deny his consent? No. A proposal to require the respondent's consent was raised during the code revision process,[35] but not incorporated. The law requires the consent of the judicial vicar, not that of the respondent. In determining whether to extend or deny consent, the judicial vicar is to give "due consideration" to the reasons for the respondent's opposition, weighing "carefully" the circumstances of the case and especially "the difficulties the respondent will encounter in defending himself before the other tribunal."[36] When, then, might the vicar extend consent in the face of the respondent's objections? For example, in hearing the respondent, the vicar may conclude that the objections being raised are unfounded, possibly even vindictive or dilatory. In these situations, the judicial vicar may give consent despite the respondent's objections, provided he is certain that the respondent may reasonably exercise his or her right of defense before the tribunal hearing the case.[37]

Finally, may competence be assumed on the basis of either the petitioner's domicile or the forum of proofs if the respondent's whereabouts is unknown? Canon 1673 does not address this situation.[38] At first glance, it would seem not, since the condition of obtaining the consent of the respondent's judicial vicar cannot be fulfilled. Many commentators, however, argue that these two titles of competence may be employed in such circumstances.[39] They reach this conclusion by applying both traditional canonical principles (e.g., the "rule of law" that no one is bound to the impossible[40]) and previous Signatura rulings in similar cases.[41] On the other hand, Joaquín Llobell, based on his reading of a 1989 Signatura declaration,[42] has misgivings about using these two titles of competence when the respondent's whereabouts is unknown. In support of Llobell's position is the fact that the Signatura's practice has not been consistent.[43] This author, however, holds that in these circumstances a tribunal may assume jurisdiction under either canon 1673, 3° or 4° provided that truly serious efforts are made to locate the respondent. Should a judge decree competence in these circumstances, the defender

[34] Canon 1531, §2, concerning the declarations of the parties in a trial, requires the judge to evaluate insofar as possible what can be deduced from a party's refusal to reply. If the respondent's silence indicated that he or she would not take part in the trial at all, to deny consent may well create undue burdens for the petitioner without any corresponding benefit to the respondent.

[35] The possibility was suggested at the March 28, 1979 meeting of the coetus on procedural law, Comm 11 (1979) 258.

[36] ApSig, decl, April 27, 1989, AAS 81 (1989) 893–894. Translated in RRAO 1989, 46–47.

[37] Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 933, suggests that in the face of a respondent's objections the judicial vicar "ought to withhold his consent, unless he judges the respondent's objection to be wholly unreasonable." Sometimes, however, respondents make it clear that they have no intention of presenting testimony or cooperating with the trial in any way. In these situations, even if a respondent has some reasonable objections, the judicial vicar would very responsibly grant consent given the respondent's professed intent to be absent from the trial.

[38] For cases other than marriage nullity, c. 1409, §2 provides for a trial in the forum of the plaintiff provided no other legitimate forum is available.

[39] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 1011–1012; Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 934; J. Ochoa, "I titoli di competenza," in P. A. Bonnet and C. Gullo, eds., Il processo matrimoniale, 168–170; J. H. Provost, "Canon 1673: Competent Tribunal When Respondent's Whereabouts Unknown," in CLSA Advisory Opinions 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan (Washington, D.C., 1995) 474–476; J. Hesch, "Canon 1673: Competent Tribunal When Respondent's Whereabouts Remain Unknown," RRAO 1994, 147–152.

[40] RI, n. 6, CorpusIC II, 1122.

[41] I. Gordon and Z. Grocholewski, eds., Documenta recentiora circa rem matrimonialem et processualem (Rome: Pontificia Universitas Gregoriana, 1977) 217–218. Translated in CLD 11, 350–351. Also see Daneels, "The 'Forum of Most of the Proofs,'" 305, n. 15.

[42] Llobell, in Com Ex IV/2, 1844–1845.

[43] See RRAO 1994, 54–59, where the Signatura prorogued competence rather than determining that the tribunal could proceed on the basis of canon 1673, 3°.

of the bond has the right to lodge an exception of incompetence. Such an exception is to be raised prior to the joinder of issues, and the judge's ruling in the matter is not subject to appeal although it may be challenged by means of a complaint of nullity (cc. 1459, §2 and 1460, §§2–3).

Other Sources of Tribunal Competence

There are two circumstances in which a tribunal that has no claim of competence under canon 1673 nonetheless may be given competence, either by the law itself or by a grant of the Apostolic Signatura.

Prorogation of Competence: The Apostolic Signatura has the authority to prorogue competence, i.e., grant competence to a tribunal that otherwise has no jurisdiction.[44] For example, a prospective petitioner who is a refugee from a place where the Church is persecuted may wish to introduce a libellus but be thwarted because the respondent remains in his or her native land and no functioning tribunals exist in the dioceses of the place of contract or the respondent's domicile. Or only one tribunal may be competent according to canon 1673, yet one party to the case is related to the diocesan bishop or an official of that tribunal. For this tribunal to adjudicate a petition may create the perception of favoritism, leaving the Church open to accusations of injustice. In these and similar situations, the Signatura may be asked to extend competence to another tribunal so that a prospective petitioner may vindicate his or her rights as assured by canon 221.[45] The Signatura requires a just cause to prorogue competence. In particular, it assesses whether well-founded reasons prevent the petitioner from approaching another legitimate forum and whether the respondent's rights can be guaranteed by the tribunal seeking the grant of competence.[46]

Competence of an Appellate Court Acting "as if in First Instance": Canon 1683 allows an appellate court treating a marriage nullity case to admit and judge a new ground "as if in first instance." In these circumstances, the appellate tribunal need not have a basis for competence under canon 1673. This is an example of competence by means of connection (c. 1414).

ARTICLE 2: THE RIGHT TO CHALLENGE A MARRIAGE[47] [cc. 1674–1675]

Canon 1674 — The following are qualified to challenge a marriage:

1° the spouses;

2° the promoter of justice when nullity has already become public, if the convalidation of the marriage is not possible or expedient.

The right to challenge the validity of marriage is clearly defined and strictly limited. Either spouse, whether baptized or not (see c. 1476), possesses an almost unqualified right to do so.[48] The norms of the 1917 code (CIC 1971) and subsequent legislation that limited the rights of non-Catholic spouses or those who caused the nullity or who incurred an ecclesiastical penalty have been suppressed. This modification is an example of the code's concern to respect human dignity and facilitate the vindication of rights.[49]

The promoter of justice, as the one bound to safeguard the public good (see c. 1430), may also [44] See canon 1445, §3, 2° and John Paul II, apconst Pastor bonus, June 28, 1988, art. 124, 3°, AAS 80 (1988) 892. Translated in Pamplona ComEng, 1239.

[45] For examples of the Signatura's practice in admitting or rejecting the prorogation of competence, see RRAO 1988, 21–24; RRAO 1989, 32–39; RRAO 1990, 35–41; RRAO 1991, 50–55; RRAO 1994, 50–54.

[46] Daneels, "The 'Forum of Most of the Proofs,'" 295–296.

[47] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 1012; Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 934–935; Madero, in Pamplona ComEng, 1032–1033; Acebal, in Salamanca Com, 811–812; Martínez Valls, in Valencia Com, 721–722; R. Rodríguez-Ocaña, in Com Ex IV/2, 1849–1881.

[48] The right to challenge a marriage is limited after the death of one or both of the spouses. See the commentary on c. 1675.

[49] This norm implements the rights expressed in cc. 221, §1 and 1476. For further reflections, see Cox, Procedural Changes, 54–61.

challenge the validity of marriage, but only under two narrow circumstances. First, the invalidity of the marriage must already have been made public. The Latin wording here, iam divulgata est, clearly indicates a matter that has, in fact, become public.[50] Second, either the union in question cannot be convalidated (e.g., the underlying impediment has not ceased and cannot be dispensed), or convalidating the union is not expedient (e.g., both parties have attempted new unions and have no interest in reconciliation).

No one else has the standing to impugn the validity of a marriage.

Petition for Marriage Nullity Subsequent to the Death of One or Both of the Spouses

Canon 1675 — §1. A marriage which was not accused while both spouses were living cannot be accused after the death of either one or both of the spouses unless the question of validity is prejudicial to the resolution of another controversy either in the canonical forum or in the civil forum.

After the death of one or both parties, the favor of the law (see c. 1060) which their marriage had always enjoyed is given a special firmness. Thus, if the validity of a union is not challenged while both parties are still living, it cannot be challenged after the death of one or both unless the question of the validity of the union is prejudicial to the resolution of some other ecclesiastical or civil legal controversy.[51]

The canon is forcefully articulated. While it says nothing concerning the exact nature of the other controversy, it sets a very high standard for a posthumous challenge of the validity of a marriage. Unless the question is directly linked to the decision in the other controversy in such a way that failure to address the question of nullity would impair the rights of another, the petition cannot be admitted.[52]

A traditional example involves a controversy over property or an inheritance that hinges on whether the parties were validly married. If the surviving spouse wishes to present a libellus in this situation, he or she may approach a competent tribunal. The judge would then need to assess whether the conditions of canon 1675, §1 are verified. If not, the judge is to reject the libellus on the ground that the surviving spouse "lacks legitimate personal standing" (c. 1505, §2, 2°).[53] If, on the other hand, a ruling on the validity of the marriage is necessary to resolve a trial involving third parties (e.g., children or heirs), the interested party would have to approach the promoter of justice and request that he or she impugn the marriage on the basis of canon 1674, 2°.

Death of a Spouse during a Case

§2. If a spouse dies while the case is pending, however, can. 1518 is to be observed.

If a spouse dies after a case has already been under way (i.e., after the legitimate communication of a citation according to c. 1512), canon 1518 is relevant. There are two possibilities.

First, the death occurs before the decree concluding the case (c. 1599, §3) has been issued. In this situation, the trial is suspended by the law itself (c. 1518, 1°). The action remains suspended unless the heir or successor of the deceased or some other interested party resumes the suit. For [50] This fact of publicity must be distinguished from something which is factually occult even if inherently public at law (i.e., able to be proven in the external forum). See c. 1074. Also see Rodríguez-Ocaña, in Com Ex IV/2, 1861–1862, who describes the evolution of the text as verifying that it focuses on actual public knowledge.

[51] Martínez Valls notes that this provision raises serious problems, since the declaration of nullity would not be sought for spiritual ends. He advises judges to be extremely cautious and admit such an action only when a decision about nullity is truly essential to resolving the other trial (Valencia Com, 722).

[52] See Rodríguez-Ocaña, in Com Ex IV/2, 1871 and 1873–1874.

[53] Recourse against this rejection would be possible (see c. 1505, §4).

example, subsequent to the death of a petitioner, the respondent may have an interest in clarifying his or her conscience, and may ask that the suit move forward for that purpose. Otherwise, in marriage nullity trials, it would be most unusual for an heir to wish to continue the process. An heir might wish to resume the suit in circumstances similar to those envisioned in the prior paragraph of this canon, namely, that the question of nullity was prejudicial to the resolution of some other matter.

Second, the death occurs only after the decree concluding the case (c. 1599, §3) was issued. In this situation, the case is to move forward to a decision after the duly mandated procurator (cc. 1481–1485) or heir of the deceased has been summoned.

ARTICLE 3: THE DUTY OF THE JUDGES[54] [cc. 1676–1677]

Canons 1676–1677 supplement or adapt to marriage nullity cases the many duties of judges described throughout Book VII.

Judge as Minister of Reconciliation

Canon 1676 — Before accepting a case and whenever there is hope of a favorable outcome, a judge is to use pastoral means to induce the spouses if possible to convalidate the marriage and restore conjugal living.

Due to the sacredness of marriage and its ecclesial and civil import, the Church is concerned to restore the common life of a broken union whenever possible. This is not a requirement to save a union "at any cost," but a recognition that pastoral efforts may help bring healing to relationships, especially in circumstances where people have separated hastily. Thus, before accepting a libellus and whenever there is hope of success, the judge is to use pastoral means to assist the parties to resolve their differences, restore common life, and, if needed, convalidate their marriage.[55] This is an application of the general principles of canon 1446 about avoiding lawsuits and seeking mutual resolution to controversies. Normally, when a petition reaches a tribunal, there is little or no reasonable hope of reconciliation. When such a hope exists, however, the judge should use pastoral means such as referral to counselors and spiritual directors to assist the parties to explore the possibility of saving their marriage.

Sometimes one party desires reconciliation, but the other is totally closed to the possibility and may even have attempted marriage with another. In these circumstances, having ascertained the attitudes of the parties, the judge is not authorized to hold the libellus in abeyance, since there is no real hope for a successful reconciliation. The judge must admit or reject the petition in accord with canon 1505.

Citation of the Respondent

Canon 1677 — §1. When the libellus has been accepted, the presiding judge or the ponens is to proceed to the communication of the decree of citation according to the norm of can. 1508.

This paragraph simply refers the judge to canon 1508 governing the manner of communicating a citation to a respondent.

One should note carefully the situation envisioned by canon 1508, §3. When there is a question as to whether a respondent enjoys the free exercise of his or her rights, the judge must determine whether the citation should be communicated to the legal guardian already appointed by civil authority, or whether the judge needs to appoint a guardian ad litem, i.e., a guardian for the marriage nullity process (cc. 1478–1479). Strictly speaking, this is not an incidental question (c. 1587), since by definition such questions arise only after the trial has formally begun through the citation of the parties. Nonetheless, the judge must examine carefully the question as to whether a guardian must be involved in the trial. Canon 1590 on incidental questions provides a parallel place (cc. 17, 19) suggesting the sort of procedure that would be appropriate. Certainly, consultation with the defender of the bond and the civil legal guardian, if one is available, will be necessary, as well as seeking appropriate evidence concerning the respondent's state of mind and capacity to stand personally at the trial. Finally, whatever the decision concerning the necessity of recognizing or appointing a guardian, the information discovered in dealing with this preliminary question may well be relevant to the central issue of the nullity trial (e.g., if the issue is later joined on a ground enunciated in canon 1095). Thus, any evidence unearthed at this time forms a part of the acts and proofs upon which moral certitude must be reached (c. 1608, §2).

[54] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 1012–1013; Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 935–937; Madero, in Pamplona ComEng, 1033–1034; Acebal, in Salamanca Com, 812–813; Martínez Valls, in Valencia Com, 722–723; A. Stankiewicz, in Com Ex IV/2, 1882–1888.

[55] Pope John Paul II, in his January 18, 1990 allocution to the Rota, stressed that this duty is not to be seen as a mere formality. AAS 82 (1990) 876. Translated in Woestman, Papal Allocutions, 212.

The Joinder of Issues

§2. When fifteen days have passed from the communication and unless either party has requested a session for the joinder of the issue, the presiding judge or the ponens is to establish the formula of the doubt or doubts within ten days by ex officio decree and is to notify the parties.

§3. The formula of the doubt not only is to ask whether the nullity of the marriage is established in the case but also must determine on what ground or grounds the validity of the marriage is to be challenged.

These paragraphs supplement the norms of canon 1513. The determination of the doubt remains the prerogative of the judge, who defines the question by means of a decree. This canon governing how that decree is issued is clearly designed to prevent undue delays at the outset of the trial.

First, the parties must be cited. Next, the judge allows fifteen days to pass, which provides an opportunity for the petitioner and respondent to present written comments or request a session for the joinder of the issues. If no such request is made, once the fifteen days have passed, the judge has ten more days within which to formulate the doubt (dubium) and notify the parties.

If one or both of the parties requests a session for the joinder of issues, the canon does not require the judge to convene a meeting. Normally, however, the judge would accede to the request and schedule a session to determine the issue as soon as reasonably possible. Judges may also convene the parties for a session to determine the issue, even if neither party has requested such a session (c. 1513, §2).

Finally, the formulation of the doubt must be specific rather than generic in nature. It must ask whether the nullity of the union has been proven on one or more specific grounds (e.g., "total simulation on the part of the petitioner" or "conditioned consent posited by the respondent"). Once joined, the issue may be amended or supplemented only in accord with canon 1514.

§4. Ten days after the communication of the decree, the presiding judge or the ponens is to arrange for the instruction of the case by a new decree if the parties have lodged no objection.

After having been notified of the formulation of the issue, the parties have ten days within which to lodge an objection. If no objection is lodged, the judge is to issue a decree ordering the instruction (i.e., evidence-gathering phase) of the case to begin.

If an objection to the formulation of the doubt is lodged, the judge is to deal with that objection in accord with canon 1513, §3. The judge's decision may not be appealed, since this matter is to be resolved as promptly as possible (expeditissime) (c. 1629, 5°).

Article 4: Proofs[56] [cc. 1678–1680]

Rights of the Defender, Advocates, and Promoter

Canon 1678 — §1. The defender of the bond, the legal representatives of the parties, and also the promoter of justice, if involved in the trial, have the following rights:

1° to be present at the examination of the parties, the witnesses, and the experts, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1559;

2° to inspect the judicial acts, even those not yet published, and to review the documents presented by the parties.

§2. The parties cannot be present at the examination mentioned in §1, n. 1.

This norm specifies two critical rights extended to certain important figures in the trial, and reflects the legislator's decision to provide for a substantial degree of parity between defenders of the bond and advocates.[57]

First, the defender, the advocates of the parties (not their procurators if a different person fills that role), and the promoter of justice have the right to be present at the examination of the parties, witnesses, and experts. This right, however, may be limited by the judge who may order that the examination of someone should be carried out in secret (c. 1559).[58] Being present, however, does not give these persons the right to pose questions to the party or witnesses. Canons 1533 and 1561 provide that the judge or auditor poses the questions. Unless particular law makes other provision, the defender, advocates, or promoter of justice may only propose questions to the judge or auditor, who determines whether the questions should be asked of the party or witness.

The defender, promoter of justice, and advocates also have the right to inspect the judicial acts,[59] even those not yet published, as well as to review any documents submitted as evidence (see the commentary on cc. 1544–1546).

There is an apparent conflict between the right of the defender, promoter, and advocates to review the acts and the judge's ability to decree that a given act be shown to no one (nemini). May an act that was exempted from publication in accord with canon 1598, §1 be withheld from the defender, the advocates, and the promoter of justice in a marriage nullity case? The canon uses the phrase etsi nondum publicata (even those not yet published) rather than etsi non publicata (even those not published). This implies that the acts would eventually be published, but that the defender, promoter, and advocates may have access to them prior to the decree of publication. This temporally oriented phrasing, coupled with the use of nemini in canon 1598, §1, seems to indicate that judges could claim an authority to withhold a given act even from the defender of the bond as well as from the advocates and promoter of justice. Yet, this conclusion is at odds with the canonical tradition which gave defenders access to all of the acts.[60] It would almost certainly motivate a defender to appeal any affirmative judgment that might be rendered. Furthermore, canon 1598, §1 permits judges to exempt an act from publication only to avoid most grave dangers. What danger, however, could be present [56] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 1013; Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 937–938; L. del Amo and J. Calvo, in Pamplona ComEng, 1035–1037; Acebal, in Salamanca Com, 813–814; Martínez Valls, in Valencia Com, 723–724; J. Carreras, in Com Ex IV/2, 1889–1899.

[57] Cox, Procedural Changes, 48–54.

[58] This is another example of the judicial discretion so frequently highlighted in the code. See the commentary on c. 1559 for the extent and limits of the judge's authority in this regard.

[59] At their meeting of March 29, 1979, the procedural law coetus changed the text from acta processus to acta iudicialia. Presumably, this was to clarify that all judicial acts, substantive and procedural, were intended. Comm 11 (1979) 263.

[60] See CIC 1969 and SCSacr, instr Provida Mater Ecclesia, art. 71, §1, AAS 28 (1936) 329. Translation in CLD 2, 490.

in allowing the defender of the bond and the promoter of justice to review all of the acts?[61] Similarly, if advocates are indeed of good repute and truly expert in the law (c. 1483), then there should be no danger giving them full access to the acts. This is all the more true since they can be bound to secrecy (c. 1455, §3) and are subject to disciplinary measures for violations of such secrecy (c. 1470, §2). Thus, quite apart from the theoretical question of whether they have the authority to do so, in marriage nullity cases judges should not withhold any acts from the defender of the bond, the promoter of justice, and the advocates of the parties.[62]

Canon 1678 does not specify when the right to inspect the acts may be exercised, although it implies that this may be done prior to the publication. It is most appropriate, however, to provide the defender, the promoter, and the advocates reasonable access to all the acts of the case throughout the course of the trial. This enables each better to perform his or her duties. Certainly, this must be done at the time of the official publication.

The parties themselves are not to be admitted to the examination of the other party or of the witnesses. This ensures the "complete freedom" of the other party, the witnesses, and the experts in presenting their testimony.[63] For trials in general, canon 1559 permits the judge to make an exception and admit the parties to the examination of witnesses, especially when the trial involves the private rather than the public good. In marriage nullity cases, however, the judge has no authority to do so.[64]

Proof through Use of Credibility Witnesses

Canon 1679 — Unless there are full proofs from elsewhere, in order to evaluate the depositions of the parties according to the norm of can. 1536, the judge, if possible, is to use witnesses to the credibility of those parties in addition to other indications and supporting factors.

Often only the parties themselves are aware of an underlying reality that may have vitiated their matrimonial consent. Sometimes, especially in cases involving simulation, only one party has such an awareness. Thus, proving marriage nullity is often very difficult, especially in light of the general principle governing proof in cases involving the public good.[65] That general principle states that "the force of full proof cannot be attributed" to the confessions[66] or other declarations of the parties "unless other elements are present which thoroughly corroborate them" (c. 1536, §2).[67]

Canon 1679 is an important innovation with no direct parallel in the 1917 code.[68] It specifically empowers the judge to make use of testimony

[61] Rodríguez-Ocaña, in Com Ex IV/2, 1486, notes that there is no danger that would require prohibiting a defender from examining all of the acts.

[62] A distinction could be made between the defender and promoter on the one hand (who are officers of the court), and the advocates on the other (who are advisors of the parties). Yet, one concern in the revision of the law was to provide much greater parity between the defender and the advocates in marriage nullity cases (see Cox, Procedural Changes, 48–54). Unless there were a reason to believe that a particular advocate could not be trusted, it does not seem appropriate to treat advocates differently from the defender in this regard.

[63] Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 937.

[64] See the coetus discussion of this restriction in Comm 11 (1979) 114 and 263.

[65] Marriage nullity cases always pertain to the public good (c. 1691).

[66] For a discussion of the nature of confessions, whether judicial or extrajudicial, see the commentary on cc. 1535–1537.

[67] This text itself reflects an important shift away from a formal attitude of suspicion toward the depositions of the parties. See the commentary on c. 1536. Also see Cox, Procedural Changes, 65–71, and P. Felici, "Formalitates iuridicae et aestimatio probationum in processu canonico," Comm 9 (1977) 175–184. Translation in J 38 (1978) 153–157.

[68] There is an indirect parallel in that credibility testimony was not only admitted but required in non-consummation cases. See SCSacr, Regulae servandae in processibus super matrimonio rato et non consummato, arts. 57–58 and 60–61, May 7, 1923, AAS 15 (1923) 404– 405. Translated in CLD 1, 780–781.

concerning the credibility of the parties as an element which may corroborate their declarations. In fact, if full proof from other sources is lacking, the judge must seek out credibility witnesses whenever possible. This source of corroboration is vitally important in the judge's mission to serve truth and justice. It enables tribunal decisions to fulfill one of the key principles guiding the revision of the code, that of precluding conflicts between the internal and external fora.[69] Conflicts between the fora occur when a marriage is truly invalid but sources of proof to establish the invalidity are severely limited. The use of credibility testimony can help bridge the gap so that mere procedural formalities do not prevent the Church from officially recognizing the underlying spiritual reality (internal forum) of the parties' marital status.

The Use of Experts

Canon 1680 — In cases of impotence or defect of consent because of mental illness, the judge is to use the services of one or more experts unless it is clear from the circumstances that it would be useless to do so; in other cases the prescript of can. 1574 is to be observed.

Canon 1574 requires the use of experts (periti) "in order to establish some fact or to discern the true nature of some matter." In any particular case, the judge may mandate that an expert's assessment is necessary. Canon 1574 also speaks of cases where the expert is required by "the prescript of a law."

Canon 1680 is an example of the latter. It requires the use of experts in marriage nullity cases involving the impediment of impotence (c. 1084) or defects of consent due to mental illness. There has been some discussion concerning the scope of the second of these requirements. What is meant by the phrase "defect of consent because of mental illness" (mentis morbum)? After briefly reviewing the evolution of canonical doctrine concerning amentia and other mental disorders, Mendonça concludes that the phrase "mental illness" as used in canon 1680 at least implicitly covers all of the psychic causes involved in the three parts of canon 1095.[70]

Canon 1680, however, contains an important exception. Experts are to be used "unless it is clear from the circumstances that it would be useless to do so." Like any exception to the law, this must be interpreted strictly (c. 18). How, then, is a judge to decide whether involving an expert would "be useless"? The presumption is that the services of an expert are necessary in cases involving impotence or mental illness; this presumption should not be overturned lightly.[71] When, however, the evidence has (1) certainly established the facts relevant to the ground at issue and (2) clarified the nature and meaning of those facts in light of jurisprudential issues such as antecedence and severity, then the involvement of experts is superfluous.[72] Since discovering the truth and ruling in accord with it are the purposes of the trial, the judge has the authority to proceed to a decision without involving an expert when the truth is manifestly evident.

Apart from impotence or defects of consent due to mental illness, in marriage cases psychic causes [69] ComCICRec, "Principia quae Codicis Iuris Canonici recognitionem dirigant," Comm 1 (1969) 79. Also see R. Cunningham, "The Principles Guiding the Revision of the Code of Canon Law," J 30 (1970) 448.

[70] A. Mendonça, "The Role of Experts," Stud Can 25 (1991) 420–424. A. McGrath agrees, in "At the Service of Truth: Psychological Sciences and Their Relation to the Canon Law of Nullity of Marriage," Stud Can 27 (1993) 381.

[71] L. Wrenn, in Procedures (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1987) 55, states: "When the defect of consent is caused by a mental disorder... then the law wants the court, as a general rule, to use the services of an expert." See the commentary on c. 1574 for further reflections on when it is necessary to use experts. M. Breitenbeck, in "The Use of Experts in Marriage Nullity Cases," CLSAP 51 (1989) 35, indicates that the judge's prerogative to waive the use of experts should not be used lightly, but the utilization of an expert should not be "treated as a pro forma canonical hoop through which judge, expert, and parties must jump in order to satisfy the requirements of law."

[72] McGrath, "At the Service of Truth," 395–398.

of various sorts may be relevant in grounds other than those listed in canon 1095. Also, judges may need to employ one or more experts from disciplines other than psychology in order to establish facts and clarify their meaning. For example, experts may help clarify whether the teachings of a particular religious tradition concerning the unity, indissolubility, or sacramental dignity of matrimony would likely create an error that would determine the will (c. 1099). Experts in handwriting or the authentication of documents may be employed to assess documentary evidence. When judges recognize their need for expert assistance, they are to proceed in accord with the provisions of canons 1575–1578.

Finally, the judge has the important duty of carefully assessing the value of expert reports, translating their findings into canonical conclusions.[73]

ARTICLE 5: THE SENTENCE AND THE APPEAL[74] [cc. 1681–1685]

Potential Transfer to a Non-consummation Case

Canon 1681 — Whenever, during the instruction of a case, a very probable doubt emerges that consummation of the marriage did not occur, after suspending the case of nullity with the consent of the parties, the tribunal can complete the instruction for a dispensation super rato and then transmit the acts to the Apostolic See together with a petition for a dispensation from either one or both of the spouses and the votum of the tribunal and the bishop.

During a marriage nullity trial, substantial evidence may arise that the union was never consummated. In these circumstances, the judicial nullity action may be suspended in favor of a petition for a dispensation from a ratified but non-consummated marriage.[75] This option is available only under the following conditions:

(1) evidence exists that the fact of non-consummation is strongly probable;
(2) one or both of the parties petitions for a dispensation from their non-consummated marriage;
(3) both parties consent to the significant procedural shift of suspending the marriage nullity trial in favor of the non-consummation process.

If these conditions are met, the tribunal which was handling the nullity case completes the instruction of the non-consummation case. This is an exception to the normal rule of canon 1699, §1, regarding competence for accepting a libellus and instructing a non-consummation case. The tribunal proceeds to instruct the case in accord with canons 1697–1706, forwarding the acts of the case to the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments.[76] The judge or panel of judges prepares its opinion (votum) and also arranges for the petitioner's diocesan bishop to submit his votum.

Finally, the decision to exercise the option of canon 1681 does not amount to a renunciation of the instance (cc. 1524–1525). The nullity trial is only suspended, not closed, and the norms regard-

[73] McGrath, in "At the Service of the Truth," reflects on some dangers inherent in the use of experts (384–389) and offers helpful guidelines for the evaluation of their reports (389–393). For further reflections on the judge's critical responsibility to assess the reports of periti, including a discussion of the pertinent allocutions of Pope John Paul II, see the commentary on c. 1579.

[74] Wrenn in CLSA Com, 1013–1015; Kelly in CLSGBI Com, 938–941; Madero in Pamplona ComEng, 1037–1040; Acebal, in Salamanca Com, 814–815; Martínez Valls in Valencia Com, 724–726; Diego-Lora in Com Ex IV/2, 1900–1945.

[75] CDWDS, littcirc De processu super rato, December 20, 1986, arts. 7 and 23b, ME 112 (1987) 425 and 427. Translated in Woestman, Special Marriage Cases, 122 and 125.

[76] John Paul II, apconst Pastor bonus, June 28, 1988, art. 67, AAS 80 (1988) 877. Translated in Pamplona ComEng, 1221.

ing abatement (cc. 1520–1523) would be applicable only after six months have passed. Thus, if the non-consummation cannot be proven or for any other reason the dispensation cannot be granted, the original trial may be resumed. The procedural acts already undertaken in that trial retain their force, and the tribunal need not retrace those steps.

Mandatory Review of First Affirmative Decisions

Canon 1682 — §1. The sentence which first declared the nullity of the marriage is to be transmitted ex officio to the appellate tribunal within twenty days from the publication of the sentence, together with the appeals, if there are any, and the other acts of the trial.

Canon 1986 of the 1917 code required defenders of the bond to appeal affirmative decisions in marriage nullity cases when those were issued by a tribunal of first instance or where, at higher instances, the judgment was the first affirmative decision issued in response to the petition. During the code revision process, this requirement was challenged and the institute was radically revised.[77]

It is no longer accurate to speak of a "mandatory appeal" in marriage nullity cases. Rather, quite apart from any appeal that may be lodged by the parties or the defender, canon 1682, §1 provides for a "mandatory review" of all sentences which first declare the nullity of marriage.[78]

Within twenty days of the publication of the sentence, the tribunal which issued the judgment must transmit ex officio to the appellate court the sentence, any appeals or other comments of the parties,[79] and all the substantive and procedural acts of the case.

[77] For a discussion of these challenges and the debate which led to the revisions, see Cox, Procedural Changes, 95–105.

[78] Comm 16 (1984) 75.

[79] It should be recalled that the parties have a peremptory time limit of fifteen canonical days within which to lodge an appeal (c. 1630, §1).

Confirmation of Prior Sentence or New Hearing

§2. If a sentence in favor of the nullity of a marriage was given in the first grade of a trial, the appellate tribunal is either to confirm the decision at once by decree or to admit the case to an ordinary examination in a new grade, after having weighed carefully the observations of the defender of the bond and those of the parties if there are any.

Whether a first affirmative sentence in a marriage nullity case is formally appealed or transmitted for an ex officio review, canon 1682, §2 specifies how such a sentence is to be handled. The appellate tribunal must first consider the observations of the parties, if any. It must also consider the animadversions of the appellate level's own defender of the bond. The tribunal then has two options.

(1) It may, without delay, confirm the original affirmative sentence by means of a decree.[80] Such a decree of confirmation must contain the signatures of all the judges.[81]

(2) Or, if the tribunal cannot confirm the sentence, it opens the case to an ordinary examination at the new grade of trial. It should be noted that the option of confirming a sentence by decree applies only to affirmative sentences; a negative decision that is appealed must be examined anew.[82]

[80] Such a decree of confirmation is not merely procedural in nature. Hence, it must contain a summary of the reasons motivating the decision or refer to those motives expressed in another act (cc. 1617 and 51). For samples of recent decrees of confirmation issued by the Rota, see coram Turnaturi, decr, November 15, 1994, SRRDec 86 (1994) 544–556; coram Huber, decr, September 28, 1995, SRRDec 87 (1995) 525–533; coram Pinto, decr, October 6, 1995, SRRDec 87 (1995) 540–545.

[81] See RRAO 1989.

[82] See the opinions of J. Provost and L. Wrenn in P. Cogan, ed., CLSA Advisory Opinions 1984–1993, 479–481.

Normally, a sentence in favor of marriage nullity given "in the first grade of a trial" involves the decision of a first instance tribunal. But should an appellate court of the second or higher instance issue an affirmative decision on a new ground of nullity "as if in first instance" (see c. 1683 below), then the court of the next instance may issue a decree of confirmation acting at second instance on that one particular new ground.[83]

Possible Admission of a New Ground of Nullity

Canon 1683 — If a new ground of nullity of the marriage is alleged at the appellate grade, the tribunal can admit it and judge it as if in first instance.

In ecclesiastical trials, a new ground may be admitted in the course of a first instance trial in accord with canon 1514 on amending the original formulation of the doubt. Normally, however, a new ground cannot be introduced at a second or higher instance (c. 1639, §1). Canon 1683, reflecting the crucial spiritual impact of clarifying the marital status of persons, makes an exception for marriage nullity cases.

The new ground may be admitted and judged "as if in first instance." If this is done, the appellate court need not have one of the bases of competence provided in canon 1673.

No procedure for admitting a new ground is provided in canon 1683. The provisions governing a change in the terms of the controversy (c. 1514) provide guidance for the appropriate manner of handling the admission of a new ground at the appellate level. Should information pointing to a new ground emerge during an appellate trial, however, it is not necessary that a new ground be admitted. A conforming sentence may well be forthcoming on the original ground, and neither party may see a need to pursue a moot question. Or one or both of the parties might prefer to submit a new petition on the new ground to a competent court of first instance.

Finally, if a new ground is admitted at the appellate level, while it is judged as if in first instance, it remains a ruling of the court of second or higher instance. This has important implications for identifying the correct tribunal to which the affirmative decision must be sent for mandatory review (c. 1682, §1). For example, if the case had come to a metropolitan tribunal in second instance, the affirmative decision on the new ground may not be transmitted to the normal court of appeal for the first instance trials of that metropolitan tribunal. Rather, the transmission must be made to the appropriate court of third instance, normally the Roman Rota (c. 1444, §1, 2°).[84] Likewise, in the case of interdiocesan courts of second instance, the normal court of appeal is the Roman Rota. If, however, the statutes of that interdiocesan court were to assign a different court of third instance, then the mandatory review would be conducted there.

Effect of Conforming Judgments

Canon 1684 — §1. After the sentence which first declared the nullity of the marriage has been confirmed at the appellate grade either by a decree or by a second sentence, the persons whose marriage has been declared null can contract a new marriage as soon as the decree or second sentence has been communicated to them unless a prohibition attached to the sentence or decree or established by the local ordinary has forbidden this.

The issuance of two conforming decisions in favor of marriage nullity brings about a very significant change in the juridical status of the parties.

Prior to the second conforming decision, the parties were still legally impeded from entering a [83] See, for example, decrees of confirmation issued coram Bruno, June 17, 1994, SRRDec 86 (1994) 337–344; coram López-Illana, December 12, 1994, SRRDec 86 (1994) 619–649; and coram Sable, December 13, 1994, SRRDec 86 (1994) 650–658. These decrees were all issued relative to affirmative decisions made by second instance courts that admitted new grounds as if in first instance.

[84] CLSA Advisory Opinions 1984–1993, 478.

new marriage by their previous union.[85] Subsequent to a conforming sentence, however, the prior exchange of consent no longer prevents the parties from entering a new marriage. Given the fundamental human right to marry affirmed by canon 1058, the parties are free to marry as soon as the decree of nullity is communicated to them[86] unless a prohibition (vetitum) has been attached to the decree of nullity. In a few countries in which ecclesiastical declarations of nullity may have civil effects, however, additional formalities in registering the decree of nullity may be necessary before the parties are civilly free to marry.[87]

Excursus: The Meaning of Conformity of Judgments

The jurisprudence concerning substantial or equivalent conformity of sentences in marriage nullity cases is not fully consistent.[88] Canon 1641, 1° identifies three criteria for conforming judgments. The decisions must concern the same parties (inter easdem partes), must be about the same basic issue at the heart of the petition (de eodem petito), and must be based on the same cause of petitioning (ex eadem causa petendi). In a marriage case, there is no difficulty verifying the first two of these criteria. The two decisions would involve the same two parties. The basic issue being addressed is whether their union is valid or not. But the question arises, "Is the basis for petitioning (causa petendi) the same as the grounds of nullity (caput nullitatis)?"[89] Provost identifies two schools of thought and examines numerous Rotal decisions on the issue of conformity of sentences.[90] One school holds that formal conformity of sentences is necessary. This school identifies the basis of petitioning with the specific ground of nullity and requires that the conforming affirmative decisions be based on the same ground. The other school holds that the basis of petitioning is not to be strictly identified with the specific ground. This school argues that there can be equivalent or substantial conformity when the decisions address the same juridic facts even if they do so under different formal headings. For the most part, this school focuses less on the "different juridical names" given in the formulation of the grounds than on the "substance of the controversy."[91] Thus, the different headings of nullity matter less than whether "each ground is based on the same juridical facts admitted and accepted in both instances."[92]

In practice, when two sentences have been issued concerning the same parties and same matter with the exact same formulation of the ground(s), then there is formal conformity. If, however, the formulation of the grounds differs and the court of higher instance did not specifi-

[85] The Signatura clarified that this requirement of conforming decisions, although of ecclesiastical law, nonetheless applies to declarations of nullity of the marriages of two persons neither of whom were Catholic. See ApSig, responsio, February 1, 1990, AAS 84 (1992) 549–550. This author has found no published English translation. For a Spanish translation and brief commentary, see J. L. Acebal Luján, "La declaración de nulidad del matrimonio de dos acatólicos: Texto y commentario," REDC 49 (1992) 691–697.

[86] Canon 1684, §1 seems to eliminate the need for a separate decree of execution of the judgment which is normally required to implement the legal consequences of a judgment (cc. 1650–1655). At the very least, canon 1684, §1 presumes that the decree of confirmation or second conforming sentence incorporates a decree of execution of the judgment (c. 1651).

[87] See Madero, in Pamplona ComEng, 1039.

[88] A. McGrath, "Conformity of Sentence in Marriage Nullity Cases," Stud Can 27 (1993) 11–15; A. Mendonça, "The Structural and Functional Aspects of an Appeal Tribunal in Marriage Nullity Cases," Stud Can 32 (1998) 496–499.

[89] J. Provost, "Jurisprudential and Procedural Approaches to Traditional and Modern Grounds and the Question of Conformity of Sentences," in Proceedings of the Canon Law Society of Australia and New Zealand (Sydney, Australia: CLSANZ, 1996) 94.

[90] Ibid, 94–106.

[91] J. Cuneo, "Towards Understanding the Conformity of Two Sentences of Nullity," J 46 (1986) 600–601.

[92] McGrath, "Conformity of Sentence," 20.

cally decree that its decision is to be considered as conforming, then presumably the sentences are not concordant.[93]

Excursus: The Vetitum

A vetitum (plural vetita) may be imposed either by a tribunal or by the competent local ordinary. Since such a prohibition is mentioned solely in canons 1684 and 1685, some have argued that a vetitum may be issued only by a tribunal of second or higher instance.[94] In this author's opinion, however, a vetitum may be imposed by a tribunal of first instance as well as of second or any further instance.[95]

Vetita are limited in nature and do not have an invalidating effect (see the commentary on c. 1077). They do, however, stand in the way of a licit union (c. 1066). Thus, should a person upon whom such a prohibition has been imposed wish to enter a new marriage, the pastor or other person responsible to prepare a couple for marriage has the duty to address the provisions of the vetitum.

Such prohibitions serve several purposes. Ideally, vetita serve the parties upon whom they are imposed by helping them address the underlying problems that contributed to the breakdown of their previous unions. Second, the existence of a vetitum may help protect those interested in marrying persons whose prior unions have been declared null. The counseling or other steps required to remove the prohibition provide important information to these prospective spouses, enabling them better to assess the wisdom of marrying. A vetitum also manifests the Church's commitment to uphold the sacredness of marriage precisely by prohibiting a new marriage until there is evidence that the parties are truly willing and able to assume and live out that commitment.[96]

Most commonly, vetita are imposed when there is evidence of psychological factors that would impair a person's ability to exercise due discretion or to assume the essential obligations of marriage (c. 1095). But vetita also have their place when the nullity of the prior union was rooted in other causes. For example, a prohibition may be called for in cases of error determining the will or simulation (cc. 1099, 1101) when the evidence has indicated that a person's philosophy of life or value system is significantly at odds with the Church's teaching on marriage.

This author believes that the subject of prohibitions attached to declarations of nullity deserved a fuller treatment in the code. A prohibition restricts the free exercise of the right to marry (c. 1058), and hence the law concerning prohibitions must be interpreted strictly (c. 18). The code provides no process either for issuing or rescinding a prohibition to marry. Presumably, when issued during a marriage nullity trial, the trial procedures themselves protect the rights of the person whose freedom to marry is being restricted. When an ordinary issues a prohibition outside of the context of a marriage nullity trial, the procedural requirements of canons 50–51 ought to be observed.

Likewise, the decision to remove or lift a vetitum should never be taken lightly. Once imposed, the vetitum does indeed stand in the way of the licit celebration of a new marriage (c. 1066). Tribunal officials, however, often express the concern that those preparing couples for marriage do not always take these prohibitions seriously enough, sometimes ignoring them entirely or treating them superficially. In part, this may reflect the fact that marriage preparation ministers do not have access to the acts of the case. Thus, they may not fully appreciate why the judge imposed the prohibition.

[93] In these circumstances, a party might raise an incidental question and ask the tribunal to rule on the question of whether the sentences are conforming.

[94] See the opinion of B. A. Cusack in CLSA Advisory Opinions 1984–1993, 481–483.

[95] Custom is the best interpreter of the law (c. 27), and first instance tribunals have customarily imposed prohibitions.

[96] See J. Lucas, "The Prohibition Imposed by a Tribunal: Law, Practice, Future Development," J 45 (1985) 598.

Finally, while it is not provided for by the code, some tribunals issue monita (warnings or pastoral cautions). A monitum is not a prohibition, but identifies areas of concern to assist the minister preparing a couple for marriage in providing the appropriate preparation required by canon 1063, 2°.[97]

Decree of Confirmation Constitutes a Conforming Judgment

§2. The prescripts of can. 1644 must be observed even if the sentence which declared the nullity of the marriage was confirmed not by a second sentence but by a decree.

This paragraph stipulates that a decree of confirmation (c. 1682, §2) constitutes a conforming decision at law. It has the same force as a full judicial sentence issued subsequent to an ordinary examination of the case. This eliminates any confusion and prevents any attempt to downgrade the force of a decree of confirmation. Since confirmation of a first affirmative sentence is a true conforming decision, it cannot be challenged by means of an ordinary appeal.

It is true that conforming decisions in a case involving the status of persons do not result in a res iudicata or adjudged matter (see commentary on cc. 1643 and 1641). Thus, a challenge to the two conforming decisions remains radically possible. Such a challenge, however, requires a new presentation of the case (c. 1644). A new presentation of the case, however, does not suspend the execution of the sentence of marriage nullity (c. 1644, §2) unless the appellate tribunal has suspended its execution. The only other possible challenge to two conforming decisions in favor of nullity would involve a complaint of nullity of the process (cc. 1619–1627).

[97] Besides the sources already cited, also see J. Hopka, "The Vetitum and Monitum in Matrimonial Nullity Proceedings," Stud Can 19 (1985) 357–399, and R. Guiry, "Canonical and Psychological Reflections on the Vetitum in Today's Tribunals," J 49 (1989) 191–209.

Recording Decrees of Nullity in Sacramental Registers

Canon 1685 — As soon as the sentence is executed, the judicial vicar must notify the local ordinary of the place in which the marriage was celebrated. The local ordinary must take care that the declaration of the nullity of the marriage and any possible prohibitions are noted as soon as possible in the marriage and baptismal registers.

Once executed, an ecclesiastical judgment takes legal effect. Canon 1651 provides that the decree of execution may be issued separately or incorporated into the judgment itself.

As soon as the sentence is executed, canon 1685 obliges the judicial vicar to assure that notations of the declaration of nullity and any prohibition (vetitum) are made in the appropriate sacramental registers. The canon, however, does not identify whether this is the responsibility of the judicial vicar of first instance or of the judicial vicar of the appellate court that issued the second conforming decision. Kelly assumes that it is the judicial vicar of the appellate level.[98] Martínez Valls, to the contrary, indicates that this is the responsibility of the judicial vicar of the first instance tribunal in which the petition was initially judged.[99] Given the doubt, canon 17 suggests recourse to parallel places. A potential parallel is found in canon 1653, §1, which entrusts the execution of a judgment to the bishop of the diocese in which the first instance judgment was issued. This is the responsibility of the bishop of the first instance tribunal even if the definitive judgment was issued by an appellate tribunal. Thus, while executing a judgment and seeing that proper notices are entered into sacramental registers are not identical tasks, this author agrees with Martínez Valls that the responsibility belongs to the judicial vicar of the first instance tribunal where the trial was initiated.

[98] Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 941.
[99] Martínez Valls, in Valencia Com, 726.

The judicial vicar is to provide notice of the decree of nullity and any prohibitions to the local ordinary (c. 134, §2) of the place where the marriage was celebrated. That local ordinary is then responsible to ensure that the relevant notation is made in the marriage register of the parish of contract, as well as in the register(s) of the parish(es) of baptism, even if those parishes are located outside of his jurisdiction.[100] In practice, to assure that notations are properly made, tribunals often send notices directly to the churches of marriage and baptism.

ARTICLE 6: THE DOCUMENTARY PROCESS[101] [cc. 1686–1688]

The name "documentary process" was adopted by the procedural law coetus during its discussion of the 1976 schema.[102] The term emphasizes that this procedure may be employed only when the nullity of the marriage is established principally by means of a document that is not subject to contradiction.

The process, while streamlined, remains judicial in nature. This is evident both in the text of canons 1686–1688 and in the fact that they are situated in the context of tribunal actions (see c. 17). Furthermore, the judicial nature of the process was specifically affirmed in an authentic interpretation of canon 1990 of the 1917 code.[103] While some changes were made in the norms governing the documentary process, the new code did not change its underlying judicial nature.

The documentary process is frequently employed. In 1996, for example, 15,768 documentary cases were introduced worldwide, and 15,790 were closed. Of the closed cases, 15,437 were decided in favor of nullity, 51 received a sentence contrary to nullity, and the others were closed by peremption or renunciation.[104] Thus, to serve the people's needs, it is critical that tribunal officials properly understand and implement the norms for documentary cases.

Application and Nature of the Documentary Process

Canon 1686 — After receiving a petition proposed according to the norm of can. 1677, the judicial vicar or a judge designated by him can declare the nullity of a marriage by sentence if a document subject to no contradiction or exception clearly establishes the existence of a diriment impediment or a defect of legitimate form, provided that it is equally certain that no dispensation was given, or establishes the lack of a valid mandate of a proxy. In these cases, the formalities of the ordinary process are omitted except for the citation of the parties and the intervention of the defender of the bond.

This lengthy canon contains many elements which require careful study.

Types of Cases Where the Documentary Process May Be Used

The documentary process may be employed only for cases when the nullity of marriage is due to:

[100] This specifies the requirement of c. 535, §2 that a notation be made in a person's baptismal record of all matters pertaining to his or her canonical status, including marriage.

[101] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 1015; Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 941–942; C. de Diego-Lora, in Pamplona ComEng, 1040–1042; Acebal, in Salamanca Com, 816–817; Martínez Valls, in Valencia Com, 726–727; Diego-Lora, in Com Ex IV/2, 1946–1962. For a thorough study of the origins and development of this process, see T. L. Dupre, The Summary Process of Canons 1990–1992 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1967) 1–61.

[102] Comm 11 (1979) 269. The 1917 code (CIC 1990–1992) referred to these as exceptional cases. More commonly, the process was known as the "summary judicial process" or "summary trial."

[103] CodCom, responsa, December 6, 1943, AAS 36 (1944) 94. Translation in CLD 3, 645.

[104] Secretaria Status, Statistical Yearbook of the Church 1996, 431 and 449.

(1) the existence of a diriment impediment (cc. 1083–1094)[105] that has not been dispensed (cc. 1078–1082);

(2) a defect of legitimate form that was not dispensed (cc. 1104, 1108–1123, 1127); and

(3) a defect of a valid mandate of a proxy (cc. 1104–1105).

A defect of legitimate form must be distinguished from those cases where there was no semblance of canonical form at all (lack of form cases). When canonical form was totally lacking, the documentary process is not used, and the nullity of the union is decided administratively as part of the prenuptial investigation (cc. 1066–1067).[106]

Other Conditions for Use of the Documentary Process

Furthermore, the documentary process may be employed for the aforementioned three types of cases only if there is a document "subject to no contradiction or exception" that "clearly establishes" (certo constet) the existence of the impediment or defect. Thus, when unimpeachable documentary evidence is lacking, cases involving impediments or defects of form or mandate must be tried in the formal process.

Use of Other Forms of Evidence

While the central proof of nullity must be found in a document, there is a role for other forms of evidence in the documentary process, including the testimony of witnesses.[107] This is verified in the interpretation and implementation of canon 1990 of the 1917 code.[108] An authentic interpretation of the former code clarified that other legitimate sources could be used in these cases.[109] Thus, the declarations of the parties, testimonies of witnesses, and other legitimate forms of proof may serve an important adminicular function in helping the judge, especially in establishing that impediments were not dispensed and that the union was not convalidated or sanated. For example, in the case of a defect of form due to the officiating minister's lack of delegation, besides the documents establishing that such delegation was necessary and that the marriage records contain no entry regarding the granting of delegation, the brief testimony of a priest or deacon that he neglected to seek the required delegation, or from the pastor or local ordinary that he failed to extend it, would be admissible and of great value.[110]

[105] The 1917 code permitted the use of the documentary process for some, but not all impediments (CIC 1990). That restriction is not present in c. 1686, and the documentary process may be used for any of the impediments provided the other conditions are met.

While there is no longer the impediment of spiritual relationship in the Latin code, prior to November 27, 1983, Latin Catholics were bound by that impediment (CIC 1079, 768). If the impediment existed and was not dispensed, marriages attempted before that date can be declared null through the documentary process.

[106] CodCom, responsa, July 11, 1984, AAS 76 (1984) 747. Translated in CLD 11, 351. For a brief explanation, see Wrenn, Authentic Interpretations, 13–14.

[107] For a differing opinion, see R. Bourgon, in CLSGBI Com, 880, n. 1.

[108] When one compares CIC 1990 with c. 1686 of the current code, the changes made are significant, but they have not totally reordered the institute. Thus, in accord with standard principles of interpretation (see c. 20), the praxis related to the exceptional process of the 1917 code provides important guidance in interpreting and implementing the current norms.

[109] CodCom, responsa, June 16, 1931, AAS 23 (1931) 353–354. Translation in CLD 1, 811–812. Also see SCSacr, instr, Provida Mater Ecclesia, art. 226, AAS 28 (1936) 358. Translation in CLD 2, 526.

[110] See W. J. Doheny, Canonical Procedure in Matrimonial Cases, vol. II, Informal Procedure (Milwaukee: Bruce, 1948) 13–28 for a full discussion of the proof required in documentary cases.

The Judge in Documentary Cases

Canon 1425, §1, 1°b) reserves contentious cases involving the bond of marriage to a college of three judges, but then specifically exempts the documentary process in both first and second instance from this requirement. Thus, marriage cases involving the documentary process may always be decided by a sole judge.

In the previous code, the "ordinary" was the competent authority to judge documentary cases (CIC 1990). In contrast, canon 1686 provides that the judicial vicar or a judge designated by him handle these petitions. While the canon seems to prefer that the judicial vicar personally adjudicate these matters, nothing prevents his designating another judge to fulfill this task.

May, however, a lay judge be designated to adjudicate documentary cases? This is a disputed question, related directly to the continuing debate over the nature of the power of governance and the meaning of "lay cooperation" in governance.[111] Most commentators do not directly address the question of whether a lay judge may adjudicate documentary cases, although many seem to assume that this should not be done. Grocholewski states that a lay judge can fulfill his or her function "only as part of a college" and cannot perform any function as a sole judge.[112] Burke argues that a decision by a sole lay judge would be invalid, not merely illicit.[113] Both indicate that this is not merely a disciplinary norm, but reflects doctrinal concerns. While neither specifically refers to the documentary process, they would undoubtedly reject the prospect of a sole lay judge adjudicating documentary cases. Provost, however, while admitting it is a minority opinion, argues that a lay judge may validly and licitly adjudicate documentary cases.[114] Despite Provost's suggestion that further serious consideration be given to this possibility, most commentators have not addressed the question.[115] Certainly, since some commentators contend that a lay judge acting solely acts invalidly, the prudent course is to assign documentary cases only to cleric judges. Yet, this author believes that Provost's position merits much fuller discussion.

The Process Employed in Documentary Cases

The process begins when the tribunal accepts a petition in accord with canon 1677. Upon acceptance of the petition, the judge must cite the parties, including the defender of the bond, and notify them of the citation in accord with canon 1508. Thus, the documentary process preserves the initial stages of the ordinary judicial process. The clause noting that the parties must be cited and the defender of the bond must intervene may be redundant given the explicit requirement that canon 1677 be observed. But that redundancy emphasizes the essential fact that the right of defense must be respected in the documentary process. The judge, however, may omit the remaining formalities of the judicial process (praetermissis sollemnitatibus ordinarii processus).

[111] See this commentary at cc. 129, §2; 1421; and 1425 for further reflections.

[112] Z. Grocholewski, in Com Ex IV/1, 784. He adds, however, that within the college the lay person is without doubt a true judge and has the same judicial power as the other members (785), although a lay judge may not serve as the presiding judge (785–786). Also see RRAO 1989, 49–50.

[113] R. L. Burke, "Nullity of a Decision by a Single Lay Judge," RRAO 1994, 145–146.

[114] J. Provost, "Roles for Lay Judges," in CLSA Advisory Opinions 1984–1993, 444–446; idem, "Role of Lay Judges," J 45 (1985) 329–332.

[115] R. Pagé briefly refers to Provost's opinion, but he concludes that, as a matter of purely ecclesiastical law, lay judges can exercise their authority only within a judicial college. See R. Pagé, "Juges laïcs et exercice du pouvoir judiciaire," in Unico Ecclesiae Servitio: Canonical Studies Presented to Germain Lesage, ed. M. Thériault and J. Thorn (Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1991) 209. F. G. Morrisey, in "Decimo anno," 120, does not speak of documentary cases. He argues, however, that "there no longer seems to be any objectively valid reason preventing a qualified lay person from acting as a sole judge in a case. The power of orders is not at stake here; instead we are simply dealing with a fact to be ascertained by the court."

The canon neither specifies what "formalities" may be omitted nor identifies how they are distinguished from the constitutive elements of the judicial process. Commentators on the 1917 code were not in agreement on this point. Among the formalities which may be omitted, Doheny included the use of a collegiate tribunal, the formal litis contestatio, the depositions of witnesses (unless needed), the publication of the acts, and the mandatory appeal.[116] He concluded that essential elements which must be preserved were: (1) the generic and special norms governing competency in marriage cases, (2) the right of the parties to accuse the marriage, (3) the actual petition for a trial of nullity, (4) the right of defense, and (5) a judicial sentence.[117] Thomas L. Dupre, after extensively surveying the literature and historical background of the process, developed a helpful set of principles. He argued that all formalities may be omitted except those which are required by: (1) divine law, (2) the demands of justice, (3) the positive law for this process, and (4) the requirements of the public order. Finally, Dupre concluded that in each concrete case the judge had the discretion to resolve doubts about whether a specific formality was necessary or not.[118] Applying these principles to the ius vigens, this author suggests that the following essential elements must be preserved: (1) a petition from one with the right to impugn the marriage, (2) the rules of judicial competence for marriage nullity cases, (3) the citation of the parties, (4) the oral or written intervention of the defender of the bond, (5) the requirement of moral certitude to overturn the presumption of validity, (6) a written sentence, and (7) the right of defense of the parties including their right to appeal the judgment.

The Decision

Upon reaching moral certitude, the judge declares the nullity by means of a judicial sentence. The essential elements of any judicial sentence must be present, although not necessarily all the formalities. Thus, the sentence must settle the controversy, determine the obligations of the parties, set forth reasons in law and in fact for the decision, and apportion the expenses of the trial (cc. 1611, 1612, 1689).

If the judge cannot reach moral certitude in the summary process, some authors indicate that a negative decision should not be issued, but that the case should be transferred to the formal process.[119] This opinion is supported by the fact that canon 1688 seems to assume that any appeal will be against an affirmative decision. Yet, canon 1687, §2 speaks of an appeal by a party who feels aggrieved, which would imply that a petitioner might be aggrieved by a negative decision. Normally, when the judge cannot reach moral certitude of nullity in the documentary process, it is most appropriate to order the matter transferred to the ordinary contentious process. Yet, the canon does not specifically preclude a negative decision. For example, the results of the investigation may firmly establish that no impediment exists, or that it was definitely dispensed, or that the alleged defect of form did not exist. In these situations, a transfer of the case to the ordinary process would be pure formalism, since there would be no hope of an affirmative decision on the ground at issue. Rather than drag out the process uselessly, the judge should issue a negative sentence.[120] The [116] Doheny, Canonical Procedure: Informal Cases, 145–146.

[117] Ibid. 146. Doheny noted that some canonists argued that at least some of the formalities connected with judicial competence could also be omitted, a position which he refused to endorse or condemn, but with which he was not in full agreement (148–151).

[118] T. Dupre, The Summary Process, 122. He also suggested that, in keeping with the spirit of the summary process, the benefit of the doubt should be given to the elimination of procedural formalities unless they were at least probably essential to the judicial process, the public order, or the right of defense (121).

[119] Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 941–942; Martínez Valls, in Valencia Com, 726.

[120] W. J. Doheny, in Canonical Procedure: Informal Cases, 173–174, concludes that normally there is little need to fact that the Secretariat of State and Signatura collect statistics about negative decisions in documentary cases reinforces this conclusion. If it is necessary to issue a negative decision in a documentary case, ideally the judge might suggest that the petitioner consult a canonical advocate to assess whether some other ground of nullity might be present that could become the basis of a new petition.

The Appeal

Canon 1687 — §1. If the defender of the bond prudently thinks that either the flaws mentioned in can. 1686 or the lack of a dispensation are not certain, the defender of the bond must appeal against the declaration of nullity to the judge of second instance; the acts must be sent to the appellate judge who must be advised in writing that a documentary process is involved.

§2. The party who considers himself or herself aggrieved retains the right of appeal.

The mandatory review of first affirmative decisions in marriage nullity cases (c. 1682, §1) is not applicable to cases decided by the summary process. Presumably, this respects the nature of the process and the weight of the documentary proof on which the decision must be based. Thus, if neither the defender of the bond nor one of the parties lodges an appeal against an affirmative judgment, the decision stands and may be executed.

If, however, the defender of the bond believes that the existence of the impediment or other defect or the lack of dispensation is not certainly established, he or she must appeal to the court of second instance. A party who is aggrieved by the decision also retains the right of appeal.

In the face of an appeal, the first instance tribunal is to send the acts of the case to the appellate tribunal with a written indication that the case was decided using the documentary process.

Second Instance Process in Documentary Cases

Canon 1688 — The judge of second instance, with the intervention of the defender of the bond and after having heard the parties, will decide in the same manner as that mentioned in can. 1686 whether the sentence must be confirmed or whether the case must rather proceed according to the ordinary method of law; in the latter event the judge remands the case to the tribunal of first instance.

Canon 1441 states that the tribunal of second instance is to be constituted in the same way as the tribunal of first instance. Thus, a sole judge adjudicates the documentary process in second instance.[121] The defender of the bond of second instance must intervene, and the judge is to hear the parties.

Then, in the same manner as the first instance documentary trial, the second instance judge decides between two options: (1) to ratify by decree the decision of first instance (which seems to presume the decision was in the affirmative), or (2) to order that the case be tried in the ordinary contentious process. In this latter situation, the case is not opened at the court of second instance, but returned to the tribunal of first instance. This has the effect of vacating the initial affirmative decision and requiring the petitioner to accept again the burden of proving nullity. Clearly, in the documentary process the court of second instance is not free to issue a negative sentence with regard to the substance of the case, but only to order that the matter be more closely examined.

issue negative decisions in the summary process. He adds, however, that when the evidence against nullity is incontrovertible, the proper way to dispose of the case is to issue a negative sentence.

[121] The second sentence of c. 1441 applies only to cases normally reserved to a college but decided by a sole judge in light of the exception provided by c. 1425, §4. Since documentary cases are handled by a single judge as a matter of course, second instance documentary cases are also adjudicated by a sole judge.

ARTICLE 7: GENERAL NORMS[122] [cc. 1689–1691]

The general norms in this final article apply to all marriage nullity cases, and might have been better placed as the first rather than the seventh article of this chapter on "Cases to Declare the Nullity of Marriage."

Reminder of the Parties' Moral and Civil Obligations

Canon 1689 — In the sentence the parties are to be reminded of the moral and even civil obligations which may bind them both toward one another and toward their children to furnish support and education.

A judicial sentence must determine the obligations of the parties resulting from the judgment (c. 1611, 2°). In marriage nullity cases, whether rendered in the affirmative or the negative, the sentence is to remind the parties of their moral and legal obligations to each other and their children, if any.[123] Legal obligations to children pertain to the civil effects of marriage which are determined by the appropriate civil authority (c. 1672). Quite apart from a reminder of any legal obligations imposed on them, the judge is also to point out additional moral obligations, especially any connected with the parties' vocation as parents.

This requirement must be read in conjunction with canon 1071, §1, 3°, which mandates that, except in a case of necessity, no one is to assist at a marriage of a person who has obligations toward a former partner or children arising from a prior union without the permission of the local ordinary.[124] If during the course of the trial credible information emerged indicating that civil or moral obligations were not being fulfilled, it would be appropriate not only to remind the parties of their obligations, but also to prohibit a new marriage (c. 1684, §1) until it was evident that such obligations were being properly fulfilled.

Marriage Cases and the Oral Contentious Process

Canon 1690 — Cases for the declaration of the nullity of a marriage cannot be treated in an oral contentious process.

The oral contentious process (cc. 1656–1670) cannot be used to decide questions of marriage nullity. A proposal to use the oral contentious process for such cases was specifically rejected during the drafting of the code.[125] Marriage nullity cases, therefore, are handled using the ordinary contentious process (c. 1691) or, when the conditions are verified, the documentary process (cc. 1686–1688).

This prohibition, however, only forbids the use of the oral contentious process to decide the principal case. Canon 1590 permits use of the oral contentious process to decide incidental cases connected with marriage cases.

Process in Formal Marriage Nullity Cases

Canon 1691 — In other procedural matters, the canons on trials in general and on the ordinary contentious trial must be applied unless the nature of the matter precludes it; the special norms for cases concerning the status of persons and

[122] Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 1015–1016; Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 942–943; Madero, in Pamplona ComEng, 1043; Acebal, in Salamanca Com, 817; Martínez Valls, in Valencia Com, 727; Carreras, in Com Ex IV/2, 1963–1966.

[123] See M. S. Foster, "Divorce and Remarriage: What about the Children?" Stud Can 31 (1997) 165–171.

[124] Such obligations exist whether the prior union was putative (c. 1061, §3) or not. Parental obligations to children exist even if the union lacked any semblance of marriage.

[125] Comm 11 (1979) 271. F. G. Morrisey, in "Decimo anno," 120, has issued a new call for use of the oral contentious process in marriage nullity cases.

cases pertaining to the public good are to be observed.

Despite proposals to elaborate a completely separate process for marriage nullity cases,[126] the code treats them as a species of the ordinary contentious trial. Thus, besides the special provisions of canons 1671–1690, the norms for trials in general (cc. 1400–1500) and for the ordinary contentious process (cc. 1501–1655) are to be employed in adjudicating marriage nullity cases "unless the nature of the matter precludes it" (nisi rei natura obstet). Few commentators have yet to suggest examples of the sorts of matters that might preclude the use of the ordinary contentious process in marriage nullity cases.[127] Clearly, the nisi clause does not provide the authority to dispense from procedural law (c. 87, §1). In using the term obstet, the canon refers only to those situations where it is truly impossible to implement one of the norms of the ordinary contentious process. Thus, it is an example of the rule of law that no one is bound to the impossible.[128]

Canon 1691 also specifies that marriage nullity cases by their nature involve the status of persons and the public good.[129] Thus, the special norms for these types of cases must be observed.[130]

[126] Cox, Procedural Changes, 146–152, 170–176.

[127] A. Farret, for example, has suggested that the norms for publication of the acts and of the sentence need to be implemented in light of the special nature of marriage cases. See "Publication des actes et publication de la sentence," Stud Can 25 (1991) 128–138. Presumably, the proposed instruction being prepared by the interdicasterial commission (see n. 5 above) will clarify instances in which the special nature of marriage cases will modify the requirements of the ordinary contentious process.

[128] RI, n. 6, CorpusIC II, 1122.

[129] For a brief explanation of what is meant by cases involving the "status of persons," see the commentary on c. 1643. For reflections on cases involving the public good, see the commentary on cc. 1430–1431.

[130] Norms making special provisions for status-of-persons cases are cc. 1445, §1, 2°; 1492, §1; 1643; and 1644, §1. Norms for cases involving the public good, which are defined either by the law itself (cc. 1691, 1696) or by the diocesan bishop (c. 1431, §1) are found in cc. 1452, §1; 1532; 1536, §2; 1598, §1; 1696; and 1715, §1.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

(The material listed below serves as a comprehensive bibliography for canons 1501–1691.)

Books

Bonnet, P.A., and Gullo, C., eds. Il processo matrimonioniale canonico, Nuova edizione riveduta e ampliata. Studi Giuridici XXIX. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1994.

Cox, C. A. Procedural Changes in Formal Marriage Nullity Cases from the 1917 to the 1983 Code. CanLawStud 528. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1989.

Doheny, W. J. Canonical Procedure in Matrimonial Cases. Vol. 1, Formal Procedure. 2nd ed. Milwaukee: Bruce, 1948.

———. Canonical Procedure in Matrimonial Cases. Vol. 2, Informal Procedure. Milwaukee: Bruce, 1948.

Dupre, T. L. The Summary Process of Canons 1990–1992. CanLawStud 451. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1967.

Erlebach, G. La nullità della sentenza giudiziale "ob ius defensionis denegatum" nella giurisprudenza rotale. Studi Giuridici XXV. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1991.

García Faílde, J. J. Nuevo derecho procesal canónico: Estudio sistemático-analítico comparado. 3rd rev. and enlarged ed. Salamanca: Publicaciones Universidad Pontificia, 1995.

Gordon, I., and Grocholewski, Z., eds. Documenta recentiora circa rem matrimonialem et processualem. Vol. I. 2 vols. Rome: Pontificia Universitas Gregoriana, 1977.

Lüdicke, K., Mussinghoff, H., and Schwendenwein, H., eds. Iustus Iudex: Festgabe für Paul Wesemann zum 75. Geburtstag von seinen Freunden und Schülern. Essen: Ludgerus-Verlag, 1990.

Ochoa, X., ed. Leges Ecclesiae post Codicem iuris canonici editae. Vol. V. 7 vols. Rome: Commentarium pro Religiosis, 1980.

Raica, S. J. Canon 1529: A Historical and Canonical Study. Rome: Pontificia Universitas Gregoriana, 1996.

Sable, R. M., ed. Incapacity for Marriage: Jurisprudence and Interpretation: Acts of the III Gregorian Colloquium. Rome: Pontificia Universitas Gregoriana, 1987.

Secretaria Status. Statistical Yearbook of the Church 1996. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1998.

Thériault, M., and Thorn, J., eds. Unico Ecclesiae Servitio: Canonical Studies Presented to Germain Lesage. Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1991.

Wanenmacher, F. Canonical Evidence in Marriage Nullity Cases. Philadelphia: Dolphin, 1935.

Wijlens, M. The Ordinary Contentious Trial: A Schematic Overview. Privately published, 1992.

Woestman, W. H. Papal Allocutions to the Roman Rota 1939–1994. Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1994.

———. Special Marriage Cases. Ottawa, St. Paul University, 1992.

Wrenn, L. G. Authentic Interpretations on the 1983 Code. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1993.

———. Procedures. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1987.

Articles

Abbass, J. "Contentious Trials: A Comparative Study of the Eastern and Latin Codes." J 56 (1996) 875–904.

Acebal Luján, J. L.. "El fuero competente matrimonial, c. 1673, 3°: Texto y comentario." REDC 51 (1994) 185–189.

———. "La declaración de nulidad del matrimonio de dos acatólicos: Texto y comentario." REDC 49 (1992) 691–697.

———. "Normas del Tribunal de la Rota Romana: Texto y comentario." REDC 52 (1995) 231–279.

Beal, J. P. "Making Connections: Procedural Law and Substantive Justice." J 54 (1994) 113–182.

———. "The Substance of Things Hoped For: Proving Simulation of Matrimonial Consent." J 55 (1995) 745–793.

Breitenbeck, M. "The Use of Experts in Marriage Nullity Cases." CLSAP 51 (1989) 30–47.

Cox, C. A. "The Procedural Law That Might Have Been: Some Proposed Changes That Were Not Adopted during the Code Revision Process." J 50 (1990) 613–642.

Cuneo, J. J. "Towards Understanding the Conformity of Two Sentences of Nullity." J 46 (1986) 568–601.

Daneels, F. "The 'Forum of Most of the Proofs.'" J 50 (1990) 289–309.

———: "The Right of Defence." Stud Can 27 (1993) 77–95.

de Lanversin, B. "L'importance du can. 1578, §3, dans les procès matrimoniaux." QuadStR 4 (1989) 49–58.

Doran, T. G. "Some Thoughts on Experts." QuadStR 4 (1989) 59–74.

Erlebach, G. "La fattispecie di negazione del diritto di defesa causanti la nullità della sentenza secondo la giurisprudenza Rotale: Criteri generali e parte statica." ME 114 (1989) 495–556.

Egan, E. M. "Appeal in Marriage Nullity Cases: Two Centuries of Experiment and Reform." CLSAP 43 (1981) 132–144.

Farret, A. "Publication des actes et publication de la sentence dans les causes de nullité de mariage." Stud Can 25 (1991) 115–138.

Felici, P. "Formalitates iuridicae et aestimatio probationum in processu canonico." Comm 9 (1977) 175–184. Translation in J 38 (1978) 153–157.

Foster, M. S. "Divorce and Remarriage: What about the Children? Canons 1071, 1077, 1684, 1689." Stud Can 31 (1997) 147–191.

García Faílde, J. J. "El perito psicólogo y psiquiatra en las causas canónicas de nulidad matrimonial." Memorias 20 (1996) 95–110.

Grocholewski, Z. "The Ecclesiastical Judge and the Findings of Psychiatric and Psychological Experts." J 47 (1987) 449–470.

———. "Quisnam est pars conventa in causis nullitatis matrimonii?" P 79 (1990) 357–391.

Guiry, R. W. "Canonical and Psychological Reflections on the Vetitum in Today's Tribunals." J 49 (1989) 191–209.

Hopka, J. "The Vetitum and Monitum in Matrimonial Nullity Proceedings." Stud Can 19 (1985) 357–399.

Johnson, J. G. "Publish and Be Damned: The Dilemma of Implementing the Canons on Publishing the Acts and the Sentence." J 49 (1989) 210–240.

———. "Res iudicata, restitutio in integrum, and Marriage Cases." Stud Can 28 (1994) 323–345.

Lucas, J. P. "The Prohibition Imposed by a Tribunal: Law, Practice, Future Development." J 45 (1985) 588–617.

Madero, L. "El proceso contencioso oral en el Codex Iuris Canonici de 1983." IC 24 (1984) 197–291.

Martinez Cavero, M. "El proceso contencioso oral." REDC 45 (1988) 677–696.

McGrath, A. "At the Service of Truth: Psychological Sciences and Their Relation to the Canon Law of Nullity of Marriage." Stud Can 27 (1993) 379–400.

———. "Conformity of Sentence in Marriage Nullity Cases." Stud Can 27 (1993) 5–22.

Mendonça, A. "The Application of the Principle of Equity in Marriage Nullity Cases." J 55 (1995) 664–697.

———. "The Role of Experts in 'Incapacity to Contract' Cases (Canon 1095)." Stud Can 25 (1991) 417–450.

———. "The Structural and Functional Aspects of an Appeal Tribunal in Marriage Nullity Cases." Stud Can 32 (1998) 441–500.

Moodie, M. R. "Fundamental Rights and Access to the Acts of a Case." Stud Can 28 (1994) 123–154.

Morlot, F. "Le droit de défense, en particulier dans la publication des actes." Stud Can (1996) 133–162.

Nau, D. "Publish and Be Damned: One Practitioner's Experience." J 51 (1991) 442–450.

Pompedda, M. F. "Decision-Sentence in Marriage Trials: Of the Concept and Principles for Rendering an Ecclesiastical Sentence." QuadStR 5 (1990) 73–99.

Provost, J. H. "Competent Tribunal When Respondent's Address Unknown." J 44 (1984) 244–246.

———. "Jurisprudential and Procedural Approaches to Traditional and Modern Grounds and the Question of Conformity of Sentences." Proceedings of the Canon Law Society of Australia and New Zealand. Sydney, Australia: CLSANZ, 1996, 92–113.

Smilanic, D. A. "The Publication of the Acts: Canon 1598, §1." CLSAP 57 (1995) 377–386.

Stankiewicz, A. "De citationis necessitate et impugnatione." QuadStR 4 (1989) 75–87.

———. "Il processo contenzioso orale." Apol 54 (1992) 563–591.

Trudeau, J. "La remise à la justice du tribunal dans les causes de nullité de mariage." Stud Can 32 (1998) 129–143.

Wirth, P. "Das mündliche Streitverfahren." In Iustus Iudex, ed. K. Lüdicke, H. Mussinghoff, and H. Schwendenwin, 631–653. Essen: Ludgerus Verlag, 1990.

Wrenn, L. G. "Notes, but Mostly Footnotes, on Presumptions." J 30 (1970) 206–215.

CHAPTER II
CASES OF SEPARATION OF SPOUSES
[cc. 1692–1696]

The process to decide the personal separation of baptized spouses is elaborated in the following canons. This chapter is new to the present code. The 1917 code did not contain any norms to guide the competent ecclesiastical authority in deciding separation cases. The 1917 code alluded only to the fact that separation could be effected by the sentence of an ecclesiastical judge or by the pronouncement of the ordinary.[1] The 1983 code, by contrast, explains the process to be used by the proper ecclesiastical authority in arriving at the decision for separation.

The Eastern code also elaborates the process to decide the separation of spouses. This is laid out in five canons very similar to those of the Latin code.[2]

No legal developments have taken place concerning this process since the promulgation of the 1983 code.

Ecclesiastical Forum

Canon 1692 — §1. Unless other provision is legitimately made in particular places, a decree of the diocesan bishop or a judicial sentence can decide the personal separation of baptized spouses according to the norm of the following canons.

Spouses have the duty and the right to preserve conjugal living in virtue of their marriage covenant, unless a legitimate cause excuses them. The Church has a special pastoral solicitude for married couples, and considers the separation of spouses even for a temporary period a serious matter.[3]

The case for separation may be decided by an administrative process or a judicial process. For the administrative process, the diocesan bishop of the domicile or quasi-domicile of the spouses is competent to issue the decree of separation (c. 107). The vicar general or episcopal vicar may issue this decree only by special mandate of the diocesan bishop.[4] Recourse against the decree of the diocesan bishop is governed by canons 1732–1739.

The following canons elucidate the important points of the judicial process.

Civil Forum

§2. Where an ecclesiastical decision has no civil effects or if a civil sentence is not contrary to divine law, the bishop of the diocese of the residence of the spouses, after having weighed the special circumstances, can grant permission to approach the civil forum.

§3. If a case concerns only the merely civil effects of marriage, the judge, after having observed the prescript of §2, is to try to defer the case to the civil forum from the start.

Marriage cases of the baptized belong to the ecclesiastical judge by proper right.[5] The diocesan bishop may exercise his discretion to have cases of separation decided in the ecclesiastical forum or deferred to the civil forum. Cases which concern the civil effects of marriage are more appropriately decided in the civil forum,[6] especially in those places where the decisions of ecclesiastical authority are not recognized by the civil authority. The civil effects of marriage concern such matters as property division, spousal support, child support, child custody, and the like.

[1] CIC 1130; 1131, §2.
[2] CCEO 1378–1382.
[3] Canon 1151. See cc. 1152–1153 for the legitimate causes for separation.
[4] Canon 134, §3.
[5] Canon 1671.
[6] Canon 1672.

The diocesan bishop may also grant permission for the spouses to approach the civil forum in those places where the civil sentence of separation is not contrary to the divine law. The divine law, for example, on the indissolubility and unity of marriage and the obligations of parents toward their children may not be contradicted by any civil sentence of separation.

The Judicial Process

Canon 1693 — §1. Unless a party or the promoter of justice requests the ordinary contentious process, the oral contentious process is to be used.

If the judicial process is chosen, the law prescribes that the oral contentious process be used (cc. 1656–1670). The spouses or the promoter of justice may exercise their right to choose the ordinary contentious process instead, if they so desire (cc. 1501–1655).

§2. If the ordinary contentious process has been used and an appeal is proposed, the tribunal of second grade, observing what is required, is to proceed according to the norm of can. 1682, §2.

If an appeal is proposed, and the ordinary contentious process was used, the appellate tribunal is either to confirm the decision at once by decree or admit the case to an ordinary examination in a new grade. If an appeal is proposed, and the oral contentious process was used, the appellate tribunal is also to proceed in accord with the oral contentious process.[7] Even with two concordant sentences, a case concerning the separation of spouses never becomes res iudicata.[8]

Competence of the Tribunal

Canon 1694 — The prescripts of can. 1673 are to be observed in what pertains to the competence of the tribunal.

The competence of the tribunal is determined by canon 1673, whether the oral or the ordinary contentious process is used. The case is tried before a single judge, who may associate two assessors with himself in the case.[9]

Reconciliation of the Spouses

Canon 1695 — Before accepting the case and whenever there is hope of a favorable outcome, the judge is to use pastoral means to reconcile the spouses and persuade them to restore conjugal living.

The spouses have the duty and the right to preserve conjugal living,[10] and pastoral means are to be used to help them maintain common life. Separation is the last resort.

The Promoter of Justice

Canon 1696 — Cases concerning the separation of spouses also pertain to the public good; therefore the promoter of justice must always take part in them according to the norm of can. 1433.

The participation of the promoter of justice is required for the validity of the acts of the case, whether the administrative or the judicial process is used. The public good is at stake in these cases because separation seriously alters the life of the spouses, the children, the family, and society.

CHAPTER III
PROCESS FOR THE DISPENSATION OF A MARRIAGE RATUM ET NON CONSUMMATUM
[cc. 1697–1706]

In this chapter the 1983 code systematically presents the norms for the dispensation of a marriage that has been ratified but not consummated. The presentation here is markedly different from [7] Canons 1670, 1640.

[8] Canons 1643–1644.
[9] Canons 1424, 1657.
[10] Canon 1151.

that found in the 1917 code. In the old code, the norms for the administrative process for dispensation from a ratified and non-consummated marriage were mixed together with the norms for the judicial process for cases of nullity of marriage.[11] In the new code the two processes are treated separately.

The ten canons in this chapter have as their primary sources the 1917 code and two major instructions issued by the Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments on May 7, 1923[12] and March 7, 1972.[13] Since the promulgation of the 1983 code the congregation has issued new norms in the form of a circular letter on December 20, 1986, to assist bishops in the instruction of this process.[14]

The Eastern code contains one canon on the process for the dispensation from a ratified and non-consummated marriage. That canon simply directs that the special norms issued by the Apostolic See are to be followed in instructing these cases.[15]

The Right to Petition

Canon 1697 — Only the spouses, or one of them even if the other is unwilling, have the right to petition for the favor of a dispensation from a marriage ratum et non consummatum.

This is a fundamental principle, found in the 1917 code and repeated in the major instructions.[16] The right to petition for the dispensation is limited to the spouses to the marriage. The spouses together may request the dispensation. If only one spouse requests the dispensation and the other party, namely, the respondent, is unwilling to participate after having been cited, then the respondent is declared absent in accord with canon 1592 and the case proceeds.

The Right to Decide

Canon 1698 — §1. Only the Apostolic See adjudicates the fact of the non-consummation of a marriage and the existence of a just cause to grant a dispensation.

The exclusive competence of the Apostolic See to adjudicate these cases is well established in the old code and in subsequent documents.[17] The Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments recommends to the pope the granting of the favor of the dispensation, after it has determined both that the fact of the non-consummation is proved and that there exists a just cause to grant the dispensation. The absence of either of these elements renders the dispensation of no benefit to the one who receives it.[18]

The Right to Grant a Dispensation

§2. Only the Roman Pontiff, however, grants the dispensation.

Although the congregation has the responsibility of studying the case and recommending to the pope the granting of the favor of a dispensation, it remains the exclusive prerogative of the pope to grant the dispensation. This is an exercise of the supreme ministerial authority of the Roman Pontiff.

[11] CIC Book IV, part one, title XX.

[12] SCSacr, decr Catholica doctrina and Regulae servandae in processibus super matrimonio rato et non consummato, May 7, 1923, AAS 15 (1923) 389–413. Translation in CLD 1, 764–792.

[13] SCSacr, instr Dispensationis matrimonii, March 7, 1972, AAS 64 (1972) 244–252. Translation in CLD 7, 988–997.

[14] CDWDS, littcirc De processu super matrimonio rato et non consummato, December 20, 1986, ME 112 (1987) 423–429. Translation in W. Woestman, Special Marriage Cases (Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1994) 121–128.

[15] CCEO 1384.

[16] CIC 1119, 1973; Regulae servandae, art. 5, §1; Dispensationis matrimonii, I, b.

[17] CIC 249, §3; 1962; Regulae servandae, art. 1; Dispensationis matrimonii, I.

[18] Regulae servandae, art. 103; Dispensationis matrimonii, I, f.

The Petition

Canon 1699 — §1. The person competent to accept a libellus seeking a dispensation is the diocesan bishop of the domicile or quasi-domicile of the petitioner, who must arrange for the instruction of the process if the petition is well founded.

Under the 1917 code, in order to instruct a process regarding dispensation, the diocesan bishop had to request the faculty each time from the Apostolic See.[19] It was only with the 1972 instruction from the congregation that the diocesan bishop was granted the general faculty in his own territory to draw up the process.[20] The new code in the present canon incorporates this competence of the diocesan bishop.

The canon names the diocesan bishop of the place in which the petitioner has a domicile or quasi-domicile as the competent person to accept a petition. In addition, the 1986 circular letter from the congregation has extended competence also to the bishop of the place in which most of the proofs in fact must be collected, provided that he requests the prorogation of competence in each case from the congregation and that the bishop of the place where the petitioner has a domicile or quasi-domicile consents.[21]

If, during the examination of a petition for dispensation, a prudent doubt arises concerning the validity of the marriage itself, the bishop is to advise the spouses to choose the judicial path if one of the spouses wishes to proceed with a case for marriage nullity, or else to arrange for the process for dispensation to continue if the case has good foundation.[22]

Upon receiving the petition for dispensation, if there is a hope of reconciling the spouses, the bishop is to urge the spouses to resolve their differences and restore conjugal living.[23]

[19] CIC 1963, §1.
[20] Dispensationis matrimonii, I.
[21] De processu, n. 1.
[22] Ibid., n. 3.
[23] Ibid., n. 4.

Difficult Cases

§2. If the proposed case has special difficulties of the juridical or moral order, however, the diocesan bishop is to consult the Apostolic See.

Some cases of non-consummation are especially difficult to prove. These require prior consultation with the congregation before the bishop can proceed with the instruction of the case. Consultation is required in cases where there was an uncompleted conjugal act, conception through the absorption of semen, resort to artificial insemination, the birth of a child, a defect in the human fashion of consummating the marriage, the danger of scandal or of financial loss connected with the granting of the favor, and other such difficulties.[24]

The new requirement in canon 1061, §1 that the consummation of marriage take place by a conjugal act performed in a human fashion has been taken into account in the process for the dispensation from a ratified and non-consummated marriage. In its plenary congregation in April 1986, the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments decided to use the following criteria in those cases where a defect of consummation in a human fashion is alleged:

> Following the conclusions of the Plenary Congregation mentioned above, which were approved by the Supreme Pontiff, this Congregation uses the following mode of solving the cases submitted to it, namely that for the consummation of marriage, there must be a human act on the part of each party, but it is sufficient that it be virtually voluntary, provided that it is not demanded violently. Other psychological elements, which would make the human act easier or more loving, are not taken into account.[25]

[24] Ibid., n. 2. For the thinking of the congregation regarding difficult cases, see G. Orlandi, I "Casi Difficili" nel Processo Super Rato (Padua: Cedam, 1984). See also B. Marchetta, Scioglimento del Matrimonio Canonico per Inconsumazione (Padua: Cedam, 1981) 22–161.

In approving these conclusions, the pope reserved to himself the right to establish more exact criteria in individual cases, to determine if there was sufficient voluntariness for the consummation, and to decide if it is suitable to grant the dispensation.[26] Because the dispensation is always a favor freely granted by the pope and not a right demanded by the parties, the pope enjoys broad discretion regarding these criteria.

Based on the conclusions of the congregation we can say that a spouse is incapable of performing the human act required for consummation if he or she is deprived of all awareness during the conjugal act. This can happen when the party is under the intoxicating influence of drugs or alcohol. Likewise, a spouse is incapable of performing the human act required for consummation if will and freedom are taken away. This happens when the party is the victim of physical violence and the consummation takes place against the person's will.

Recourse

§3. Recourse to the Apostolic See is available against a decree by which a bishop rejects a libellus.

If the bishop rejects the petition, recourse to the expertise of the congregation could help clarify the merits of the case in order to determine if the case should be accepted.

The Forum for Instruction

Canon 1700 — §1. Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1681, the bishop is to entrust the instruction of these processes either in a stable manner or in individual cases to his tribunal, that of another diocese, or a suitable priest.

The diocesan bishop enjoys the ordinary competence to accept the petition and arrange for the instruction of the process. The bishop will want to make sure that the instruction is in capable hands. For that reason, he enjoys the discretion of utilizing his own tribunal, another tribunal, or a suitable priest to carry out this instruction.

§2. If a judicial petition to declare the nullity of the same marriage has been introduced, however, the instruction is to be entrusted to the same tribunal.

Competence to instruct the case for the dispensation is always given to the tribunal that is considering nullity, whether the instruction of the petition for a dispensation started before or after the nullity case was introduced.[27] Having the proceedings take place in one tribunal helps assure that a marriage case will not be instructed in two different processes at the same time and that a dispensation will not be granted for a marriage that has been declared null.[28]

The Defender of the Bond

Canon 1701 — §1. The defender of the bond must always intervene in these processes.

The task of the defender of the bond is to propose and explain everything which reasonably can be brought forth against the dissolution of the marriage.[29] The defender can introduce questions for the parties, witnesses, and experts to answer and can be present at their examination. When the instruction has been completed, the defender examines all the records of the case and presents obser-

[25] De processu, introduction. RRAO 1987, 63.

[26] R. Melli, "Breve Commentarium ad Litteras Circulares 'De Processu Super Matrimonio Rato et Non Consummato,'" ME 112 (1987) 431.

[27] De processu, n. 5.

[28] Melli, "Breve Commentarium," 432.

[29] Canon 1432.

vations on whether the fact of non-consummation has been proved and whether there is sufficient cause to grant a dispensation.[30]

The Legal Expert

§2. A legal representative is not admitted, but because of the difficulty of a case, a bishop can permit the petitioner or the respondent to have the assistance of a legal expert.

Because the process for dispensation is administrative and not contentious in nature, an advocate is not allowed to participate. To admit an advocate would confuse the administrative process with the judicial process. More appropriate to the administrative process is the participation of a legal expert. Recognizing the fact that non-consummation is at times difficult to prove, the code allows a legal expert to participate in difficult cases.

The bishop is the person competent to designate the legal expert, who may be chosen ex officio or at the request of one of the parties.[31] The duty of the legal expert is to help the parties introduce the case and assist the parties in gathering the proofs. In the event that the congregation responds that non-consummation has not been established from the materials presented, canon 1705, §3 allows the legal expert to inspect all the acts of the case at the tribunal, except for the votum of the bishop, to help the parties produce new proofs in order to resubmit their petition.[32]

Proofs

Canon 1702 — In the instruction each spouse is to be heard, and the canons on the collection of proofs in the ordinary contentious trial and in cases of the nullity of marriage are to be observed insofar as possible, provided that they can be reconciled with the character of these processes.

The integrity of the process demands that each spouse be heard during the instruction of the case. Thus, the respondent must always be cited. The congregation will reject a case for dispensation that has been instructed without the knowledge of the respondent. If the respondent does not respond to the citation, he or she is declared absent in accord with canon 1592 and the case proceeds.[33]

The canons on the collection of proofs in the ordinary contentious trial (cc. 1526–1586) and in cases of the nullity of marriage (cc. 1678–1680) assist the instructor in presenting the moral argument and the physical argument for non-consummation. The moral argument relies on the testimony given by the parties, witnesses, and experts, on authentic documents, and on inferences from circumstances and presumptions. The physical argument relies on the physical examination of the man or the woman, and confirms the proof offered by the moral argument. The physical examination may be omitted if moral certitude of the non-consummation of the marriage can be reached by the moral argument alone.

Serious Contradictions among Proofs

Canon 1703 — §1. There is no publication of the acts. If the judge perceives that the proofs brought forward seriously hinder the request of the petitioner or the exception of the respondent, however, he is prudently to inform the interested party.

Unlike the practice in marriage nullity cases, where publication of the acts is required, the general rule in the process for a dispensation from a ratified and non-consummated marriage is that [30] Canons 1533, 1561, 1678; Regulae servandae, arts. 28, 98.

[31] Dispensationis matrimonii, II, e.
[32] De processu, n. 6.
[33] B. Marchetta, "Il Processo 'Super Matrimonio Rato et Non Consummato' nel Nuovo Codice di Diritto Canonico," in Dilexit Iustitiam, ed. Z. Grocholewski and V. C. Orti (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1984) 410.

the acts are not published. The acts are secret because of the delicate nature of the testimony. However, in the interest of arriving at the truth of the fact of non-consummation and of the existence of a just cause for granting the dispensation, the judge is obliged to inform the parties if any of the proofs brought forward seriously contradict their testimony. The interested party may then request to see a particular document or testimony in order to present observations to correct any falsehoods or errors.

§2. The judge can show a document introduced or a testimony received to a party who requests it and set a time to present observations.

As the person entrusted by the bishop with the instruction of the case, the judge has the responsibility of deciding whether or not it is proper to show a particular document or testimony to a party who requests it.[34] It is also the responsibility of the judge to determine the time for the party to present his or her observations.

The Votum of the Bishop

Canon 1704 — §1. When the instruction has been completed, the instructor is to give all the acts along with a suitable report to the bishop, who is to prepare a votum on the veracity of the fact of the non-consummation, the just cause for the dispensation, and the suitability of the favor.

When the instructor has completed his task, he hands all the acts of the case over to the bishop. The bishop has the responsibility of writing a votum to accompany the case to the Apostolic See. The bishop may personally prepare this opinion, or he may accept and make his own an opinion which was written by the vicar general or the episcopal vicar, to whom he had generally delegated by special mandate the faculty to write such opinions.[35]

In the preparation of his votum, the bishop has access to all the acts of the case, as well as the "suitable report" from the instructor. Lest it unduly influence the opinion of the bishop, the report of the instructor does not enter into the merits of the case, but merely narrates a summary of the entire process in order to assist the bishop in writing his opinion.[36]

The bishop must identify in his votum a just cause for granting the dispensation. Some reasons recognized as just causes in the practice of the congregation are profound aversion of the spouses to each other, the fear of continuing dissension and strife between the spouses, scandal due to another civil marriage already contracted by one of the spouses, the danger of incontinence for one party due to a civil divorce obtained by the other party, the danger of incontinence for one party due to the probable impotence of the other party, a serious and incurable contagious disease contracted after the wedding, the existence of a defect of consent or of another impediment to the marriage, and the danger of perversion. These or some other proportionately serious reason concerning the special circumstances of the parties are grounds for a just cause to grant the dispensation.[37]

In addition to weighing the fact of non-consummation and the just cause for the dispensation, the bishop must also consider the suitability of the favor, the absence of scandal, the possible wonderment of the faithful or any kind of damage that could result from granting the favor, and any other consequences related to the good of souls and the restoration of peace to consciences. He must explicitly refer to these pastoral concerns in his votum.[38]

§2. If the instruction of the process has been entrusted to another tribunal according to the norm of can. 1700, the observations in favor of the [34] Regulae servandae, art. 97, §2.

[35] De processu, n. 23a.

[36] Ibid., n. 21. Marchetta, "Il Processo 'Super Matrimonio Rato et Non Consummato,'" 427.

[37] Marchetta, Scioglimento, 17–18.

[38] De processu, n. 23c.

bond are to be made in the same forum; the votum mentioned in §1, however, pertains to the entrusting bishop, to whom the instructor is to hand over a suitable report together with the acts.

The entrusting bishop prepares the votum, since he can best attest to the effect the concession of the papal dispensation will have on the faithful of his own diocese. The entrusting bishop is able to verify the suitability of the favor and the absence of scandal.

Transmission of the Acts

Canon 1705 — §1. The bishop is to transmit to the Apostolic See all the acts together with his votum and the observations of the defender of the bond.

The responsibility for the case rests with the bishop who first accepted the petition. It is he who arranges for the instruction of the case, and it is he who finally has the responsibility of sending all the acts of the completed instruction along with his votum to Rome. The Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments commences its study of the case to determine if the fact of non-consummation has been proved and if a just cause for granting the dispensation has been given.[39]

Supplemental Instruction

§2. If supplemental instruction is required in the judgment of the Apostolic See, this requirement will be communicated to the bishop with an indication of the points on which the instruction must be completed.

Supplemental instruction is required if the congregation judges that sufficient information is lacking to decide on the fact of non-consummation or the existence of a just cause. The congregation assists the bishop by informing him of exactly which points of the instruction need to be clarified or completed. Before the case is returned to the congregation, the bishop is requested to prepare a new votum and the defender of the bond is asked to prepare new observations taking into account the supplemental instruction.

Second Presentation

§3. If the Apostolic See replies that non-consummation has not been established from the materials presented, then the legal expert mentioned in can. 1701, §2 can inspect the acts of the process, though not the votum of the bishop, at the tribunal to consider whether any grave reason can be brought forth in order to resubmit the petition.

If the congregation replies that non-consummation has not been established (non constare), the parties may resubmit the petition for another examination if they have significant new proofs to offer. They may request the aid of a legal expert to inspect the acts of the case and to assist them in gathering new testimonies and documents. Access to the votum of the bishop is denied to the legal expert because of the confidential nature of the bishop's opinion regarding the case.

If the congregation replies negatively to the petition, the parties may not resubmit the petition for another examination. The congregation rejects the petition with a negative when the acts of the case show the marriage is not in fact non-consummated or there is no just cause for the dispensation.[40]

Rescript, Notification, and Recording

Canon 1706 — The Apostolic See transmits the rescript of the dispensation to the bishop who will notify the parties about the rescript and also as soon as possible will order the pastor both of the place where the marriage was contracted and of [39] For sample forms of the acts, see Woestman, Special Marriage Cases, 150–174.

[40] Marchetta, Scioglimento, 109, n. 5.

the place of baptism to note the granting of the dispensation in the marriage and baptismal registers.

The rescript of the dispensation is effective from the moment the pope grants the dispensation on the day of his audience with the prefect of the congregation.[41] The bishop fulfills his final responsibilities in the case by receiving the rescript, notifying the parties, and ordering the appropriate notations in the marriage and baptismal registers.

CHAPTER IV PROCESS IN THE PRESUMED DEATH OF A SPOUSE [c. 1707]

In this chapter the code presents the outline of a process for use in attaining moral certitude of the death of a missing spouse when no authentic document can be found to prove the fact of death. The process for a declaration of presumed death is included in the title on special marriage processes because a declaration of this sort is usually sought by a surviving spouse who wishes to enter a new marriage.

The canon is new in the present code. There was no comparable treatment of this material in the 1917 code. The primary source for the canon is the 1868 instruction Matrimonii vinculo of the Holy Office, which contained norms for ecclesiastical superiors to use when instructing cases of presumed death of a spouse.[42] Since the promulgation of the 1983 code, no legal developments have taken place concerning this process.

The Eastern code contains one canon on this process, and it is substantially the same as the present canon except in two regards. In paragraph three of the Eastern canon, an eparchial bishop exercising his power within the territorial boundaries of a patriarchal church is directed to consult the patriarch in uncertain and complex cases; other eparchial bishops are to consult the Apostolic See. The Eastern canon also adds a paragraph four, which states that the process in the presumed death of a spouse requires the intervention of the promoter of justice but not of the defender of the bond.[43]

Declaration of Presumed Death

Canon 1707 — §1. Whenever the death of a spouse cannot be proven by an authentic ecclesiastical or civil document, the other spouse is not considered free from the bond of marriage until after the diocesan bishop has issued a declaration of presumed death.

The partner who wishes to remarry after the death of a spouse is the object of the special pastoral solicitude of the Church. Freedom to marry is normally established by an authentic ecclesiastical or civil document certifying the death of the other spouse. If the party has no authentic document proving the death of the other spouse, the Church establishes the freedom of the party to marry by issuing a declaration of the presumed death of the other spouse. The effect of this declaration is that the party is permitted to enter a new marriage.[44]

A declaration of presumed death does not dissolve a marriage. Only death can dissolve a ratified and consummated marriage.[45] Therefore, if a spouse who was presumed to be dead is later found to be alive, the other party must separate from the second partner and return to the first spouse. In this case, the bond of the first marriage never in fact ceased to exist because the absent spouse was not dead, and the second marriage is invalid because of the impediment of prior bond.

[41] Regulae servandae, art. 103.

[42] SCOf, instr Matrimonii vinculo, May 13, 1868, AAS 2 (1910) 199–203. Translation in Woestman, Special Marriage Cases, 141–144; and in W. Doheny, Canonical Procedure in Matrimonial Cases (Milwaukee: Bruce, 1944) 2:593–596.

[43] CCEO 1383.

[44] For a sample decree of presumed death, see L. Wrenn, Decisions, 2nd rev. ed. (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1983) 197–198.

[45] Canon 1141.

Proofs and Moral Certainty

§2. The diocesan bishop is able to issue the declaration mentioned in §1 only if, after having carried out appropriate investigations, he attains moral certitude of the death of the spouse from the depositions of witnesses, from rumor, or from evidence. The absence of a spouse alone, even for a long time, is not sufficient.

The diocesan bishop, either personally or through his delegate, is to conduct the investigations necessary to arrive at moral certitude concerning the death of a spouse. The bishop may conduct these investigations by means of an administrative process or a judicial process, but the administrative process is the ordinary and more convenient way to proceed.[46]

The depositions of at least two witnesses who knew the deceased and who agree on the fact of death, the place of death, and the circumstances of death provide the best evidence for a declaration of presumed death. Lacking this evidence, the testimony of hearsay witnesses who learned of the death at a non-suspect time, the use of presumptions regarding the age, the condition of health, and the moral character of the person, as well as a study of the circumstances of the disappearance of the person, a respectable rumor of death, and inquiry through newspaper notices may all help provide the moral certitude the bishop needs to presume that the spouse is dead.[47] Long-time absence by itself, without the support of other evidence, is not a sufficient criterion in canon law for a presumption of death, even though this criterion often suffices in civil law.

Uncertain and Complicated Cases

§3. The bishop is to consult the Apostolic See in uncertain and complicated cases.

If, after carrying out the investigations, the bishop still cannot arrive at moral certitude of the death of the spouse, the bishop is to consult the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments.

TITLE II
CASES FOR DECLARING THE NULLITY OF SACRED ORDINATION
[cc. 1708–1712]

The primary sources for this title are the 1917 code and the instruction issued by the Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments on June 9, 1931.[48] The 1917 code and the 1931 instruction covered the nullity of sacred ordination and the nullity of obligations inherent in sacred orders together. The 1983 code, on the other hand, addresses the nullity of sacred ordination alone in this present title. Thus, the treatment of the material is more focused. Since the promulgation of the 1983 code, no legal developments have taken place concerning this process.

The Eastern code covers the material on the nullity of sacred ordination in three canons. Its presentation is very similar to the presentation in this title, except in two regards. The Eastern code omits the canon concerning the competence of the [46] Doheny, Canonical Procedure in Matrimonial Cases, 2: 596–597; M. Said, "De Processu Praesumptae Mortis Coniugis," in Dilexit Iustitiam, ed. Z. Grocholewski and V. C. Orti (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1984) 450.

[47] For a fuller discussion of each of these elements of the investigation, see the Holy Office instruction Matrimonii vinculo. For a study of some particular cases decided by the Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments, see Doheny, Canonical Procedure in Matrimonial Cases, 2:609–614; CLD 1, 508–511, and CLD 5, 507–508; and Stud Can 32 (1998) 229–239.

[48] CIC 1993–1998; SCSacr, decr Ut locorum Ordinarii and Regulae servandae in processibus super nullitate sacrae Ordinationis vel onerum sacris Ordinibus inhaerentium, June 9, 1931, AAS 23 (1931) 457–492. Translation in CLD 1, 812–832.

defender of the bond. Also, the Eastern code explicitly states that the canons on the summary contentious process cannot be used.[49]

The Right to Petition

Canon 1708 — The cleric himself, the ordinary to whom the cleric is subject, or the ordinary in whose diocese the cleric was ordained has the right to challenge the validity of sacred ordination.

The validity of sacred ordination may be challenged for a variety of reasons. The ordination may be invalid because the cleric was not a baptized male, did not have the intention of receiving sacred orders, or lacked consent because of force or because of a mental defect.[50] Sacred ordination may be invalid because the ordaining bishop himself was not validly ordained, or did not have the intention to ordain.[51] Sacred ordination may also be invalid because the essentials of the sacred rite were not observed.[52]

The cleric himself has the right to challenge the validity of his ordination. This right to challenge is also given to the particular ordinaries named in the canon in order that the public good be safeguarded.

The Petition

Canon 1709 — §1. The libellus must be sent to the competent congregation which will decide whether the congregation of the Roman Curia itself or a tribunal designated by it must handle the case.

The petition for a declaration of nullity is addressed to the Holy Father, and is sent to the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments or, in the case of a cleric of an Eastern church sui iuris, to the Congregation for the Eastern Churches. If the case involves a substantial defect of the sacred rite, the petition is sent to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.[53]

The competent congregation decides whether the administrative process or the judicial process will be used. If the administrative process is used, the congregation will usually delegate an ordinary to draw up the instruction.[54]

§2. Once the libellus has been sent, the cleric is forbidden to exercise orders by the law itself.

The immediate effect of sending the petition is the prohibition of the exercise of orders.

The Judicial Process

Canon 1710 — If the congregation refers the case to a tribunal, the canons on trials in general and on the ordinary contentious trial are to be observed unless the nature of the matter precludes it and without prejudice to the prescripts of this title.

If the congregation chooses to have the case instructed by a judicial process, then the tribunal which is selected must use the canons on trials in general (cc. 1400–1500) and the canons on the ordinary contentious trial (cc. 1501–1655), as well as the canons of this title as the framework for the instruction.

The Defender of the Bond

Canon 1711 — In these cases the defender of the bond possesses the same rights and is bound by the same duties as the defender of the marriage bond.

The defender of the bond of sacred orders is bound by office to propose and explain everything which reasonably can be brought forth

[49] CCEO 1385–1387.
[50] Canons 1024, 1026; Regulae, arts. 17; 46, §2; 62, §2; 68.
[51] Canon 1012.
[52] Canon 1009, §2.
[53] CIC 1993, §1; V. Pospishil, Eastern Catholic Church Law (Brooklyn: St. Maron Publications, 1993) 630.
[54] Regulae, art. 7.

against the nullity of ordination.[55] The defender takes part in the process whether the case follows the administrative path or the judicial path.

Two Conforming Affirmative Sentences

Canon 1712 — After a second sentence has confirmed the nullity of sacred ordination, the cleric loses all rights proper to the clerical state and is freed from all obligations.

[55] Canon 1432.

By a double conforming affirmative sentence the cleric loses the clerical state, and with it all the rights and obligations proper to the clerical state.[56]

Since a case for nullity of ordination concerns the status of a person, the case never becomes res iudicata. Recourse can be made for a new presentation of the case if new and grave proofs or arguments are brought forward.[57]

[56] Canon 290, 1°.
[57] Canons 1643–1644.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cases of Separation of Spouses (cc. 1692–1696)

Articles

Diego-Lora, C. de. "Las Causas de Separación de Cónyuges según el Nuevo Código." In Dilexit Iustitiam, ed. Z. Grocholewski and V. C. Orti, 389–403. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1984.

García Faílde, J. J. "Juicio de Separación Conyugal." In Nuevo derecho procesal canónico. Salamanca: Universidad Pontificia de Salamanca, 1984.

Process for the Dispensation of a Marriage Ratum et Non Consummatum (cc. 1697–1706)

Sources

CDWDS. Littcirc De processu super matrimonio rato et non consummato, December 20, 1986. ME 112 (1987) 423–429.

SCSacr. Decr Catholica doctrina and Regulae servandae in processibus super matrimonio rato et non consummato, May 7, 1923, AAS 15 (1923) 389–413.

SCSacr. Instr Dispensationis matrimonii, March 7, 1972, AAS 64 (1972) 244–252.

Reference Works

Jugis, P. A Canonical Analysis of the Meaning of Humano Modo in Canon 1061, §1. CanLawStud 541. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1993.

Marchetta, B. Scioglimento del Matrimonio Canonico per Inconsumazione. Padua: Cedam, 1981.

Orlandi, G. I "Casi Difficili" nel Processo Super Rato. Padua: Cedam, 1984.

Woestman, W. Special Marriage Cases. Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1994.

Articles

Marchetta, B. "Il Processo 'Super Matrimonio Rato et Non Consummato' nel Nuovo Codice di Diritto Canonico." In Dilexit Iustitiam, ed. Z. Grocholewski and V. C. Orti, 405–430. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1984.

Melli, R. "Breve Commentarium ad Litteras Circulares 'De Processu Super Matrimonio Rato et Non Consummato.'" ME 112 (1987) 430–434.

Process in the Presumed Death of a Spouse (c. 1707)

Sources

SCOf. Instr Matrimonii vinculo, May 13, 1868, AAS 2 (1910) 199–203.

Reference Works

Doheny, W. Canonical Procedure in Matrimonial Cases. Vol. 2. Milwaukee: Bruce, 1944.

Woestman, W. Special Marriage Cases. Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1994.

Wrenn, L. Decisions. 2nd rev. ed. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1983.

Articles

Said, M. "De Processu Praesumptae Mortis Coniugis." In Dilexit Iustitiam, ed. Z. Grocholewski and V. C. Orti, 431–455. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1984.

Cases for Declaring the Nullity of Sacred Ordination (cc. 1708–1712)

Sources

SCSacr. Decr Ut locorum Ordinarii and Regulae servandae in processibus super nullitate sacrae Ordinationis vel onerum sacris Ordinibus inhaerentium, June 9, 1931, AAS 23 (1931) 457–492.

Reference Works

Pospishil, V. Eastern Catholic Church Law. Brooklyn: St. Maron Publications, 1993.

Articles

Ferrara, V. "Le Conseguenze della Sentenza di Dichiarazione di Nullità della Sacra Ordinazione dei Chierici nel Canone 1712." Apol 68 (1995) 567–586.

Moroni, A. "Spunti sull'Ordo Sacer e le Relative Cause di Invalidità nella Nuova Codificazione Canonica." In Dilexit Iustitiam, ed. Z. Grocholewski and V. C. Orti, 457–472. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1984.

TITLE III
METHODS OF AVOIDING TRIALS
[cc. 1713–1716]

It is important to note the context for these canons on methods of avoiding a trial: they come at the end of the part on certain special processes, following the canons on trials in general, the ordinary contentious trial, and the oral contentious process, but before the canons on the penal process and administrative recourse. The title and placement suggest that these methods are intended for avoiding a contentious trial in the ordinary contentious judicial process, i.e., a trial before a judge in an ecclesiastical tribunal (cc. 1501–1696).

In practice, however, ordinary contentious trials are used today almost exclusively for marriage annulment cases and only very rarely for other types of controversies between Christians.[1] There are several reasons for this. One is that St. Paul's exhortation that Christians should not summon other members of the faith community into a civil court (1 Cor 6:1–6) was written in a historical context in which the judges and other personnel in the civil courts were comprised entirely of non-believers; furthermore, the legal system itself was based on non-Christian principles.[2] Today, however, many civil legal systems are themselves evolutionary products of ecclesiastical courts[3] and, at times, even use principles and terminology derived from canon law.[4] Also, the personnel of civil courts often are now themselves believers, acting out of a Judeo-Christian belief system and seeking to imbue the secular order with their religious values.[5] It would be overly optimistic to suggest that such efforts have been successful in transforming civil legal institutions in accordance with the demands of faith. Nevertheless, the legal concerns of Christians and the institutions of civil courts today are not necessarily incompatible, except when the latter are oppressive or hostile to the faith. Thus, recourse to civil courts by Christians against a peer is not always seen today as an evil to be avoided, e.g., when two Christians are involved in an automobile accident and one sues the other in civil court for damages.[6] In fact, as long as civil laws are not contrary to divine law or unless canon law provides otherwise, canon law often defers to civil laws (c. 22), especially civil contract law (c. 1290), labor laws (cc. 231, §2 and

[1] See M. Moodie, "Defense of Rights: Developing New Procedural Norms," J 47 (1987) 446.

[2] See C. T. Craig and J. Short, "The First Epistle to the Corinthians: Introduction, Exposition and Exegesis," in The Interpreter's Bible, ed. G. Buttrick et al. (New York: Abingdon, 1953) 10:69–71.

[3] See M. Cappelletti, J. Merriman, and J. Perillo, The Italian Legal System (Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University, 1967) 9–52; and H. Berman, Law and Revolution: The Formation of the Western Legal Tradition (Cambridge: Harvard University, 1983) 85–226.

[4] This is true not only in the continental civil law systems, but in the "common law" systems of English-speaking nations as well: "Already in Edward I's day the phrase 'common law' is current. It is a phrase that has been borrowed from the canonists—who used 'jus commune' to denote the general law of the Catholic Church; it describes that part of the law that is unenacted, non-statutory, that is common to the whole land and to all Englishmen. It is contrasted with statute, with local custom, with royal prerogative." F. W. Maitland, "Equity," in E. Re, Equity and Equitable Remedies: Cases and Materials (Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press, University Casebook Series, 1975) 2. (First published as F. W. Maitland, Equity [London: Macmillan, 1909].)

[5] See W. Droel, The Spirituality of Work: Lawyers (Chicago: National Center for the Laity, 1989).

[6] See W. Bassett, "Christian Rights in Civil Litigation: Translating Religion into Justiciable Categories," J 46 (1986) 229; and A. Adams and W. Hanlon, "Jones v. Wolf: Church Autonomy and the Religion Clauses of the First Amendment," University of Pennsylvania Law Review 128 (1980) 1291. While civil suits between Christians need not always be shunned, this should not be construed, however, as encouraging unwarranted litigation.

1286), prescription (cc. 197–199 and 1268–1270), the laws of wills and inheritance (c. 1299, §2), and probably also tort law (compensation for negligent and intentional harms and injuries; see c. 128).[7] As ecclesiastical courts have relinquished jurisdiction in these areas to the civil courts, diocesan tribunals are generally neither prepared to hear such matters nor to enforce injunctions or execute judgments for damages.[8]

Accordingly, most Christians today are more likely to sue a fellow Christian in civil court to vindicate a right than to bring an action for a contentious trial in a diocesan tribunal. The exception would be in the limited number of cases where a person feels his or her rights as a Christian have been violated by a peer in the community; however, canon 1400, §2 precludes the use of the judicial process when the alleged violation of rights arose from an "act of administrative power." In this case the process of administrative recourse must be used (cc. 1732–1739).

Although controversies between Christians are rarely litigated these days in a contentious judicial trial, the following canons provide helpful norms for resolving disputes through less formal means such as conciliation and arbitration.

Alternative Dispute Resolution

Canon 1713 — In order to avoid judicial contentions an agreement or reconciliation is employed usefully, or the controversy can be committed to the judgment of one or more arbitrators.

Transactio, or settlement, is "an agreement by which a controversial matter is settled without a formal trial."[9] Reconciliatio here is not meant in the sacramental sense of reconciliation, but in the more generic sense of conciliation or mediation between disputing parties. An arbitrator is a neutral party by whose decision the disputing parties have agreed in advance to be bound. Throughout Book VII, the use of conciliators, mediators, or arbitrators is encouraged to avert the ordinary contentious trial (c. 1446), the oral contentious process (c. 1659), marriage nullity cases (c. 1676), cases involving the separation of spouses (c. 1695), and administrative recourse (c. 1733). These methods of resolving controversies while avoiding a formal trial are commonly known as alternative dispute resolution.[10]

Process to Be Followed

Canon 1714 — For an agreement, a compromise, and an arbitrated judgment, the norms selected by the parties or, if the parties have selected none, the law laid down by the conference of bishops, if there is such a law, or the civil law in force in the place where the agreement is entered into is to be observed.

Compromissum is "a mutual agreement to be bound by the decision of an arbitrator."[11] Canon 1714 allows the parties in a dispute to select the norms to guide the process of conciliation, mediation, or arbitration. In practice, the parties most likely will agree to follow a process established by the national episcopal conference, the local diocesan bishop, or some civil authority.[12]

[7] T. Molloy and J. Folmer, "The Canonization of Civil Law," CLSAP 46 (1983) 46.

[8] See J. Beal, "Protecting the Rights of Lay Catholics," J 47 (1987) 157–158; and J. Coriden, "A Challenge: Make the Rights Real," J 45 (1985) 21.

[9] L. Stelten, Dictionary of Ecclesiastical Latin (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson, 1995), s.v. "transactio."

[10] The notion of "alternative dispute resolution" is discussed more fully in the commentary on c. 1733.

[11] Cassel's Latin Dictionary (1977), s.v. "compromissum."

[12] For example, see NCCB, On Due Process, rev. ed. (Washington, D.C.: NCCB, 1972); Archdiocese of Chicago, Office of Conciliation: Norms and Procedures (Chicago: Archdiocese of Chicago, 1987); R. Fleming, The Labor Arbitration Process (Urbana, Ill.: University of Illinois, 1965); American Arbitration Association, Labor Arbitration: Procedures and Techniques (New York: American Arbitration Association, 1979); and American Arbitration Association, Voluntary Labor Arbitration Rules (New York: American Arbitration Association, 1979).

Matters Not Subject to Agreement or Arbitration

Canon 1715 — §1. An agreement or compromise cannot be made validly concerning matters which pertain to the public good and other matters about which the parties cannot make disposition freely.

§2. For temporal ecclesiastical goods, the formalities established by law for the alienation of ecclesiastical goods are to be observed whenever the matter demands it.

While many objects of dispute can be resolved by agreement of the parties or by decision of an arbitrator, canon 1715 removes certain subject matters from the scope of alternative dispute resolution, viz., matters pertaining to the public good, such as cases involving the nullity of marriage and the nullity of sacred orders. Thus, the parties to a marital dispute could obviously agree on their own or through conciliation to resolve their differences and resume conjugal life, but they could not on their own or through any form of alternative dispute resolution conclude that their marriage was invalid.

Just as obviously, two parties cannot on their own decide the rights or interests of some third party. Similarly, if parties to a property dispute mutually agree to resolve their differences by alienating temporal ecclesiastical goods from one party to another, the canonical formalities on alienation (cc. 1291–1298) must still be observed if the matter would otherwise require this.

Civil and Canonical Effects of Arbitration

Canon 1716 — §1. If the civil law does not recognize the force of an arbitrated sentence unless a judge confirms it, an arbitrated sentence in an ecclesiastical controversy, in order to have force in the canonical forum, needs the confirmation of an ecclesiastical judge of the place where it was rendered.

§2. If civil law permits the challenge of an arbitrated judgment before a civil judge, however, the same challenge can be proposed in the canonical forum before an ecclesiastical judge competent to judge the controversy in the first grade.

The assumption of canon 1716 is that the civil law norms for arbitration are being followed in a given case. The object of this canon, then, is for the effects of arbitration to mirror each other in both civil law and canon law. Thus, if civil law requires a judge to confirm an arbitrator's decision in order for it to be recognized as civilly binding and effective, then canon law will also require a local ecclesiastical judge to confirm the arbitrator's decision in order for it to be recognized as canonically binding and effective. Conversely, if civil law allows an arbitrator's decision to be challenged before a judge in a civil court, canon 1716, §2 allows it to be challenged before the competent ecclesiastical judge in the proper canonical forum.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

American Arbitration Association. Labor Arbitration: Procedures and Techniques. New York: American Arbitration Association, 1979.

———. Voluntary Labor Arbitration Rules. New York: American Arbitration Association, 1979.

Archdiocese of Chicago. Office of Conciliation: Norms and Procedures. Chicago: Archdiocese of Chicago, 1987.

Fleming, R. The Labor Arbitration Process. Urbana, Ill.: University of Illinois, 1965.

NCCB. On Due Process. Rev. ed. Washington, D.C.: NCCB, 1972.

Part IV
THE PENAL PROCESS
[cc. 1717–1731]

Tribunal practitioners normally work almost exclusively with marriage nullity procedures (cc. 1671–1691), since such cases constitute by far the main agenda of church tribunals. However, certain tragic ecclesial developments during the past decade and a half (e.g., clerical sex abuse cases) have highlighted the importance of the Church's penal processes. Such processes are geared toward clarifying the existence of a delict, assessing the imputability of the defendant, and declaring or imposing an appropriate penalty.

Hopefully such processes will be used only rarely, i.e., when it is necessary to deal with serious breaches of faith and order. The following observations clarify the main features of such penal processes to assist practitioners in their ministry. Such observations must be situated within the broad framework of the commentary on Book VII.

The canons on the penal process are found in both Books VI and VII of the code. Canons 1717–1731 of Book VII must be read especially in connection with the commentary on canons 1341–1353 of Book VI on applying penalties.

The fifteen canons on the penal process are divided into three chapters. The first chapter on the preliminary investigation (cc. 1717–1719) deals with the appointment of a preliminary investigator after an allegation of a delict (c. 1717), the ordinary's subsequent decision regarding the appropriateness of a penal process (c. 1718), and the custody of the acts of the investigation (c. 1719). The second chapter on the development of the penal process (cc. 1720–1728) briefly considers the administrative process (c. 1720) but highlights the preferred judicial process (cc. 1721–1728). This chapter notes certain procedural principles and clarifies certain rights of the defendant; however, most of the relevant canons are found in the general norms on trials in general and on the ordinary contentious trial (cc. 1400–1655). Finally, the third chapter (cc. 1729–1731) governs an action for damages by one adversely affected by an ecclesiastical delict.[1]

The following schema attempts to sketch briefly the interrelationship between the aforementioned books of the code:

- prior investigation regarding necessity and appropriateness of penal process: canons 1717, 1719.
- decision whether to initiate penal process: canons 1718, 1341–1342, 1362.
- details of administrative penal process: canon 1720.
- details of judicial penal process: canons 1721–1728.
- exercise of discretion by penal authority in issuing administrative penal decree or judicial penal sentence: canons 1343–1346, 1349.
- appeal or recourse against penal sentence or decree: canons 1353, 1727.
- situation of one subject to a penalty after a sentence or decree: canons 1350–1353.
- related issue of action for damages distinct from the criminal action to declare latae sententiae penalty or impose ferendae sententiae penalty: canons 1729–1731.

[1] For brief reflections on changes from the 1917 code, see T. Green, in CLSA Com, 1023.

CHAPTER I
THE PRELIMINARY INVESTIGATION
[cc. 1717–1719]

Initiation of the Investigation[2]

Canon 1717 — §1. Whenever an ordinary has knowledge, which at least seems true, of a delict, he is carefully to inquire personally or through another suitable person about the facts, circumstances, and imputability, unless such an inquiry seems entirely superfluous.

§2. Care must be taken so that the good name of anyone is not endangered from this investigation.

§3. The person who conducts the investigation has the same powers and obligations as an auditor in the process; the same person cannot act as a judge in the matter if a judicial process is initiated later.

The penal process is not to be undertaken lightly given its potentially detrimental legal-pastoral consequences for the accused, i.e., the curtailment of the exercise of one's rights (c. 96). Before the process can be initiated, there must be a strong probability that an ecclesiastical delict has been committed. It is unjust to penalize someone merely because of an allegation of a delict. This clearly violates the right to one's good reputation (c. 220) and the right not to be penalized except according to law (c. 221, §3). Hence the code generally calls for a preliminary investigation to clarify such a probability in a given case. However, few details are mentioned regarding the specifics of such an investigation, which is not technically part of the penal process but related to it.[3]

The formal responsibility for initiating such an investigation rests with ecclesiastical authority and not with private individuals (§1). While the canon speaks of the "ordinary" (c. 134, §1) and hence theoretically of vicars general and episcopal vicars, practically speaking it probably means bishops and major superiors of pontifical clerical religious institutes and societies of apostolic life. Such an investigation is related to their preeminent responsibility for fostering the well-being of the diocese or religious institute or society and ensuring compliance with church discipline (cc. 392, 618–619).

Despite the importance of protecting the well-being of the community, the code is particularly concerned about safeguarding the reputation of the person(s) accused of an ecclesiastical delict (§2; c. 220). The investigation must be carried out discreetly and sensitively to preclude damaging anyone's good name. This key value is to be fostered especially by the person(s) conducting the preliminary investigation. Realistically speaking, most bishops would probably not conduct such an inquiry any more than they would be significantly involved in marriage cases. Such an investigator, a cleric or a lay person,[4] is comparable to an auditor gathering evidence but not making the final decision in a regular judicial process (c. 1428). In the interests of judicial objectivity, the preliminary investigator may not validly serve as a judge in a subsequent judicial process (§3).

[2] Cf. CCEO 1468. For Eastern penal procedure, see T. Green, "Penal Law in the Code of Canon Law and in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches: Some Comparative Reflections," Stud Can 28 (1994) 442–444.

[3] For helpful reflections on the preliminary investigation, especially in clerical sex abuse cases, see Canonical Delicts Involving Sexual Misconduct and Dismissal from the Clerical State (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1995) 8–10. See also the commentary on c. 1395, §2. For samples of helpful forms pertinent to conducting such an investigation and initiating a subsequent penal process, see G. Ingels, "Processes Which Govern the Application of Penalties," in Clergy Procedural Handbook, ed. R. Calvo and N. Klinger (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1992) 230–237.

[4] The following observation seems pertinent to cases of alleged clerical sex abuse: "Although the investigator need not be a priest, a priest may be more effective in speaking with those concerned, especially the accused; on the other hand, persons specially trained in dealing with children and their parents may be more effective for those persons. Thus, in some cases a team approach may be advisable, provided there is coordination of information and an assessment by one knowledgeable about the canonical process," (Canonical Delicts, 9).

The preliminary investigation is geared to ascertaining whether there are solid grounds for judging that an ecclesiastical delict (e.g., cc. 1364–1399) has been committed. The investigator should carefully inquire about the character and background of the accuser(s) and differentiate facts from rumor, suspicion, opinion, the personal propensities of the accused, or even his/her past behavior (c. 1572). This investigation resembles the preliminary investigation in a marriage nullity case, which seeks to determine if there is a sufficient basis to pursue such a case.

The preliminary inquiry should examine the relevant facts of the case, factors affecting the imputability of the accused (cc. 1322–1327), and possible canonical and civil damages. In other words, this investigation should clarify an initial profile of the alleged delict. While the code does not explicitly require a written report from the investigator, it is implicitly presupposed (c. 1719). The investigator presents his or her findings to the ordinary, who ultimately makes the decision about the penal process in light of the pertinent legal-pastoral facts.[5]

However, such an investigation may be superfluous if the facts regarding a legal violation are notorious. In such a case, the ordinary can immediately assess the factors influencing his decision regarding a possible penal process (c. 1718).

At this point, whether the investigation has been conducted or not, it is not necessary that the alleged delict be certain; it suffices that there be a strong probability that it has been committed. This is different from evidence about the ineffective ministry of an officeholder, which may warrant disciplinary action (e.g., removal) but not a penalty. The determination of the existence of a delict with moral certitude (i.e., beyond a reasonable doubt) is the task of the subsequent penal process.

[5] See the canons on the judge-expert relationship in the formal judicial process (cc. 1574–1581).

Decree of Ordinary Regarding the Penal Process[6]

Canon 1718 — §1. When it seems that sufficient evidence has been collected, the ordinary is to decide:

1° whether a process to inflict or declare a penalty can be initiated;

2° whether, attentive to can. 1341, this is expedient;

3° whether a judicial process must be used or, unless the law forbids it, whether the matter must proceed by way of extrajudicial decree.

§2. The ordinary is to revoke or change the decree mentioned in §1 whenever new evidence indicates to him that another decision is necessary.

§3. In issuing the decrees mentioned in §§1 and 2, the ordinary is to hear two judges or other experts of the law if he considers it prudent.

§4. Before he makes a decision according to the norm of §1 and in order to avoid useless trials, the ordinary is to examine carefully whether it is expedient for him or the investigator, with the consent of the parties, to resolve equitably the question of damages.

This canon deals with the situation after the aforementioned investigation has been completed or deemed superfluous. The most basic issue is this: do the facts warrant a penal process (§1, 1°)? Perhaps the original complaint prompting the investigation was frivolous or vindictive, or perhaps there are indications but no solid evidence of an ecclesiastical delict. In such instances a process might not be warranted; however, in the latter case quasi-penal measures such as a warning, a rebuke, or a penance might appropriately foster the spiritual good of the alleged offender and the ecclesial community (cc. 1339–1340).

The ordinary also must determine whether a criminal action may be impossible because the statute of limitations for initiating it has run out

[6] Cf. CCEO 1469, §1–§3.

(prescription).[7] If so, the ordinary may decide to employ the aforementioned quasi-penal measures.

In other instances, however, although a process may be warranted and there is evidence of an ecclesiastical delict, such a process may not be expedient (§1, 2°). The Church's well-being and that of the offender might be better served by legal-pastoral measures other than a penal process, for penalties are to be imposed only as a last resort when all other legal-pastoral measures (e.g., fraternal correction, rebuke, therapy) have failed to repair scandal, restore justice, and reform the offender (c. 1341).

If a penal process is justified, other considerations then come into play. The code clearly favors a judicial process (c. 1342, §1) because it better safeguards the common good of the Church and provides more effective legal protections for all concerned. However, for a just cause to be considered very carefully, the ordinary may use an administrative process unless the law specifically requires a judicial process (§1, 3°; c. 1342, §2), e.g., perpetual penalties such as privation of office or dismissal from the clerical state.[8]

The personal and ecclesial significance of this issue requires the ordinary to be open to new evidence possibly altering his initial decision regarding the process (§2).[9] He should consult two judges or other legal experts before making his decision although, unlike the administrative penal process (c. 1720, 2°), the law does not oblige him to do so (§3).[10] Such experts should help to clarify especially the canonical and possible civil law ramifications of the case and foster informed decision-making.

This decision regarding the penal process follows the general rules on administrative decrees (cc. 35–58). For example, canon 50 requires the ordinary to seek out the necessary information and proofs and, insofar as possible, to hear those whose rights could be injured by the decree, e.g., the accused. Canon 51 requires a written decree with at least a summary expression of the reasons for the decision. Whether a process is conducted or not, the ordinary needs to terminate the investigation through a reasoned decree assessing the pertinent data.

The Latin and Eastern codes differ somewhat regarding the involvement of the accused during this pre-process phase. The Latin code does not explicitly require such involvement, although the aforementioned canon 50 implicitly calls for such. However, the Eastern code explicitly requires the hierarch to hear both the accused and the promoter of justice before deciding about the process (CCEO 1469, §3). This Eastern provision provides better for the fundamental right of defense so strongly emphasized in marriage cases and equally, if not more, relevant to penal cases.

In this general context another point seems noteworthy. Canon 1728, §2 protects the accused against self-incrimination during the penal process. However, the code's concern to protect the accused's reputation (c. 220) is equally relevant during the pre-process phase of any such investigation. Otherwise he or she might be pressured into admitting imputability with detrimental ecclesiastical and civil consequences. While access to canonical counsel is explicitly required only after the process has been initiated (c. 1723), a serious respect for the right of defense requires such counsel even during the preliminary investigation.

Finally, to avoid needless processes (c. 1446), the ordinary may resolve a claim for damages equitably either personally or through the aforementioned investigator, who presumably knows the situation well. In other words, a penal process may be unnecessary if the only issue is repairing certain damages, e.g., pastor's violation of a parish employee's job security or compensation rights (c. 1389). However, such a solution may not be imposed on unwilling parties; in such cir-

[7] See commentary on canon 1362. "Initiating an action" means formally citing the accused, which technically initiates the process (c. 1517).

[8] See commentary on c. 1342.

[9] See also cc. 1724 on dropping a penal case and 1726 on declaring the innocence of the accused.

[10] A similar concern for informed decision-making is operative in removal- or transfer-of-pastor procedures (cc. 1742, §1; 1745, 2°; 1750).

cumstances a formal judicial process may be necessary to resolve the complaint for damages (cc. 1729–1731).

Custody of the Acts[11]

Canon 1719 — The acts of the investigation, the decrees of the ordinary which initiated and concluded the investigation, and everything which preceded the investigation are to be kept in the secret archive of the curia if they are not necessary for the penal process.

Frequently the acts of the investigation and decrees of the ordinary are necessary for the penal process and are subsequently incorporated into the acts of the case by judicial decree. However, such a process may not be warranted because of the innocence of the accused, the presence of evidentiary problems, or the inappropriateness of a penal process to deal with the problem. In such a situation the aforementioned documents must be placed in the diocesan secret archives (c. 489). This is because of the sensitive nature of such materials regarding the alleged delict and the possible imputability of the accused and their potentially damaging effect on his/her reputation (c. 220).

Although no process may be conducted, the maintenance of such acts in the archives ensures their availability if a new accusation subsequently prompts a penal process or if it is necessary to prove to the civil court that the Church handled an accusation responsibly.

CHAPTER II
THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE PROCESS
[cc. 1720–1728]

The Latin and Eastern codes differ somewhat in organizing the penal process. This chapter of the Latin code deals very briefly with the administrative process (c. 1720) and somewhat more extensively with the judicial process (cc. 1721–1728). Title 28 of the Eastern code on imposing penalties (CCEO 1468–1487) contains two chapters, a lengthier one on the penal trial (CCEO 1468–1485) and a very brief one on imposing penalties by extrajudicial (administrative) decree (CCEO 1486–1487).

Canon 1728, §1 states that the rules on trials in general and on ordinary contentious trials are generally operative here, especially the norms governing cases affecting the public good.[12]

This chapter is concerned both with vindicating the procedural rights of the accused and protecting the well-being of the community during the process. Out of respect for human dignity and freedom, the present code requires a process to impose most penalties. It drops a former questionable provision enabling a superior to prohibit a cleric from exercising his ministry or remove him from office without a process (CIC 2222, §2).[13]

Administrative Penal Process[14]

Canon 1720 — If the ordinary thinks that the matter must proceed by way of extrajudicial decree:

1° he is to inform the accused of the accusation and the proofs, giving an opportunity for self-defense, unless the accused neglected to appear after being properly summoned;

2° he is to weigh carefully all the proofs and arguments with two assessors;

[11] Cf. CCEO 1470.

[12] This fundamental canon should begin this chapter rather than end it. As a general provision it resembles the norms on formal marriage nullity cases. The aforementioned rules on contentious trials are operative there with due regard for the canons on marriage nullity cases (cc. 1671–1691) and on cases affecting the public good (c. 1691).

[13] The superior had the right and duty to employ these measures even if the delict were only probable or the statute of limitations for a criminal action had run out. Another similarly questionable procedure, the suspension of a cleric ex informata conscientia (from an informed conscience) (CIC 2186–2194), has also been dropped.

[14] Cf. CCEO 1486.

3° if the delict is certainly established and a criminal action is not extinguished, he is to issue a decree according to the norm of cann. 1342–1350, setting forth the reasons in law and in fact at least briefly.

At the outset one should recall that canon 1342 favors a judicial process unless a just cause precludes such. Furthermore, perpetual penalties such as dismissal from the clerical state and privation of office cannot be imposed administratively.

The general norms on administrative decrees (cc. 35–58) are relevant here, but were deemed insufficient to regulate the specifics of the administrative penal process. Accordingly, this canon guarantees the accused's right of self-defense, requires official consultation before the ordinary's decision, and calls for a reasoned decision applying the law to the pertinent facts. Hopefully these measures will preclude arbitrary penal decisions.

The involvement of the accused here is required by the basic right to be informed of proposed actions which might prejudicially affect one's rights and the right of self-defense (1°). If the accused chooses not to exercise that right, however, the ordinary or his delegate may decide the case. While the code does not explicitly require access to counsel as in the judicial process (c. 1481, §2), such access seems indispensable for a knowledgeable exercise of the right of defense in light of the accusation and the various proofs of such introduced in the process (c. 221).

The code here explicitly refers to assessors (c. 1424). By their canonical and/or civil counsel, such clerics or lay persons can clarify the pertinent issues in the case although they do not decide it. Hopefully their input will facilitate an informed decision by the ordinary, who, however, is not bound by their advice (c. 127, §2, 2°).[15]

Finally, if there is moral certitude (c. 1608, §1) about the delict and the criminal action has not been prescribed (c. 1362), the ordinary is to issue an appropriate penal decree in light of certain canons on applying penalties (cc. 1342–1350).[16] If such moral certitude is not attained, the accused is to be dismissed as absolved. Any such decree should succinctly clarify the relevant substantive, penal, and procedural canons and the pertinent facts to which the law is to be applied.[17]

Recourse against a penal decree follows the ordinary rules on administrative recourse (cc. 1732–1739). First of all, the ordinary issuing the decree is to be asked to revoke it. Should he refuse, recourse then is to be taken to his hierarchical superior. If the bishop is the penalizing authority, such recourse must be taken to a Roman congregation depending on the nature of the issue.[18] In any event, such recourse has a suspensive effect (c. 1353). Hence the defendant need not observe the penalty unless the ordinary's action is sustained by his superior.

The other canons in this chapter concern the judicial penal process, yet some of the above considerations are also relevant to that process. Furthermore, certain judicial process norms are somewhat pertinent to the administrative process, e.g., rules of evidence (cc. 1526–1586).

Role of the Promoter of Justice[19]

Canon 1721 — §1. If the ordinary has decreed that a judicial penal process must be initiated, he is to hand over the acts of the investigation to the promoter of justice who is to present a libellus of accusation to the judge according to the norm of cann. 1502 and 1504.

§2. The promoter of justice appointed to the higher tribunal acts as the petitioner before that tribunal.

[15] See also cc. 1742, §1; 1745, 2°; 1750.

[16] See the pertinent commentary.

[17] In the absence of specific rules on formulating such a decree, see c. 1612 on drafting a judicial sentence.

[18] For the competency of the various Roman dicasteries, including congregations, see the commentary on c. 360, which discusses the June 1988 apostolic constitution of John Paul II Pastor bonus reorganizing the Roman Curia.

[19] Cf. CCEO 1472.

The promoter of justice (c. 1430) initiates the judicial process at the request of the ordinary, who is to forward the acts of the preliminary investigation. Such acts presumably constitute a prima facie case against the accused. The promoter is institutionally responsible for fostering the public good, whose protection occasionally requires a penal process. He or she generally enjoys the same rights and is bound by the same obligations as the petitioner in a marriage case (c. 1434). The promoter is basically to support the accusation, organize the pertinent proofs, argue the case for a penalty, and appeal the decision if appropriate.

The promoter initially prepares a libellus, or petition of accusation, according to law (§1; cc. 1502, 1504). Without such a petition there can be no process (c. 1501). The petition should briefly indicate the purpose of the promoter's activity, i.e., the declaration or imposition of a penalty, and succinctly present the evidence that a delict has been committed. The burden of proof is on the promoter to demonstrate this to the tribunal with moral certitude; otherwise the defendant is to be dismissed and a non constat decision rendered (c. 1608, §4).

At the appellate level, the second instance promoter functions in the same way as the promoter in first instance given the similarity of functions in both instances (§2).

Restrictions on the Accused[20]

Canon 1722 — To prevent scandals, to protect the freedom of witnesses, and to guard the course of justice, the ordinary, after having heard the promoter of justice and cited the accused, at any stage of the process can exclude the accused from the sacred ministry or from some office and ecclesiastical function, can impose or forbid residence in some place or territory, or even can prohibit public participation in the Most Holy Eucharist. Once the cause ceases, all these measures must be revoked; they also end by the law itself when the penal process ceases.

[20] Cf. CCEO 1473.

Most of the canonical concerns noted thus far have primarily related to the accused. This canon, however, focuses on protecting the community against the potentially disruptive activities of the former. It empowers the ordinary (not the judge) at any stage of the process, but not before it, to restrict the defendant's exercise of ecclesiastical office or public participation in the Eucharist.[21] Theoretically he or she may also be prevented from living in a certain place (e.g., rectory where priest has been living) or ordered to live in a given place, e.g., retreat house.

Such measures reflect a concern for the integrity of the process, e.g., protecting the freedom of witnesses and expediting the course of justice. In addition, the accused may cause potential scandal by giving others the occasion for spiritual ruin or leading them to sin. Such restrictive measures are not to be taken lightly, and the right of the accused not to be unduly burdened is to be carefully honored. This is evident from both the required consultation of the promoter of justice by the ordinary and the required citation of the accused. With the aid of counsel, he or she may be able to challenge successfully the alleged reasons for such measures. However, if the accused does not appear in court, the provisions envisioned here can still be implemented.[22]

Furthermore, such measures are to be rescinded when there is no longer a reason for them, and they automatically cease at the end of the process. It is illegitimate to impose them indefinitely on an accused without any real relationship to a process, for, practically speaking, this is tantamount to imposing a perpetual expiatory penalty without a process.

The imposition of such "administrative leave" requires an administrative decree governed by the [21] For a thoughtful examination of this canon, see J. Beal, "Administrative Leave: Canon 1722 Revisited," Stud Can 27 (1993) 293–320, esp. 314–315. He argues persuasively that the measures envisioned here are operative only after a formal process has been initiated, not during the preliminary investigation. He also suggests certain legal-pastoral provisions which may help to protect the community during that investigation.

[22] See the commentary on cc. 1592–1595.

rules on such decrees (cc. 35–58). Unlike the 1917 code (CIC 1959), the present code permits administrative recourse against such a decree according to the usual rules (cc. 1732–1739). However, unlike recourse against a penalty declared or imposed administratively, which has a suspensive effect (c. 1353), recourse against such restrictions does not have a suspensive effect; the accused must observe the restrictions specified here during the recourse. However onerous, they are not technically penalties presupposing a delict, although they are imposed during a criminal trial.

The code does not technically admit such measures during the preliminary investigation. If they are employed then, it would have to be according to particular law with appropriate protections of the accused. The welfare of the community may indeed require limiting the exercise of some rights by the accused before the process begins. However, the sweeping restrictions of canon 1722 may be unjustified, since the concerns underlying it may be able to be addressed by other less onerous measures. For example, the ordinary may issue a penal precept prohibiting contact of the accused with witnesses, use the penal remedies of warning and rebuke (c. 1339), closely supervise the accused (CCEO 1428; CIC 2311), or restrict certain faculties. Such measures may sufficiently protect both the rights of the community and those of the accused.

Counsel for the Defendant[23]

Canon 1723 — §1. The judge who cites the accused must invite the accused to appoint an advocate according to the norm of can. 1481, §1 within the time limit set by the judge.

§2. If the accused does not make provision, the judge is to appoint an advocate before the joinder of the issue; this advocate will remain in this function as long as the accused does not appoint an advocate personally.

Fundamental fairness requires that the defendant enjoy the services of counsel in protecting his or her interests especially given the risk of a serious penalty. If the defendant does not choose an advocate, the judge must appoint one before the joinder of the issue (cc. 1513–1516) so that the former's right to defense may be effectively exercised throughout the process (c. 1481, §1–§2). The court-appointed advocate functions as long as the defendant neglects to choose someone else.[24] Should such counsel not be provided, any sentence would probably be irremediably null due to a lack of the right of defense (c. 1620, 7°).

Renunciation of the Penal Trial[25]

Canon 1724 — §1. At any grade of the trial the promoter of justice can renounce the trial at the command of or with the consent of the ordinary whose deliberation initiated the process.

§2. For validity the accused must accept the renunciation unless the accused was declared absent from the trial.

This provision is a specific example of the general rules on renouncing a trial (cc. 1524–1525). The preeminent role of the ordinary who initiated the penal process (c. 1718) is evident here. Without his initiative or approval, the promoter of justice cannot renounce the trial at any stage. Perhaps the initial allegations prove to be unfounded, or there are insoluble conflicts among the witnesses or experts. In any event, it may become clear that the criminal action cannot be pursued successfully and hence should be terminated.

Nevertheless, the trial cannot be renounced validly without the defendant's consent. Once the trial commences with the citation of the defendant (c. 1517), a procedural relationship is established between the promoter of justice (petitioner) and the defendant (respondent). That relationship cannot normally be fundamentally altered without the consent of both parties. To restore his or her reputation, which is somewhat impaired by the process, the defendant may insist on its completion and preferably a declaration of innocence (c. 1726). However, if the defendant has been formally declared absent from the trial because of a lack of cooperation with the court (cc. 1592–1595), the trial may be renounced even without his or her consent.

[23] Cf. CCEO 1474.

[24] In connection with the accused's right of defense, one might note that the accuser's name does not have to be revealed initially to the accused. If, however, a given accusation were used as a proof in the process, the accuser would technically be a witness, and his or her name would then be revealed to the accused (Comm 12 [1980] 194). While the code does not normally envision the confrontation of the parties and witnesses in a case, occasionally this is possible under the judge's direction to resolve testimonial conflicts (c. 1560, §2).

[25] Cf. CCEO 1475.

Last Word for the Defendant[26]

Canon 1725 — In the discussion of the case, whether done in written or oral form, the accused, either personally or through the advocate or procurator, always has the right to write or speak last.

The code's concern to highlight the exercise of the right of defense is evident in this provision for the defendant to have the last word before the case is resolved. This equitable provision is relevant to the so-called discussion phase of the trial (cc. 1601–1605) just before the decision is rendered. Such a right to the last word orally or in writing may be exercised personally by the defendant or more likely by his or her advocate given the latter's legal expertise. This right of the defendant modifies the normal right of the promoter to reply a second time to the responses of the parties during this stage of the trial (c. 1603, §3).

Absolution of the Defendant[27]

Canon 1726 — If at any grade and stage of the penal trial it is evidently established that the accused did not commit the delict, the judge must declare this in a sentence and absolve the accused even if it is also established that criminal action has been extinguished.

The basic legal interest in protecting the reputation of the defendant (c. 220) explains this requirement that the judge declare the defendant's innocence as soon as it is clear from the acts and proofs in the case. This is true at any grade of the trial (e.g., first or second instance) or at any stage (e.g., the gathering of evidence or the discussion of the case). This is also true even if the statute of limitations for a criminal action has run out (c. 1362). It is not enough simply to terminate the trial, for without such a formal declaration of innocence there might still be a continuing cloud over the reputation of the defendant. Such a declaration differs from a negative (non constat) decision, which still could leave such a cloud since it may indicate simply that insufficient evidence of a delict has been introduced.

Appeal by Defendant/Promoter[28]

Canon 1727 — §1. The accused can propose an appeal even if the sentence dismissed the accused only because the penalty was facultative or because the judge used the power mentioned in cann. 1344 and 1345.

§2. The promoter of justice can appeal whenever the promoter judges that the repair of scandal or the restoration of justice has not been provided for sufficiently.

Generally speaking, the usual rules on the appeal (cc. 1628–1640) apply to penal trials. Unlike marriage nullity cases (c. 1682, §1) there is no mandatory review of any penal sentence, affirmative or negative. Hence all penal appeals are at the discretion of the parties involved. The present canon contains several points regarding such appeals.

The canon does not explicitly mention the obvious case of an appeal, i.e., when the defendant is found guilty of a delict and penalized accordingly without any exercise of judicial discretion.

[26] Cf. CCEO 1478.

[27] Cf. CCEO 1482.

[28] Cf. CCEO 1481.

On the contrary, paragraph one deals with various exercises of such discretion. First of all, the defendant may not be penalized because the penalty for the delict was discretionary (e.g., c. 1391) and the judge chose not to impose a penalty (c. 1343). Second, the delict may have been committed, but the judge chose to abstain from imposing an obligatory penalty, impose a lighter penalty, defer its imposition, or suspend its observance due to various imputability-mitigating factors (cc. 1344–1345, 1324). The defendant may appeal such decisions, however benign, to obtain a declaration of innocence by a higher court (c. 1726).

The promoter of justice may also appeal a decision that does not seem to serve the public good adequately, i.e., the reparation of scandal and/or restitution of justice (§2). This does not refer simply to a declaration of innocence. The guilt of the defendant may be established, but no penalty may be imposed or lesser measures such as penal remedies or penances (cc. 1339–1340) may be employed in accord with judicial discretion.

As in the administrative penal process, any appeal against a sentence declaring or imposing a penalty has a suspensive effect (c. 1353). Hence the full effects of a latae sententiae penalty need not be observed until the sentence declaring it has been confirmed by the appellate court.[29] Similarly, a ferendae sententiae penalty need not be observed prior to a similar confirmation.

Pertinent Canons/ Self-Incrimination Privilege[30]

Canon 1728 — §1. Without prejudice to the prescripts of the canons of this title and unless the nature of the matter precludes it, the canons on trials in general and on the ordinary contentious trial must be applied in a penal trial; the special norms for cases which pertain to the public good are also to be observed.

§2. The accused is not bound to confess the delict nor can an oath be administered to the accused.

The first paragraph has been commented on earlier.[31] Systematically speaking, paragraph one should have been placed immediately after canon 1720, since it affects the remaining canons in this chapter.

The right of protection against self-incrimination (c. 220) means that the accused should not be required to take an oath or confess the alleged delict during the process (§2). This somewhat qualifies canon 1531, §1 requiring parties legitimately questioned to tell the whole truth. While the accused may freely confess the delict, he or she should have access to counsel throughout the process and not be pressured into such a confession.

Such a protection against self-incrimination is also relevant to the administrative penal process and during the preliminary investigation when such a confession may also be highly prejudicial. With due regard for the presumption of imputability when the law has been violated (c. 1321, §3), it is basically the promoter's task to prove the commission of the delict with moral certitude (c. 1608).

CHAPTER III ACTION TO REPAIR DAMAGES [cc. 1729–1731]

Conditions for the Action for Damages[32]

Canon 1729 — §1. In the penal trial itself an injured party can bring a contentious action to repair damages incurred personally from the delict, according to the norm of can. 1596.

§2. The intervention of the injured party mentioned in §1 is not admitted later if it was not made in the first grade of the penal trial.

[29] See, for example, the different effects of a latae sententiae excommunication before and after it is declared (c. 1331, §1–§2).

[30] Cf. CCEO 1471.

[31] See introductory comments prior to chapter 2 on the development of the process.

[32] Cf. CCEO 1483.

§3. The appeal in a case for damages is made according to the norm of cann. 1628-1640 even if an appeal cannot be made in the penal trial; if both appeals are proposed, although by different parties, there is to be a single appellate trial, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1730.

Hopefully the following brief reflections should sufficiently clarify the key implications of canons 1729–1731.[33] There is a possible separate action for damages suffered as a result of a given delict (e.g., abuse of office—c. 1389), prescinding from, even if related to, the aforementioned penal process.[34] In fact the first two canons here envision the linking of such a criminal action and the action for damages since they presuppose the intervention of the allegedly aggrieved party during the criminal action (c. 1596). Such an intervention seeking compensation for damages must take place during the first instance of that action; otherwise it is not admissible although it may occur after that action is completed (c. 1729, §1–§2).

Like an appeal from the penal sentence, the appeal in a case for damages follows the usual rules governing the ordinary contentious process (cc. 1628–1640). Furthermore, there can be an appeal in the case for damages although one is not filed against the penal sentence, since they are independent actions involving possibly distinct appellants (c. 1729, §3). To expedite matters both appeals are normally to be addressed in a single appellate trial except for the provision of the next canon.

Deferral of the Action for Damages[35]

Canon 1730 — §1. To avoid excessive delays in the penal trial the judge can defer the judgment for damages until he has rendered the definitive sentence in the penal trial.

§2. After rendering the sentence in the penal trial, the judge who does this must adjudicate for damages even if the penal trial still is pending because of a proposed challenge or the accused has been absolved for a cause which does not remove the obligation to repair damages.

While the action for damages and the criminal action are usually handled simultaneously, the contentious action for damages may be deferred to expedite the criminal action, whose completion may be more urgent for the welfare of the community (c. 1730, §1). The two trials, however, are separate entities, and a decision in the criminal action does not exempt the first instance court from dealing with the action for damages (c. 1730, §2). Hence this latter action is to be addressed promptly although the criminal action is still pending due to a proposed challenge, e.g., an appeal or perhaps a complaint of nullity (cc. 1619–1627). This is also true if the defendant has been acquitted for a reason that does not take away the obligation of repairing damages. For example, the judge may abstain from imposing a penalty because of certain mitigating circumstances if the offender's spiritual well-being may be better fostered otherwise (c. 1345). However, the damage done to the community or to certain individuals may still need to be repaired.

Effect of Penal Sentence on the Action for Damages[36]

Canon 1731 — Even if the sentence rendered in a penal trial has become a res iudicata, it in no way establishes the right of the injured party unless this party has intervened according to the norm of can. 1729.

Conceivably the action for damages might not be pursued along with the criminal action as is envisioned in the prior two canons. If the sentence in that action has become a res iudicata or an adjudged matter (c. 1641), that does not prejudice [33] See J. Martin, in CLSGBI Com, 959–960, for some brief but helpful reflections on this issue.

[34] See c. 128 on the obligation to repair the damage done by a malicious or negligent act illegitimately damaging another.

[35] Cf. CCEO 1484.

[36] Cf. CCEO 1485.

the initiating of an independent action for damages. The penal sentence affects only the parties involved in that trial, i.e., the promoter and the defendant and no one else including a possibly aggrieved third party (c. 16, §3). Such an independent action for damages may be treated somewhat expeditiously using the oral contentious process (cc. 1656–1670) unless one party insists on the ordinary contentious process. In such actions the one seeking damages is the petitioner and the one accused of causing damage through the delict is the respondent.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The bibliographical material at the end of Books VI and VII gives a fairly thorough list of significant penal and procedural references. However, the following additional penal procedural sources may be useful.

Beal, J. "To Be or Not To Be: That Is the Question. The Rights of the Accused in the Canonical Penal Process." CLSAP (1991) 77–97.

———. "Administrative Leave: Canon 1722 Revisited." Stud Can 27 (1993) 293–320.

Canonical Delicts Involving Sexual Misconduct and Dismissal from the Clerical State. Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1995.

Ingels, G. "Processes Which Govern the Application of Penalties." In Clergy Procedural Handbook, ed. R. Calvo and N. Klinger, 206–237. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1992.

Martin, J. In CLSGBI Com.

Various authors in Com Ex IV/2, 953–960.

Part V
THE METHOD OF PROCEEDING IN ADMINISTRATIVE RECOURSE AND IN THE REMOVAL OR TRANSFER OF PASTORS
[cc. 1732–1752]

One of the more noteworthy features of the 1983 Code of Canon Law is the inclusion of listings of the rights and obligations of Christians (e.g., cc. 208–231 and 273–289). The identification and articulation of rights are only the first steps toward ensuring that these rights are honored. Without adequate means of vindicating and defending rights, the effect of recognizing them would be nugatory.

The importance of effective procedures for protecting rights quickly became evident in the early history of the United States. Defending the broad powers given to courts of justice in the new Constitution of the United States, Alexander Hamilton wrote, "Without this all the reservation of particular rights or privileges would amount to nothing."[1] This realization was not, however, an original discovery of the American Federalists. It had already been recognized by the great medieval canonist Henry de Susa Cardinal Hostiensis, who observed: "It is of little use to have rights in society unless there is someone to administer justice."[2]

Effective and practical ways must also be provided to pursue claims of injustice in the Church today. Archbishop Zenon Grocholewski, Prefect of the Supreme Tribunal of the Apostolic Signatura, has pointed out: "The proclamation of the rights of the faithful in the Church would be in vain if there were not the possibility of an adequate defense of such rights."[3]

Even the most eloquent assertions of rights lack substance and life unless there are effective administrative procedures to vindicate rights when they have been violated. In fact, it is vitally important for steps to be taken to prevent violations of the rights of Christians in the first place. Even when adequate remedies are available, violations of rights themselves create injustices harmful to the Christian community, and remedies are often at best imperfect attempts at reparation and reconciliation. Steps to prevent rights violations from occurring include education of church personnel and administrators about rights in the Church. Personal attitudes and a spirituality mindful of charity and justice are also indispensable elements which help prevent violations of rights.[4] In addition, diocesan policies can provide for consultation and other checks against arbitrary decisions and other abuses of authority.[5]

Protective measures or "prior process" to prevent violations of rights before they occur include confining, structuring, and checking authority to help prevent both rigid juridicism and discretionary arbitrariness.[6] Among the elements of "prior process" are consultation, communication of relevant information, and written findings

[1] A. Hamilton, J. Madison, and J. Jay [Publius, pseud.], The Federalist: A Commentary on the Constitution of the United States, 78 (1788; reprint, New York: Modern Library, 1945) 505.

[2] Quoted in C. Gallagher, Canon Law and the Christian Community: The Role of Law in the Church according to the Summa Aurea of Cardinal Hostiensis (Rome: Typis Pontificiae Universitatis Gregorianae, 1978) 162.

[3] Z. Grocholewski, "Aspetti Teologici dell'Attività Giudiziaria della Chiesa," ME 110 (1985) 197.

[4] See J. Provost, "Promoting and Protecting the Rights of Christians: Some Implications for Church Structure," J 46 (1986) 314.

[5] See J. Beal, "Confining and Structuring Administrative Discretion," J 46 (1986) 70–106.

[6] See J. Beal, "Protecting the Rights of Lay Catholics," J 47 (1987) 132–133.

and reasons. Consultation provides a means, before a decision is made, for authority to hear the views of those who may be affected by that decision. Adequate and reliable information is needed as a basis for the authority's decision to ensure that it achieves its goal and to prevent it from having unforeseen and unintended consequences. Those affected by administrative decisions also need adequate and reliable information to bring their behavior into conformity with them and to defend themselves if they are accused of acting contrary to them. By rendering the underlying rationale for decisions more comprehensible, written findings of fact and reasons help those affected by these decisions to accept and comply with them. Findings and reasons are required to also provide demonstrable evidence that the decisions of those exercising authority are well grounded.

Unfortunately, in an imperfect world there are no measures which can wholly prevent wrongs from occurring. Accordingly, when harm does happen, canon 221, §1 states that the "Christian faithful can legitimately vindicate and defend the rights which they possess in the Church" before the competent ecclesiastical authority. Having provided this guarantee, the Church must then assure that its procedures for vindicating rights are effective. As then-Bishop Joseph L. Bernardin said when he was General Secretary of the United States Catholic Conference and the National Conference of Catholic Bishops:

> In this age when the question of human rights and freedoms looms so large in the thinking of people the world over, surely the Church should exert her leadership by ensuring those rights and freedoms among her own members. We should not be afraid, therefore, to examine closely our legal apparatus to see if it will stand the test of today's needs and aspirations. We must listen to those who insist that our procedures are not adequate. Then, on the basis of actual fact rather than emotion or an effort to prove some preconceived idea, we must decide whether changes are needed and, if so, what kind. Only in this way will the Church's credibility in this area remain intact.[7]

Part five of Book VII, then, provides the administrative processes for the vindication and defense of rights, in contrast to parts one through four, which address judicial processes. In speaking of rights, however, it must be noted that legal philosophy,[8] judicial opinion,[9] and canonical tradition[10] commonly hold that rights "correlate" with duties. In fact, there are those who see these two terms as simply opposite sides of the same coin. For them, assertions of rights "are merely the shadows cast by (other people's) duties."[11]

Canonical tradition generally maintains the close correlation between rights and duties. Thus, Pope Paul VI said that "the basic rights of the baptized are not efficacious, nor can they be exercised, unless one recognizes the duties connected

[7] J. Bernardin, "Due Process in the Church," Homiletic and Pastoral Review 69 (1969) 756–757.

[8] See D. Lyons, "The Correlativity of Rights and Duties," in Philosophy of Law, ed. J. Feinberg and H. Gross (Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth, 1986) 319; S. I. Benn and R. Peters, Social Principles and the Democratic State (London: Allen & Unwin, 1959) 89; R. Brandt, Ethical Theory (Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1959) 441; and W. Hohfeld, "Rights and Jural Relations," in Philosophy of Law, ed. J. Feinberg and H. Gross (Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth, 1986) 308–309.

[9] "A duty or legal obligation is that which one ought or ought not to do. 'Duty' and 'right' are correlative terms. When a right is invaded, a duty is violated." Lake Shore & M.S.R. Co. v. Kurtz, 10 Ind. App. 60, 37 N.E. 303–4 (1894).

[10] For example, after describing the "fundamental obligation" to maintain communion, Gianfranco Ghirlanda states, "All other duties and rights are established and held so that this fundamental obligation may be fulfilled properly and faithfully." G. Ghirlanda, "De obligationibus et iuribus Christifidelium in communione ecclesiali deque eorum adimpletione et exercitio," P 73 (1984) 373.

[11] H. Warrender, The Political Philosophy of Hobbes (Oxford: Clarendon, 1957) 19.

with them by baptism."[12] Pope John Paul II echoed these words when he spoke of the "hoped-for reciprocity between the rights and duties" of the Christian faithful."[13]

The view that rights are related to duties may be the reason why specific language about rights did not develop more fully until rather late, perhaps not beginning until the fourteenth century.[14] The Latin word for duty, officium, suggests that duty is related to one's office, i.e., an official role or position. Indeed, Webster defines a duty as "obligatory tasks, conduct, service, or functions that arise from one's position (as in life or in a group)."[15]

In light of this close connection between rights and the duties of office, the placement of the canons on the removal and transfer of pastors after those on administrative recourse is appropriate. While administrative recourse may be used affirmatively to vindicate and defend rights in the Church, the removal or transfer of pastors is related to the performance of their official duties and obligations.[16] Since the "Christian faithful have the right to receive assistance from the sacred pastors out of the spiritual goods of the Church, especially the word of God and the sacraments" (c. 213), it follows that there should be some procedure to remove a pastor who is not fulfilling this duty or to transfer one whose ministry is badly needed elsewhere. The very last section of the Code of Canon Law addresses such situations.

[12] Paul VI, "The Function of Juridical Structures in the Life of the Church: Address to the Judges of the Sacred Roman Rota," February 4, 1977, AAS 69 (1977) 149, trans. OssRomEng, February 24, 1977, 5 (emphasis added).

[13] John Paul II, "The Function of the Sacred Rota Increases through Exemplary Quality of Work Accomplished: Address to the Tribunal of the Sacred Roman Rota," February 26, 1983, AAS 75 (1983) 556, trans. OssRomEng, March 21, 1983, 6.

[14] A. White, Rights (Oxford: Clarendon, 1984) 22, n. 1.

[15] Webster's New Collegiate Dictionary, s.v. "duty."

[16] The approach in canon law seems to treat the terms "duty" and "obligation" synonymously. Thus, while title I of Book II ("The People of God") is designated "The Obligations and Rights of All the Christian Faithful," c. 223, §1 says, "In exercising their rights, the Christian faithful . . . must take into account . . . their own duties [officiorum] toward others." Sometimes this indiscriminate exchange can be seen within the same canon. Canon 209, §1 states, "The Christian faithful . . . are always obliged [obligatione] to maintain communion with the Church," while §2 of the same canon says that the Christian faithful are to fulfill "with great diligence . . . the duties [officia] which they owe to the universal Church."

CANONS AND COMMENTARY

SECTION I
RECOURSE AGAINST ADMINISTRATIVE DECREES
[cc. 1732–1739]

Scope of Administrative Recourse

Canon 1732 — What is established in the canons of this section concerning decrees must be applied to all singular administrative acts which are given in the external forum outside a trial excepting those which have been issued by the Roman Pontiff or an ecumenical council.

In canon law, rights can be vindicated and defended[17] juridically by means of a judicial trial. Canon 1400, §1 provides: "The object of a trial is:

[17] The Latin word vindicare means: "To lay legal claim to a thing. . . . To lay claim as to one's own, to make a claim upon, to demand, claim, arrogate, assume, appropriate. . . . To restore. . . . To deliver, liberate, protect, defend. . . . To make compensation for. . . ." Similarly, while the common connotation of defendere is "to defend, guard,

1° the pursuit or vindication of the rights of physical or juridic persons, or the declaration of juridic facts; 2° the imposition or declaration of a penalty for delicts." However, the next paragraph of the same canon quickly adds a significant limitation to this norm: "Nevertheless, controversies arising from an act of administrative power can be brought only before the superior or an administrative tribunal." To understand this canon, particular attention must be paid to the term "act of administrative power." The phrase "the superior or an administrative tribunal" must also be kept in mind when interpreting the canons on administrative recourse, since it implies that such recourse may be made either before a hierarchic superior or an administrative tribunal.

Act of Administrative Power

In keeping with the code commission's stated methodology of not providing definitions,[18] the 1983 code does not define the term "act of administrative power." The meaning of the phrase "act of administrative power" is a crucial threshold question, however, because on it hinges the determination of the competent forum in which to adjudicate some alleged violations of rights. If the controversy arose from an act of administrative power, the parties are precluded from litigating the matter in a contentious trial before an ordinary tribunal. Instead, they must use a process of administrative recourse.[19]

Most canon law commentators identify the phrase "act of administrative power" with the impugnable administrative act or provvedimento amministrativo of continental administrative law.[20] Dino Cardinal Staffa, formerly Prefect of the Supreme Tribunal of the Apostolic Signatura, elaborates:

> An impugnable administrative act, therefore, according to the norm of the Apostolic Constitution [Regimini Ecclesiae universae] is a decision or administrative decree (which, if they are such, are called a "provvedimento amministrativo" by practitioners of civil administrative law), even if they do not assume the properties of a decree. The notion of an impugnable administrative act or decree [is defined as] . . . : an act of the will, legitimately manifested, of an administrative authority acting within the sphere of the law as such and directed to the good of the Church, thereby immediately changing the juridic condition of the subjects in a concrete case.[21]

This interpretation appears to be confirmed by the use of the term "administrative act" in canon 1732. The fact that this was the sole canon under the heading "Administrative Procedure in General (De Procedura Administrativa in Genere)" as late in the code revision process as the 1982 schema indicates that this canon was intended as a general principle guiding the entire section dealing with administrative recourse.[22] This canon clearly removes from the scope of the procedure for administrative recourse legislative and judicial acts in the external forum, such as a diocesan bishop's protect, cover, preserve, support, maintain," later juridical Latin denotes a technical meaning: "to claim, vindicate, or prosecute at law." Accordingly, the nouns which correlate with these verbs signify concomitant meanings: vindicatio is "a laying claim to a thing, a civil action or lawsuit, a taking into protection, defense, vindication"; defensio, again in juridical language, is "the legal maintenance of a right." Thus, vindicatio and defensio should be understood as virtually synonymous. C. Lewis and C. Short, A Latin Dictionary (Oxford: Clarendon, 1984), s.v. "vindico," "defendo," "vindicatio," and "defensio."

[18] Comm 2 (1970) 101.

[19] Note the technical distinction in canon law between "recourse" and "appeal": an "appeal" is a challenge to a judicial sentence (see cc. 1628–1638 and 1682–1684); "recourse" is a challenge to an administrative decision (see cc. 1732 and 1737–1739).

[20] See M. Moodie, "The Administrator and the Law," J 46 (1986) 57; and Beal, "Protecting the Rights," 152.

[21] D. Staffa, "Praesupposita recursus ad Alteram Sectionem Signaturae Apostolicae," P 67 (1978) 524–525.

[22] See ComCICRec (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1982) c. 1736.

general decree enacting a particular diocesan law (c. 29) or an ordinary tribunal's sentence declaring a marriage null (c. 1628). Nor can administrative acts made by a judge during a trial be challenged through administrative recourse. Moreover, no recourse is available against the administrative acts of the Roman Pontiff himself or an ecumenical council. Outside of these exceptions, the scope of administrative recourse is intended to be broadly inclusive. It can be used to challenge decrees and "all singular [or particular or individual] administrative acts."

Some commentators interpret canon 1732 as restricting recourse to controversies involving particular or individual administrative acts.[23] However, the canon begins with a straightforward reference to "decrees" without further qualification and then goes on to say that these canonical provisions for administrative recourse also apply (eadem applicanda sunt) to "all singular administrative acts." Thus, the initial unqualified reference to "decrees" suggests that the procedure for administrative recourse can be used to impugn not only particular or "singular administrative acts" but general administrative decrees.[24]

Individual or singular administrative acts (actus administrativi singulares) are given detailed treatment in canons 35–93. These acts include individual decrees and precepts (cc. 48–58), rescripts (cc. 59–75), privileges (cc. 76–84), and dispensations (cc. 85–93). Other acts of administrative power which may be subject to administrative recourse are general administrative acts, including general executory decrees (cc. 31–33), instructions (c. 34), statutes (c. 94), and rules of order (ordines) (c. 95).[25] Although a rescript must be issued in writing (c. 59, §1) and any administrative act dealing with the external forum should be set forth in writing (c. 37), not all administrative acts are necessarily contained in written documents. For example, an individual or singular decree is defined in canon 48 as "an administrative act issued by a competent executive authority in which a decision is given or a provision is made for a particular case according to the norms of law." Since a competent executive authority can make a "decision" constituting an administrative act without issuing a written document, the notion of an "individual decree" is not limited to situations where a written document is issued. Such "decisions" are in fact rendered rather routinely by those who exercise leadership in the Church.[26]

While an "act of administrative power" can be identified with an "administrative act," it must be distinguished from an "act of administration." "Acts of administration" are activities that can be described broadly as "administrative" but lack one or more essential characteristics of an administrative act (see c. 35) and thus do not involve the Church's power of governance as such. Some illustrations of "acts of administration" are:

1. acts of church officials performed in their capacity as private persons;

[23] E.g., Moodie, "The Administrator and the Law," 68; E. Labandeira, in Pamplona ComEng, 1069.

[24] See T. Green, in CLSA Com, 1031, and M. Thériault, in CLSGBI Com, 961.

[25] See F. D'Ostilio, "Il ricorso contro i decreti amministrativi," in Urbaniana Com, 992. Another interpretation would exclude the general executory decrees and instructions described in cc. 31–34 from the scope of administrative recourse, instead restricting the procedure to conflicts arising from the individual administrative acts mentioned in cc. 35–93. See L. de Echeverría, in Salamanca Com, 835. See also Green, in CLSA Comm, 1031. However, the position that general executory decrees and instructions (cc. 31–34) should also be subject to administrative recourse is based on the fact that these general administrative acts can be issued by persons who "possess executive power" (cc. 31, §1 and 34, §1), in contrast to general decrees establishing laws, which can be issued only by persons who possess legislative power (cc. 29–30).

[26] See F. Urrutia, "Administrative Power in the Church according to the Code of Canon Law," Stud Can 20 (1986) 261; F. Urrutia, "La potestà amministrativa secondo il diritto canonico," and Lorenzo Spinelli, "L'atto amministrativo nell'ordinamento della Chiesa," in De Iustitia Administrativa in Ecclesia /La Giustizia amministrativa nella Chiesa, ed. Pio Fedele (Rome: Officium Libri Catholici/Catholic Book Agency, 1984) 73–100, 167–195.

2. acts of church-related organizations which are not part of the public governance structure of the church;
3. acts of church authorities in their official capacity that partake in the nature of a private transaction.[27]

The distinction between "acts of administration" and "acts of administrative power" is important because the jurisdiction of the Administrative Tribunal (Second Section) of the Apostolic Signatura does not extend to cases involving "acts of administration" (compare c. 1445, §2, which gives the Apostolic Signatura competence over disputes arising from acts of administrative power, with c. 1413, 1°, which gives ordinary tribunals competence over contentions arising from [acts of] administration).[28] Controversies arising from acts of administrative power must be resolved according to administrative recourse, that is, recourse to the hierarchic superior and, after exhausting hierarchic recourse, to the Second Section of the Apostolic Signatura; cases involving acts of administration properly belong to the competence of ordinary diocesan tribunals.[29]

For example, in a particular dispute, one priest alleged that another priest had damaged his good reputation. The Apostolic Signatura decided that the basis of the alleged defamation was a telegraphic message sent by the respondent "in his capacity as general delegate for pastoral care" for members of a certain ethnic group living as alien residents in a foreign nation. As a result, the Signatura held that the ordinary tribunal was "absolutely incompetent, according to c. 1400, §2, to hear such a controversy arising from an act of administrative power." The Signatura determined that the "instance of the judicial vicar of the [interdiocesan] tribunal could not be considered unless the case is certain to deal with harm to [the plaintiff's] good reputation by acts placed by [the respondent] as a private person and not in his official capacity."[30]

The Apostolic Signatura also held that the process of administrative recourse and not the ordinary tribunal's contentious judicial process was required in cases involving a dispute between a teacher and a principal in a Catholic parochial school[31] and a conflict between a religious sister and the mother general of a religious institute of diocesan right.[32] In the latter case, the decisions of both the first and second instance courts were declared irremediably null (c. 1620, 1°, 4°, and 5°). The case did not concern a private controversy between two women religious (c. 1427, §3), but a dispute between a religious and her superior as a result of acts placed in the exercise of her office. Moreover, the Signatura specifically pointed out that canon 1400, §2 provides that administrative recourse (cc. 1732–1739), and not a judicial trial in the ordinary diocesan or metropolitan tribunal, is the proper procedure to vindicate and defend rights in these cases.

The determination in this case is especially significant because it illustrates how the phrase "act of administrative power" is being interpreted in the jurisprudence of the Apostolic Signatura. It is quite clear from this case that the decision of a religious superior in the exercise of her authority is considered an "act of administrative power." Thus, the proper, and indeed only, forum in which to vindicate and defend rights in such cases is the procedure for administrative recourse.

Theoretically, there are two possible options for administrative recourse: an administrative tri-[27] Beal, "Protecting the Rights," 156.

[28] Ibid.

[29] Advisory Opinion on Acts of Administrative Power, October 18, 1990, ApSig, Prot. No. 21362/89 V.T.; published with permission given November 27, 1990, Prot. No. 22258/90 VAR.

[30] Judgment of September 28, 1990, ApSig, Prot. No. 21955/90 C.P.; published with permission given November 27, 1990, Prot. No. 22258/90 VAR.

[31] Judgment of October 12, 1987, ApSig, Prot. No. 18679/86 V.T.; published with permission given November 27, 1990, Prot. No. 22258/90 VAR.

[32] Judgment of February 9, 1988, ApSig, Prot. No. 19764/88 V.T.; published with permission given November 27, 1990, Prot. No. 22258/90 VAR.

bunal or hierarchic recourse. In practice, however, only hierarchic recourse exists at the local level in most dioceses.

Administrative Tribunals

An administrative tribunal is a judicial forum in which a panel of judges adjudicates claims that an administrative decision violated the law, either because the procedure followed was defective or because the grounds on which it was based were erroneous.[33] Unlike hierarchic recourse, an administrative tribunal may only confirm, rescind, or declare null the administrative act, but may not amend or otherwise change the act itself. This is because the amending of the original act would itself be an administrative or executive act, not a judicial one.[34]

Provisions for local administrative tribunals were contemplated for the revised Code of Canon Law. The 1980 schema proposed that local administrative tribunals should be optional,[35] while earlier schemata had provided that they should be mandatory.[36] At its final plenary session in October 1981, members of the code commission voted fifty-three to six to leave to conferences of bishops the decision as to whether administrative tribunals should be established for their territories, rather than to impose such tribunals as a mandatory institute for all ecclesiastical regions.[37] The main reasons cited for not imposing administrative tribunals as mandatory were related to "regional differences in need and especially the varying level of resources required to implement such a directive world-wide."[38] It was apparently during the papal consultative processes in 1982 that it was decided to omit the detailed provisions for local administrative tribunals entirely from the code.[39]

The various features and propounded merits of local administrative tribunals have received extensive treatment in canonical literature.[40] Since [33]See T. Molloy, "Administrative Recourse in the Revised Code of Canon Law," CLSAP 44 (1982) 271.

[34] See J. Meszaros, "Procedures of Administrative Recourse," J 46 (1986) 133.

[35] ComCICRec, Schema Codicis Iuris Canonici (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1980), c. 1689, §1.

[36] ComCICRec, Schema Canonum de Procedura Administrativa (Vatican City: Typis Polyglottis Vaticanis, 1972), c. 19.

[37] See L. Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 950; see also J. Alesandro, "Response to Bishop Malone's Address," CLSAP 50 (1988) 33.

[38] Alesandro, "Response," 33. Cardinal Bernardin verified these reasons in a telephone conversation on October 4, 1990 and reconfirmed the basic rationale in a personal interview with this author in Rome, October 16, 1990. These observations are further substantiated by the cardinal's notes and other documents from the 1981 plenary session. See Joseph Cardinal Bernardin, Code Commission Papers, Archdiocese of Chicago's Joseph Cardinal Bernardin Archives and Records Center, Chicago.

[39] See Green, "Procedure in Administrative Recourse," in CLSA Com, 1030. Archbishop Zenon Grocholewski, one of the members of the small group of canonists who advised the pope during the papal consultative process, in an interview stated that after they completed their deliberations with the Holy Father (which lasted more than a year and consisted of fourteen sessions, each lasting three to four hours), their recommendations were reviewed by still another small group of consultors, this one consisting of cardinals. Grocholewski said it was at the very last stages that the canons on administrative tribunals were deleted and offered two reasons why these canons were removed: (1) concerns expressed by many episcopal conferences about the lack of trained personnel to staff the proposed administrative tribunals in light of the difficulties in providing prepared canonists even for the ordinary diocesan tribunals; and (2) obstacles presented by the theological principle that a bishop can be judged by no one except the Apostolic See; thus, local administrative tribunals would not be able to review a bishop's administrative decisions. Z. Grocholewski, interview with the author, Rome, December 4, 1990.

[40] See, for example, I. Gordon, "De tribunalibus administrativis," P, 602–652; Z. Grocholewski, "I tribunali regionali amministrativi della Chiesa," in De Iustitia Administrativa in Ecclesia/La Giustizia amministrativa nella Chiesa, ed. P. Fedele (Rome: Officium Libri Catholici/Catholic Book Agency, 1984) 135–165; C. Lefebvre, "De tribunalibus administrativis," P 67 (1978) 583–591; K. Matthews, "The Development and Future of the Administrative Tribunal," Stud Can 18 (1984) 3–233; F. McManus, "Administrative Procedure," J 32 similar provisions for local administrative tribunals were also proposed for and omitted from the 1917 Code of Canon Law,[41] the critical question is why a model which has received widespread acclamation in theory has been consistently ignored and not implemented in practice.

Some of the reasons offered in answer to this question are doctrinal in nature; others are more practical. In its report on the observations made by episcopal conferences[42] and the dicasteries of the Holy See regarding the proposed schema on administrative tribunals, the code revision commission noted the following difficulties:

> There are those who call into doubt the very compatibility of administrative tribunals with the nature of the Church, or at least doubt whether the authority of bishops can be limited in such a way that it be submitted to administrative tribunals, since they are neither Ecumenical Councils nor the Supreme Pontiff.... Doubts have been proposed about the opportuneness of administrative tribunals, especially because of fear that pastoral action be impeded by too many conflicts and disputes, but also because of the difficulty of establishing them [administrative tribunals] in many places, and because of the paternal and pastoral, rather than juridic, character which is customary for relationships between administrative authority and its subjects in very many regions.[43]

More pragmatic concerns were offered by the Secretariat of the code commission when it argued that local administrative tribunals should be optional rather than obligatory:

> Although it is very much to be desired that administrative tribunals be regularly established by Conferences of Bishops, for protecting subjective rights and for ordering administrative justice better, it does not seem opportune however to impose such a burden by universal law. For indeed, if establishing ordinary tribunals is already replete with difficulties due to the fact that personnel who understand the law well and who have doctorates or licentiates in canon law are lacking, this would be all the more true in setting up administrative tribunals, since the function assigned to such courts is difficult and important and undoubtedly requires an exceptional grasp of laws and of justice. Besides, such courts constitute a significant innovation in church law, and therefore it seems appropriate to move gradually and in some way voluntarily, according to local possibilities and resources. In addition, hierarchic recourse is always available with the possibility of approaching the Signatura for a final decision.[44]

In response to the suggestion of the code revision commission, some local dioceses are moving gradually and voluntarily to experiment with ad-(1972) 417–418; idem, "The Second Vatican Council and the Canon Law," J 22 (1962) 280; M. Moodie, The Constitution and Competence of Interdiocesan Administrative Tribunals according to the 1980 Schema of the Code of Canon Law (JCD diss., Pontifical Gregorian University, Rome, 1984).

[41] See Matthews, "Administrative Tribunal," 187. The reason offered for this omission was that those drafting the 1917 code considered the argument for these proposals as not yet sufficiently mature. Seen as especially problematic were the division between judicial and administrative procedures for resolving matters and controversies, the very concept of administrative processes, and the difficulty of arranging recourses through successive instances. See Gordon, "De tribunalibus administrativis," 606–607.

[42] The observations of the episcopal conferences are especially noteworthy, since the 1967 Synod of Bishops had previously voted to recommend establishing administrative tribunals. ComCICRec, "Principia quae dirigant," Comm 1 (1969) 83.

[43] ComCICRec, "Acta Commissionis," Comm 5 (1973) 236.

[44] ComCICRec, "Acta Commissionis: Relatio," Comm 16 (1984) 85–86.

ministrative tribunals.[45] However, since hierarchic recourse is universally available, while administrative tribunals are not, it is incumbent upon responsible canonists and ecclesial administrators to examine and devise ways to structure hierarchic recourse in order to provide for the vindication and defense of the rights of the Christian faithful within current administrative lines of authority and accountability in the local church.

Hierarchic Recourse

Hierarchic recourse is "a request to the superior of the author of an administrative act to confirm, amend, or revoke the [subordinate's] decision."[46] Although the part of the code containing canons 1732–1739 is entitled "Recourse against Administrative Decrees," the deletion of norms on administrative tribunals from the final text of the 1983 code means that, in practice, these canons are actually dealing solely with hierarchic recourse.[47]

Alternative Dispute Resolution

Canon 1733 — §1. Whenever a person considers himself or herself aggrieved by a decree, it is particularly desirable that the person and the author of the decree avoid any contention and take care to seek an equitable solution by common counsel, possibly using the mediation and effort of wise persons to avoid or settle the controversy in a suitable way.

§2. The conference of bishops can determine that each diocese establish in a stable manner an office or council whose function is to seek and suggest equitable solutions according to the norms determined by the conference. If the conference has not ordered this, however, the bishop can establish a council or office of this kind.

§3. The office or council mentioned in §2 is especially to be of assistance when the revocation of a decree has been requested according to the norm of can. 1734 and the time limits for making recourse have not elapsed. If recourse has been proposed against a decree, however, the superior who deals with the recourse is to urge the person making recourse and the author of the decree to seek a solution of this kind whenever he sees hope of a favorable outcome.

After the general introductory canon (c. 1732), there is a preliminary canon with three paragraphs concerning resolution of controversies through some alternative form of dispute resolution. The first paragraph reiterates the Church's concern, expressed repeatedly in the code,[48] to promote the gospel value of reconciliation between aggrieved parties:

> If you bring your gift to the altar and there recall that your brother has anything against you, leave your gift at the altar, go first to be reconciled with your brother, and then come and offer your gift. Lose no time; settle with your opponent while on your way to court with him. (Mt 5:23–24)[49]

When two disputing parties are unable to work out their differences by themselves, scripture indicates that the matter is to be brought to other members of the Church for their assistance in resolving the controversy:

[45] As of October 1996, the Archdiocese of St. Paul and Minneapolis and the Archdiocese of Milwaukee have established administrative tribunals as part of the CLSA's "Experiment in Due Process." See CLSAP 58 (1996) 427.

[46] Meszaros, "Procedures of Administrative Recourse," 113.

[47] See Labandeira, "Del Recurso contra los Decretos Administrativos," in *Pamplona Com,*1037; and Green, "Procedure in Administrative Recourse," in CLSA Com, 1030, n. 8.

[48] See cc. 1446; 1659, §1; 1676; 1695; 1713–1716; 1742; and 1748.

[49] For a study of scriptural approaches to resolving conflicts and disputes, see L. Buzzard, J. Buzzard, and L. Eck, Readiness for Reconciliation: A Biblical Guide (Oak Park, Ill.: Christian Legal Society, Christian Conciliation Service, 1982).

> If your brother should commit some wrong against you, go and point out his fault, but keep it between the two of you. If he listens to you, you have won your brother over. If he does not listen, summon another, so that every case may stand on the word of two or three witnesses. If he ignores them, refer it to the church. If he ignores even the church, then treat him as you would a Gentile or tax collector. (Mt 18:15–17)[50]

This solicitude for reconciliation can be given institutional form through the creation of offices of conciliation (mediation) and arbitration, as the second paragraph of the canon provides. In practice, episcopal conferences in some countries, such as the United States and Italy, have left the establishment of such offices to the discretion of individual diocesan bishops rather than making their establishment mandatory.[51] While these offices and procedures are sometimes given the generic label of "due process,"[52] the more commonly used and more technically accurate terms for the functions of these offices are conciliation and arbitration.[53] In conciliation, a neutral person mediates the dispute with the hope of helping the parties to reach a mutually satisfactory solution; in arbitration, the parties create a binding contract in which they voluntarily agree in advance to abide by the decision of the arbitrator.[54] Where they have been established, these diocesan offices have proven to be somewhat effective in resolving administrative conflicts.[55] However, they have not been established in all the dioceses of the United States.[56]

[50] A practical alternative to the civil courts based on Christ's command in this scriptural passage to settle disputes among believers is suggested by L. Buzzard and L. Eck, Tell It to the Church: Reconciling out of Court (Elgin, Ill.: David C. Cook Publishing Co., 1982). It should also be noted that the desire to avoid litigation is not confined to ecclesiastical clashes; cf. American Judicature Society, "Alternative Dispute Resolution and the Courts," Judicature 69 (February-March 1986) 252–314; S. Goldberg, E. Green, and F. Sander, "Litigation, Arbitration or Mediation: A Dialogue," American Bar Association Journal (June 1989) 70–72; K. Ehrman, "Why Business Lawyers Should Use Mediation," American Bar Association Journal (June 1989) 73–74; C. Blair, "A Court System on Overload: The Need for Alternative Dispute Resolution," Chicago Bar Association Record (November 1989) 12–13; and R. Byrne, J. Woodward, and J. Lapinski, "Court-Annexed Mandatory Arbitration Practice and Procedure in Illinois," Chicago Bar Association Record (May 1990) 14–20.

[51] See NCCB, On Due Process, 3; and Chiappetta Com, 2:786, citing "Delibera n. 15, 23 dicembre 1983," Enchir. CEI, vol. 3, p. 916, n. 1603.

[52] "Due process is a term whose roots are in the Anglo-American legal tradition. It is a principle of justice rather than a rule of law which can be defined categorically. Legal theorists explain the notion of due process by analyzing its twofold aspect. Substantively, due process means that certain fundamental rights or freedoms, for example the right to life or to own property, cannot be denied or taken away without proper justification, good reason or just compensation. Procedurally, due process guarantees a person adequate safeguards when his rights are challenged or questioned in administrative or judicial procedures." A. Maida, "Rights in the Church," in A Pastoral Guide to Canon Law, ed. G. Dyer (Dublin: Gill and Macmillan, 1977) 40. (First published in CS 15 [1976] 255–67.)

[53] See CLSA, Due Process in Dioceses in the U.S.: 1970–1985: Report on a Task Force Survey, ed. J. Provost (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1987) 12–13.

[54] See Archdiocese of Chicago, Office of Conciliation: Norms and Procedures (Chicago: Archdiocese of Chicago, 1987) 3–6; R. Fleming, The Labor Arbitration Process (Urbana, Ill.: University of Illinois, 1965); American Arbitration Association, Labor Arbitration: Procedures and Techniques (New York: American Arbitration Association, 1979); and American Arbitration Association, Voluntary Labor Arbitration Rules (New York: American Arbitration Association, 1979).

[55] "Since 1970 over 900 cases have been submitted for 'due process' consideration [in the U.S.] and decisions have been reached in nearly 500 of these." CLSA, Due Process in the U.S.: Survey, 6. For a detailed evaluation of these processes, see pp. 36–39 of the survey.

[56] "Seventy-six dioceses [in the U.S.] reported experience with cases submitted for 'due process' consideration. This is slightly over 40% of the 185 dioceses in the United States, of Latin and Eastern Catholic rites, at the time of the survey. . . . 8% of the dioceses with some case experience account for over two-thirds of the cases submitted for which we have statistics. . . . In terms of cases

The final paragraph of canon 1733 urges that parties be encouraged to seek reconciliation even after formal recourse has been initiated. This paragraph also emphasizes that conciliation and arbitration must be seen as alternatives to formal recourse. Conciliation and arbitration, as well as similar forms of "due process," do not themselves constitute hierarchic recourse, since hierarchic recourse involves an authoritative resolution of the dispute by the hierarchic superior. In contrast, the parties themselves reach a solution through conciliation; in arbitration, the arbitrator, a private person chosen by the parties, determines the outcome. Thus, dioceses which have offices of conciliation and arbitration should not consider these as instruments of administrative or hierarchic recourse, strictly speaking, but as types of alternative dispute resolution.[57]

Unfortunately, however, parties to a controversy are not always amenable to working out their differences through conciliation or arbitration. In addition, conciliation and arbitration are not appropriate procedures for resolving some types of disputes, such as controversies arising from a bishop's exercise of his teaching office. Nor can a person whose rights have been violated by an ecclesiastical administrative act be obliged to renounce the protection of administrative procedures in a public forum and to submit the matter instead to an arbitrator.[58] In such cases, the formal procedures of recourse are needed. These begin with the next canon.

Petition to Revoke or Modify the Decree

Canon 1734 — §1. Before proposing recourse a person must seek the revocation or emendation of the decree in writing from its author. When this petition is proposed, by that very fact suspension of the execution of the decree is also understood to be requested.

This provision is an innovation in the 1983 code. Previously, a petitioner could proceed directly to formal recourse; now, a written request must be submitted to give the author of the administrative act an opportunity to revoke or amend the decree.[59] While it may seem futile to approach the source of the alleged harm, it could happen that the author of the administrative act is not aware that anyone has been aggrieved and may be quite willing to amend or revoke the decision if this fact which have gone through the entire process, the number of dioceses with substantial experience is even smaller. Five dioceses, or 3% of the 185 dioceses in the United States at the time of the study, account for 69% of the cases decided." CLSA, Due Process in the U.S.: Survey, 27–29.

[57] "Alternative dispute resolution (ADR) typically refers to the use of negotiation, mediation, and conciliation as alternatives to the traditional practice of adjudication." L. Putnam and J. Folger, "Communication, Conflict, and Dispute Resolution: The Study of Interaction and the Development of Conflict Theory," Communication Research 15 (August 1988) 349. "The two most widely used ADR systems are arbitration and mediation. These two ADR systems can be readily distinguished by understanding the role of the neutral in those processes. In arbitration, a neutral adjudicates and makes a final binding decision on the merits. In mediation, the neutral does not make a decision on the merits, but is a facilitator to assist the parties to reach an agreement. Unless the parties in mediation agree, there is no decision." A. Schwartz, "A Primer on Alternative Dispute Resolution," Chicago Bar Association Record (Sept. 1988) 19. Note that the terms "mediation" and "conciliation" are often used synonymously, but not always: "In mediation, the third party is essentially a facilitator. His role is to help the parties see each other's point of view and to emphasize points of agreement; but it is not for him to suggest or promote particular solutions to the conflict. In conciliation, too, the third party is a facilitator, but in addition he may promote agreement by suggesting a solution and pointing out its advantages." P. Cane, An Introduction to Administrative Law (Oxford: Clarendon, 1986) 94. For further examination of the notion of "alternative dispute resolution," see L. Ray, "Emerging Options in Dispute Resolution," American Bar Association Journal (June 1989) 66–68; and American Bar Association Standing Committee on Dispute Resolution, Alternative Dispute Resolution: A Handbook for Judges (Chicago: ABA Publications, 1987).

[58] See Grocholewski, "I tribunali regionali amministrativi," 156; Labandeira, in Pamplona ComEng, 1070.

[59] See Echeverría, "Del recurso," in Salamanca Com, 837.

becomes known. Also, this preliminary step once again underscores the legislator's preference for amicable resolution of disputes.

The last clause of this paragraph contains a further provision of considerable importance. The person petitioning for the revocation or emendation of a decree is understood to be automatically requesting suspension of the execution of the decree while the authority deliberates on the matter. This is significant, since the explicit request for suspension of the execution of the decree may be inadvertently omitted from the petition itself.

Peremptory Period for Petition

§2. The petition must be made within the peremptory period of ten useful days from the legitimate notification of the decree.

A "peremptory period" is one within which a person must act or else be precluded from doing so.[60] The person seeking the revocation or emendation of the decree must do so within ten "useful" or "available" days after receiving legal notice of the decree. "Available/useful time" (tempus utile) is defined by canon 201, §2: "Useful time is understood as that which a person has to exercise or to pursue a right, so that it does not run for a person who is unaware or unable to act."[61]

Thus, if a person is unaware of the administrative act which gives rise to the alleged harm, the "available time" period does not begin until the person learns of the administrative act. Also, the time does not run when a person is unable to act, whether that be the person's own subjective inability, such as because of illness, or an objective inability, such as when the last day of the time period falls on a holiday when the diocesan offices are closed. Although traditional authors took a different approach, the current praxis of the Holy See is to view "useful time" as running continuously, even on holidays unless the last day on which the person may act is a legal holiday. In the latter case, the time is extended until the next business day, since useful time cannot expire on a holiday. Thus, a person who is notified of a decree on Monday, February 16, has until Thursday, February 26, to petition for reconsideration of the decree, even though the chancery is closed for the weekend on February 21 and 22. However, a person notified of a decree on Thursday, February 12, has until Monday, February 23, to petition for reconsideration, since the tenth day of the peremptory period falls on Sunday, February 22, when the office is closed.

A special caveat should be noted when seeking to invoke subjective inability to act within the peremptory period of useful time: if a party has appointed a procurator (c. 1481), the inability of both the party and the procurator to act must be shown. For example, even if a party is unable to act personally due to illness or absence while on vacation, the Signatura has held that the party's procurator is expected to act as the proxy for the party.

Furthermore, the type of notice required must be "legitimate notification," that is, any required formalities of the law must be followed. When an individual decree is issued, for example, the provisions of canons 50–57 must be observed. Specifically, those whose rights can be injured should be heard before the decree is issued (c. 50), and the decree itself must be communicated (cc. 54, §1 and 56) in a written document (cc. 51 and 54, §2) or orally before a notary or two witnesses if a very grave reason prevents the handing over of the written text of the decree itself (c. 55).

Waiver of Petition to Amend or Revoke

§3. The norms of §§1 and 2 are not valid:
1° for recourse proposed to a bishop against decrees issued by authorities subject to him;

[60] The "peremptory period" (peremptorium terminum) is also known in Latin as fatalia legis (see c. 1465, §1).

[61] Tempus utile is also translated by some commentators as "canonical time." See A. Mendonça, in CLSGBI Com, 112; Thériault, in CLSGBI Com, 962; E. Molano, in Pamplona ComEng, 182; and Labandeira, in Pamplona ComEng, 1071.

2° for recourse proposed against a decree which decides a hierarchical recourse unless the bishop gave the decision;

3° for recourse proposed according to the norm of cann. 57 and 1735.

The petition asking the author of the offensive act to revoke or amend it is not necessary if the author is directly subordinate to the diocesan bishop (e.g., the vicar general, an episcopal vicar, a dean [vicar forane], an official of the diocesan curia, a pastor, etc.).[62] In such cases, the recourse is to be proposed directly to the bishop or a delegate designated by him. However, in a dispute between a religious and his or her superior, the member must first approach the superior of the institute before proposing recourse to the diocesan bishop or the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life, depending on whether the institute is one of diocesan or pontifical right.

Second, an injured party need not make this petition to amend or revoke a decree when he or she is making further recourse against a decree which itself has decided a case of hierarchic recourse at a lower level, unless the decree deciding hierarchic recourse was issued by a bishop. For example, if a member of a religious institute feels aggrieved by a decision of the diocesan bishop that resolved a recourse against a decision of her superior, she would still need to ask him to review his decision before approaching the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life in Rome. However, if, after the bishop confirmed his decision, she took her case to the congregation in Rome where she received a negative decision, she can have recourse directly to the Apostolic Signatura without asking the congregation to revoke or amend its decree.[63]

Third, the canon indicates two cases when a request to modify or withdraw a decree would be superfluous, and therefore is not necessary.[64] One is when an authority's silence or failure to act is automatically presumed by law to be a negative decision. Canon 57 asserts a legal presumption of a negative response if no answer is given within three months from the receipt of the petition or recourse, unless another time period has been prescribed by law. Canon 1735 provides that the period for making recourse begins to run when the authority fails to respond to the petition for reconsideration within thirty days. In such a case, the authority's response to the petition for reconsideration is presumed to be negative.

Similarly, a new petition to revoke or modify a decision is not required when the authority issues a decree modifying the original decree in response to the first petition (c. 1735).

Time Period for Recourse

Canon 1735 — If within thirty days after receiving the petition mentioned in can. 1734 the author of the decree communicates a new decree by which he either emends the earlier one or decides that the petition must be rejected, the time limits for making recourse run from the notification of the new decree. If the author makes no decision within the thirty days, however, the time limits run from the thirtieth day.

After receiving the aggrieved party's petition to modify or revoke the original decree, the author of the decree has thirty days in which to respond. The thirty days are apparently computed as "continuous time" (c. 201, §1), since there is no reference here to "available/useful time."[65] After thirty days, silence or inaction on the part of the authority is presumed to be a negative response.[66]

[62] See D'Ostilio, "Il ricorso," in Urbaniana Com, 992; and Chiappetta Com, 2:787.

[63] See Green, "Administrative Recourse," in CLSA Com, 1032.

[64] See Green, "Administrative Recourse," in CLSA Com, 1032.

[65] See Echeverría, "Del recurso," in Salamanca Com, 837–838; Labandeira, in Pamplona ComEng, 1071; and Thériault, in CLSGBI Com, 963.

[66] Note that the thirty-day period prescribed by c. 1735 is a special "other time period" mentioned in c. 57, §1,

After the thirty days have passed or after the authority has responded to the petition, whichever comes first, the aggrieved party then has fifteen available days to pursue recourse to a higher authority (c. 1737). Of course, if the original author of the administrative act accedes to the petition to revoke the decision or modifies it in a way that is acceptable to the aggrieved party, the issue becomes moot.

Suspension of the Effects of the Decree

Canon 1736 — §1. In those matters in which hierarchical recourse suspends the execution of a decree, the petition mentioned in can. 1734 also has the same effect.

§2. In other cases, if the author of the decree has not decreed the suspension of execution within ten days after receiving the petition mentioned in can. 1734, an interim suspension can be sought from his hierarchical superior who can decree a suspension only for grave reasons and always cautiously so that the salvation of souls suffers no harm.

§3. If the execution of the decree has been suspended according to the norm of §2 and recourse is proposed afterwards, the person who must deal with the recourse according to the norm of can. 1737, §3 is to decide whether the suspension must be confirmed or revoked.

§4. If no recourse is proposed against the decree within the established time limit, the interim suspension of the execution given according to the norm of §§1 or 2 ceases by that very fact.

This canon deals with the suspensive effect of recourse. In some cases, recourse automatically suspends the force of a decree by the law itself, e.g., a decree dismissing a member of a religious institute (c. 700), of a secular institute (c. 729), or of a society of apostolic life (c. 746), and an extrajudicial decree which imposes or declares a canonical sanction or penalty (c. 1353).[67] In the case of removal or transfer of a pastor, recourse against the decree suspends the removal or transfer to the extent that a new pastor cannot be named while the recourse is pending; however, the removed or transferred pastor must abstain from exercising the office of pastor, vacate the rectory, and hand over anything pertinent needed by the parochial administrator to whom the parish has been entrusted in the interim (see cc. 1747 and 1752). The ordinary power connected to the office does not cease when recourse is made against dismissal from other ecclesiastical offices; however, the ordinary power of the office is suspended (c. 143).

In cases where the recourse does not have automatic suspensive effect, the authority who issued the decree may voluntarily suspend its execution. If the author of the decree refuses or fails to do so within ten days after having received the petition for reconsideration, the aggrieved party may request the suspension from the author's hierarchic superior, who can grant it only "for grave reasons and always cautiously." The canon is particularly solicitous that the primary concern should always be the "salvation of souls" (salus animarum). Even if the effect of the decree is suspended as requested, when hierarchic recourse commences, the hierarchic superior to whom the recourse is proposed must decide whether to continue or revoke the suspension of the decree's execution. On the other hand, if recourse is not proposed within the peremptory fifteen days, the suspension of the execution of the decree terminates automatically.

Procedures for Hierarchic Recourse

Canon 1737 — §1. A person who claims to have been aggrieved by a decree can make recourse for any just reason to the hierarchical superior of the one who issued the decree. The recourse can be proposed before the author of the decree who must transmit it immediately to the competent hierarchical superior.

which supersedes that canon's usual three months' wait for a response. See Labandeira, in Pamplona ComEng, 1071.

[67] See Chiappetta Com, 2:788.

§2. Recourse must be proposed within the peremptory time limit of fifteen useful days which in the cases mentioned in can. 1734, §3 run from the day on which the decree was communicated; in other cases, however, they run according to the norm of can. 1735.

§3. Nevertheless, even in cases in which recourse does not suspend the execution of the decree by the law itself and suspension has not been decreed according to the norm of can. 1736, §2, the superior can order the execution to be suspended for a grave cause, yet cautiously so that the salvation of souls suffers no harm.

A person who feels injured by an administrative act can make recourse directly to the hierarchic superior of the author of the act. However, the aggrieved party may also propose the recourse to the author of the decree, who must then immediately transmit it to the proper hierarchic superior.[68] This is helpful, since the petitioner may not know who is the competent hierarchic superior to whom recourse should be made. Once recourse is initiated, the executive power of the lower authority is not suspended; however, the lower authority should refrain from further involvement in the case pending the superior's review, unless "a grave and urgent cause" dictates otherwise. In this case the lower authority should immediately notify the superior (c. 139). The following basic principles of hierarchic recourse can be deduced from canon 1737:

(a) Administrative acts are subject to review by the competent hierarchic authority. Within an institute of consecrated life or a society of apostolic life, the competent authority should be outlined in the constitutions of the institute or society (cc. 625, 717, 734, and 738). While the internal ordering of particular churches is specified in canons 460–572, diocesan bishops may designate various levels of authority under them or delegate power for resolving hierarchic recourse to appropriate diocesan offices.[69] Pastors of parishes with large staffs could also delineate lines of authority in the parish by indicating the immediate supervisor of each member of the staff. In this way, recourses do not always have to come to the immediate personal attention of the pastor or bishop. When recourse is made against a decree of a diocesan bishop, however, the hierarchic superior to whom recourse must be made is neither the metropolitan archbishop nor the national conference of bishops, but only the Holy See. Thus, recourse against decrees of diocesan bishops should be directed to the Roman congregation in whose competence the subject matter of the recourse falls.[70]

(b) Any person has the procedural capacity or standing to propose recourse simply as "a person who claims to have been aggrieved by a decree." There is no further specification of this injury or harm, such as monetary damage, usurpation or abuse of power, violation of law, etc.[71]

(c) The reason or motive for the recourse is stated in the widest possible terms: "for any just reason." Just reasons include the possible illegality of the act, its infringement of a subjective right, its erroneous or inadequate basis, anticipated damage or danger from it, or even simply because the administrative act was "inopportune."[72]

The second paragraph of canon 1737 indicates the peremptory time limit for proposing recourse: fifteen useful or available days. This time limit runs from the day on which the decree was published, if no petition to amend or revoke it was required; from the day of the response to the petition to amend or revoke it, if there was a response; or from the thirtieth day if there was no response to the petition to amend or revoke the decree (cc.

[68] See 1982 schema, cc. 1747–1749.

[69] Meszaros, "Administrative Recourse," 120–122.

[70] Chiappetta Com, 2:790. While metropolitan archbishops have certain powers of vigilance within the suffragan dioceses, these are basically of a supervisory nature whereby any abuses against the faith or ecclesiastical discipline are to be reported to the Roman Pontiff; however, the metropolitan archbishop himself does not have any authority to intervene directly in the governance of the suffragan dioceses (c. 436).

[71] Echeverría, "Del recurso," in Salamanca Com, 838–839.

[72] Labandeira, "Del recurso," in Pamplona Com, 1041; and Chiappetta Com, 2:790.

1734, §3 and 1735). Once this peremptory time has elapsed, the hierarchic superior is no longer required to hear the recourse, but is not barred from doing so if he or she considers it appropriate.[73]

The third paragraph allows the superior to suspend the effects of the decree if this has not happened automatically by the law itself or was not previously granted pursuant to 1736, §2. Again, the code expresses solicitude that the "salvation of souls" be considered when this determination is being made.

Right to Counsel

Canon 1738 — The person making recourse always has the right to use an advocate or procurator, but useless delays are to be avoided; indeed, a legal representative is to be appointed ex officio if the person making recourse lacks one and the superior thinks it necessary. Nevertheless, the superior always can order the person making recourse to be present in order to be questioned.

The right to counsel in administrative recourse is a significant innovation in the 1983 code.[74] The canon expressly extends this right to "the person making recourse" at all stages of the proceedings. Nevertheless, there are some glaring omissions in the general statement of this right. Nothing is said about the right to counsel of the author of the administrative act, but equity would argue that neither party should be given any preference or advantage over the other. Also, nothing is stated in canon 1738 about the type of counsel or the qualifications of advocates or procurators. Elsewhere in Book VII of the 1983 code, canons 1481–1490 provide norms for the appointment, qualifications, disciplining, resignation and removal of advocates and procurators in judicial processes. These canons may be applied analogously to regulate the use of counsel in administrative recourse (c. 19).[75]

Furthermore, nothing is mentioned about payment of the fees and costs of the proceedings. Presumably, the expenses incurred during recourse could be paid from the administrative budget of the juridic person represented by the official whose administrative act was challenged; however, using canon 1649 by analogy, the local ordinary could determine some equitable apportionment of costs and fees among the parties involved. In any case, the canon does provide that if the aggrieved party lacks an advocate, one could be appointed ex officio if "the superior thinks it necessary."

One additional point is a reminder to avoid "useless delays" in the appointment of counsel.

Discretionary Authority of Hierarchic Superior

Canon 1739 — The superior who deals with the recourse, as the case warrants, is permitted not only to confirm the decree or declare it invalid but also to rescind or revoke it or, if it seems more expedient to the superior, to emend, replace, or modify it.

Unlike a judge in an administrative tribunal who would be able only to confirm, rescind, or annul an administrative act,[76] the hierarchic superior "has the widest possible range in deciding the recourse, since such a one has greater administrative authority than the one whose decision is being challenged."[77] Thus, the hierarchic superior is able not only to confirm the decree, declare it null, rescind it or revoke it, but can also substitute his or her own judgment by amending, subrogating, or obrogating the decree.

Confirmation of the decree, of course, upholds the decision of the lower authority.

Declaration of invalidity or nullity means that the decree itself is invalid due to some violation of law or technical defect.

[73] Green, "Administrative Recourse," in CLSA Com, 1033.

[74] D'Ostilio, "Il ricorso," in Urbaniana Com, 998; and Chiappetta Com, 2:783–784 and 791.

[75] Echeverría, "Del recurso," in Salamanca Com, 839.

[76] Moodie, "The Administrator and the Law," 49; and Meszaros, "Procedures of Administrative Recourse," 133.

[77] Green, "Administrative Recourse," in CLSA Com, 1034.

Rescission and revocation do not address the validity of the decree, but simply withdraw or quash it and make it unenforceable.

Amendment of the decree leaves the original decree in force, but with modifications.

Subrogation replaces the original decree with a new one that adds to or substitutes for the existing one.[78]

Obrogation abolishes or abrogates the original decree by issuing a new one contrary to the former one.[79]

If the hierarchic superior does not act within three continuous months of receiving the recourse, the law presumes that his or her response to the recourse is negative (c. 57). Once the three months have passed without response or after the hierarchic superior has issued a decision in accord with canon 1739, the person making recourse then has fifteen available days to make further recourse to the next hierarchical level (c. 1737, §2). However, for recourse to the Apostolic Signatura from the decision of one of the curial congregations, the peremptory time period is thirty useful days (PB 123, §1 and 125). These time periods, which are computed in accord with canons 201–203, must be observed closely or the right to make recourse can be extinguished simply by passage of these statutory time limits and without a decision on the merits of the recourse.

For example, if a priest feels aggrieved by a decision of his bishop, he has ten available days from his receipt of legal notice of the decree to ask his bishop to revoke or modify it (c. 1734). After thirty continuous days without answer from the bishop, the priest has fifteen available days to make recourse to the competent dicastery of the Roman Curia, e.g., the Congregation for the Clergy (cc. 1735 and 1737, §2). If three continuous months go by without answer from the congregation, the dicastery's answer is presumed negative (c. 57),[80] and the priest has thirty available days to make further recourse to the Apostolic Signatura (PB 123, §1). Of course, when a decision on recourse is rendered before the expiration of these peremptory periods of administrative silence, the time periods for making further recourse begin to run from the legal notice of the decision.

Note also that if the administrative act caused damage to the aggrieved party, canon 128 allows for compensation for damages.[81] In addition, canon 1281, §3 holds administrators liable for damage to juridic persons resulting from their illegitimate acts in the administration of temporal goods; and canon 1389 even provides for possible penal sanctions against those who abuse or negligently exercise power when issuing decrees.[82]

[78] Stelten, Dictionary of Ecclesiastical Latin, s.v. "subrogatio."

[79] Stelten, Dictionary of Ecclesiastical Latin, s.v. "obrogatio."

[80] The norms of the Roman Curia's Regolamento allow the dicastery to extend the time for resolving a recourse beyond ninety days, but it must inform the parties and give reasons. AAS 84 (1992) art. 120, §2.

[81] Response of the CodCom, May 22, 1923, AAS 16 (1924) 251; cited in D'Ostilio, "Il ricorso," in Urbaniana Com, 999; Labandeira, "Del recurso," in Pamplona Com, 1042; Pamplona ComEng 1075; and Chiappetta Com, 2:791. See also PB 123, §2.

[82] J. Krukowski, "Responsibility for Damage Resulting from Illegal Administrative Acts in the Code of Canon Law of 1983," in Le Nouveau Code de Droit Canonique/The New Code of Canon Law: Proceedings of the 5th International Congress of Canon Law, organized by St. Paul University and held at the University of Ottawa, August 19–25, 1984, ed. M. Thériault and J. Thorn (Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1986) 231–242. See also J. Krukowski, Administracja w Kosciele: zarys koscielnego prawa administracyjnego [Administration in the Church: An Outline of Ecclesiastical Administrative Law] (Lublin, Poland: Redakcja Wydawnictwo KUL, 1985) 290ff; P. Ciprotti, "Il risarcimento del danno nel progetto di riforma del Codice di diritto canonico," EIC 37 (1981) 169–170; F. D'Ostilio, La responsabilità per atto illecito della pubblica amministrazione nel diritto canonico (Rome: Pontificia Università Lateranense, 1966) 26; I. Gordon, "La responsabilità dell'amministrazione pubblica ecclesiastica," ME 98 (1973) 391–393; and J. F. Noubel, "La responsabilité administrative devant la S. R. Rote," RDC 18 (1968) 243.

EVALUATION OF CANONICAL PROVISIONS FOR ADMINISTRATIVE RECOURSE

A few years before the promulgation of the 1983 code, Adam Maida offered the following assessment of the processes for administrative recourse in the 1917 code:

> Why [are the 1917 provisions] for administrative recourse in the Church insufficient for the protection of individual rights?
>
> A number of reasons could be given to explain the deficiency of administrative recourse, but the following three highlight the parameters of the problem. First, the very minimum requirements of procedural due process, as we know them in the Anglo-American law, are not always operative in the resolution of such disputes. The right to counsel, to notice, to face one's accuser, to cross-examination, etc., are not required by the Canon Law. . . .
>
> Secondly, the present system does not provide for a neutral and independent resolution. Often the superior authority to whom one has recourse is responsible for the appointment of the authority being challenged. In addition, there is a reluctance to question the unfavorable decision of a superior authority. . . .
>
> Thirdly, when a person is aggrieved by the exercise of administrative authority in the local Church, it is unreasonable, and often impossible, from a practical standpoint, to have recourse to the Holy See. Distance, language, expense and cultural differences often create a situation in which the difficulty in protecting rights results in their denial. A legal procedure and an administrative forum need to be accessible and available if they are to be an effective instrument for the protection of individual rights.[83]

[83] Maida, "Rights in the Church," 41.

How well did the revised code remedy these deficiencies? The canons on administrative recourse in the 1983 code (cc. 1732–1739) have three innovations that were not present in the 1917 code:

(1) the petition to the author of the administrative act to amend or revoke it before proceeding directly to formal recourse (c. 1734, §1);
(2) the office of conciliation which can be instituted in each diocese (c. 1733);
(3) the right to counsel during administrative recourse (c. 1738).[84]

In other respects, the provisions for administrative recourse in the 1983 code are basically the same as they were in the 1917 code. In short, they simply state the existence of hierarchic recourse, time limitations for the various stages of the process, provisions for suspension of the decree pending resolution of the dispute, and the options available to the hierarchic superior in deciding the matter. Nothing is stated in the code concerning "due process" or any type of procedure, for that matter, which must be followed in administrative recourse.[85] For example, little is stated outside of the general norms governing issuance of decrees (Book I) about procedural safeguards normally associated with the notion of due process: the right to notice, the right to be heard, the right to confront one's accusers, the right to cross-examination, the gathering of evidence, proofs, testimony, witnesses, refutation, a written decision, statement of reasons, or the right not to be judged by one's accuser.[86] The hierarchic superior seems to enjoy unlimited discretion in resolving the controversy. While discretion is an important and necessary tool of administration, unstructured discretion leaves the administrator [84] Chiappetta Com, 2:783–84.

[85] Echeverría, "Del recurso," in Salamanca Com, 839.
[86] Maida, "Rights in the Church," 40.

and the institution vulnerable to charges of misuse or abuse of discretionary authority due to real or perceived injustices in the manner in which a decision is reached.[87]

As a result, a number of canonists hold that there is still a real lacuna iuris in the administrative law of the Church.[88] A lacuna iuris means that there is a gap in the law or part of the law is missing. While canons 1732–1739 outline the rudimentary elements of administrative recourse and the general norms of canons 50–51 may be said to complement them in some sense, there is a lacuna to the extent that these canons do not fully lay out the step-by-step procedures to be followed in the process of administrative recourse. This vacuum is compounded by the fact that there are no sources listed for canons 1732–1739 in the code commission's publication of the fonts for the canons in the 1983 Code of Canon Law.[89]

Lamberto de Echeverría, Professor of Canon Law at the Pontifical University of Salamanca (Spain), believes that the lack of norms for procedures in administrative recourse should be supplied by observing canon 19, which gives directions for filling the void when apposite provisions are missing from the code itself. One possible approach suggested by Echeverría is to fill the procedural lacuna with analogous provisions from Book VII of the code governing the processes in ordinary tribunals.[90] However, these canons deal with contentious trials in the judicial forum; as previously noted, administrative recourse is an entirely different species of procedure for resolving disputes which arise from acts of administrative power. It would seem to be more appropriate, then, to look for analogous provisions in the jurisprudential science known as administrative law or administrative justice, even though canon 19 does not explicitly refer to civil law as a supplementary source of law. This does not mean that administrative recourse must operate according to civil law processes of administrative justice, but that it could be done in this way, since neither church doctrine nor church law nor church custom either prohibits or impedes an appropriate adaptation of civil law principles of administrative justice in the local church. Since canon law has already borrowed the concepts of conciliation and arbitration virtually intact from the Roman law institutes of transactio and compromissum inter arbitros,[91] there should be no objection to borrowing from other civil law concepts in the development of procedures for handling administrative recourse.

Accordingly, complementing the canonical provisions for administrative recourse by accommodating civil law models of administrative justice to an ecclesial understanding of the Church as the family of God constituted in hierarchic communion, it is feasible to synthesize five basic procedural rights for administrative recourse in the Church, as follows:

1. THE RIGHT TO AN IMPARTIAL DECISION-MAKER:

Anyone who claims to have been injured by an act of administrative power shall enjoy the right to make recourse for any just reason to the hierarchic superior of the author of the act, proposing such recourse directly to the superior or transmitting it through the author of the act; the competent hierarchic superior can decide the matter personally or appoint an impartial person as a delegate or vicar authorized to review the action or decision according to the laws of the Church.

2. THE RIGHT TO ADEQUATE NOTICE:

The affected persons in administrative recourse shall have the right to adequate no-[87] Beal, "Administrative Discretion," 70–74.

[88] Ibid., 74; Matthews, "Administrative Tribunal," 175; Meszaros, "Administrative Recourse," 113; Provost, "Promoting and Protecting the Rights of Christians," 313–314; G. Raab, Rechtsschutz gegenüber der Verwaltung (Rome: Università Gregoriana Editrice, 1978) 259.

[89] CIC An, cc. 1732–1739.

[90] Echeverría, "Del recurso," in Salamanca Com, 839.

[91] Matthews, "Administrative Tribunal," 55–82.

tice of the impending matter, including notice of the date, time, and place of any hearing; notice of the nature of the issue; and sufficient time to prepare their case.

3. THE RIGHT TO BE HEARD:
In administrative recourse, the right to a meaningful opportunity to be heard shall be observed, including the right to information relevant to one's case, especially opposing evidence; the right of defense; the right to present one's case orally or in writing or both; and the right to call and examine witnesses, confront contrary testimony, and refute adverse allegations.

4. THE RIGHT TO ASSISTANCE AND REPRESENTATION:
All persons shall have the right to the assistance and representation of counsel or an advocate in administrative recourse; an advocate ex officio is to be constituted if the person taking recourse lacks assistance or representation and the superior considers an advocate necessary.

5. THE RIGHT TO AN EQUITABLE DECISION AND REMEDIES:
The competent authority who examines a case in administrative recourse shall comply with the right to an equitable decision based on available information, including a written statement of findings and reasons; provision of appropriate remedies; and an indication of the avenues for further recourse or review, if any.[92]

The right to petition the Church for redress of grievances and the right not to be deprived of due process of law are themselves substantive rights. The procedures that specify the processes for exercising these rights are known as procedural rights. The observance of these procedural rights in administrative recourse would make a significant impact in advancing the vindication and defense of the substantive rights of the Christian faithful in the Church.

[92] T. Paprocki, Vindication and Defense of the Rights of the Christian Faithful through Administrative Recourse in the Local Church (JCD diss., Pontificia Universitas Gregoriana, Rome, 1991; repr., Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms International, 1993) 510–512.

SECTION II
THE PROCEDURE IN THE REMOVAL OR TRANSFER OF PASTORS
[cc. 1740–1752]

CHAPTER I
THE MANNER OF PROCEEDING IN THE REMOVAL OF PASTORS
[cc. 1740–1747]

General Reason for Removal of Pastors

Canon 1740 — When the ministry of any pastor becomes harmful or at least ineffective for any cause, even through no grave personal negligence, the diocesan bishop can remove him from the parish.

Since the Christian faithful enjoy the right to receive assistance from the sacred pastors out of the spiritual goods of the Church, especially the word of God and the sacraments (c. 213), pastors have a correlative duty to provide such pastoral care (cc. 519–535, 757, and 843). Diocesan bishops have an obligation to foster vocations (c. 385), to ordain only needed and suitable candidates for the priesthood (cc. 1024–1032), and to appoint only qualified priests as pastors of parishes (c. 521). It follows logically that pastors who are not fulfilling their duty should be removed from office. Canon 1740 codifies that principle.

Because this responsibility belongs uniquely to the diocesan bishop and those equivalent in law (see cc. 368 and 381, §2), vicars general and episcopal vicars cannot remove a pastor without a special mandate (see cc. 134, §3 and 479, §§1–2). Moreover, canons 1740–1752 refer to the removal and transfer only of pastors, not of associate pastors (parochial vicars) or priests assigned to other types of pastoral ministry, e.g., hospital chaplains.[93] For priests serving in offices other than pastor of a parish, the general canonical provisions for transfer or removal from ecclesiastical office apply (cc. 190–195), with the pertinent procedural safeguards provided by the canons on general norms (cc. 50–51).

The grounds stated for removal are most broad and leave wide discretion to the diocesan bishop. The pastor's ministry need be only "harmful or at least ineffective for any cause." There need be no finding of fault or culpability on the part of the pastor. Since the diocesan bishop freely confers the office of pastor unless someone else has a right of presentation (c. 523), a pastor normally does not hold this ecclesiastical office as a matter of substantive right,[94] although the pastor may be said to enjoy the procedural rights specified in the removal and transfer processes described in canons 1740–1752. Consequently, the canons on removal are to be construed broadly (c. 18). However, if the "removal" is really the privation of office imposed as a penalty, the norms for the judicial penal process must be observed.

In practice, therefore, if recourse is made against a pastor's removal, the bishop's decision will generally not be overturned by the Holy See for substantive reasons because of the breadth of the general grounds for removal. It is far more likely that a bishop will be overruled by the Holy See if he has failed to follow the procedures specified in these canons. For this reason, careful attention must be paid to the procedural requirements which follow the next canon.

Examples of Reasons for Removal

Canon 1741 — The causes for which a pastor can be removed legitimately from his parish are especially the following:

1° a manner of acting which brings grave detriment or disturbance to ecclesiastical communion;

2° ineptitude or a permanent infirmity of mind or body which renders the pastor unable to fulfill his functions usefully;

3° loss of a good reputation among upright and responsible parishioners or an aversion to the pastor which it appears will not cease in a brief time;

4° grave neglect or violation of parochial duties which persists after a warning;

5° poor administration of temporal affairs with grave damage to the Church whenever another remedy to this harm cannot be found.

In light of the broad general basis for removal of pastors articulated in canon 1740, the catalog of reasons for removal in canon 1741 is almost superfluous. In fact, canon 1742 indicates that a bishop is to begin the process of removal if an inquiry "has established the existence of one of the causes mentioned in can. 1740." No mention is made of canon 1741 as the basis for beginning such a process. So why does canon 1741 exist? The answer can be seen in the use of the word "especially" (praesertim) in the introductory clause of canon 1741: "The causes for which a pastor can be removed legitimately from his parish are especially the following . . ." (emphasis added). In other words, the list which follows is illustrative, not taxative or exhaustive.[95] This means that a pastor can be removed if the bishop decides that the pastor's ministry has become harmful or ineffective for any reason, as provided by canon 1740, even if none of the specific reasons listed in canon 1741 is present. Nevertheless, the bishop's decision would certainly be strengthened if he could also point to one of the causes given in canon 1741.

[93] The term parochus is usually translated as "pastor" in the United States, while many other English-speaking countries use the term "parish priest."

[94] While pastors enjoy security of tenure and stability of office unless provision has been made for a term of office, that is, for a specified period of time (c. 522), the distinction between removable and irremovable pastors has been dropped. See CD 31, CIC 454.

[95] ComCICRec, "Schema canonum de modo procedendi pro tutela iurium seu de processibus," Comm 8 (1976) 199, n. 73.

Even this listing of specific reasons for determining pastoral suitability must be seen in light of its underlying rationale, which is the Second Vatican Council's paramount concern for the "proper care of souls," a concern cited as one of the fonts for canon 1741.[96] The reasons listed in this canon are examples of instances when the "proper care of souls" is impeded or at least threatened.

(1) The "grave detriment or disturbance" is specifically related to the conciliar notion of ecclesiastical communion.[97] If it is the pastor himself who disturbs this communion, then there is a serious obstacle to the efficacy of his pastoral ministry. Behaviors involving moral turpitude, e.g., sexual misconduct with minors, may be said to constitute manners of acting that cause grave harm or disturbance to ecclesiastical communion.

(2) "Ineptitude" (imperitia) is defined as "ignorance, lack of skill or knowledge; inexperience."[98] This ineptitude or incompetence may be either absolute or relative, that is, the pastor may not be suited for ministry in one particular parish, but may do very well elsewhere.[99] For example, a priest with no knowledge of Spanish may find that over the years demographic shifts have changed his parish membership so that it is now comprised almost exclusively of Spanish-speaking people. If he refuses or is unable to learn Spanish, the bishop may decide that the priest is no longer suited to be pastor of this particular parish. He may, however, be quite effective elsewhere in an English-speaking parish. In such a case, transfer would be more appropriate if another suitable pastorate is available. If not, the pastor may need to be removed pending the availability of a suitable pastorate.

Another basis for removal mentioned here is a "permanent infirmity of mind or body." This condition, however, must be such that it renders the pastor unable to fulfill his official duties properly or usefully. Thus, it is not enough that the pastor have some sort of permanent disability; the infirmity must be such that it interferes with his ability to work effectively. The canon makes no mention of consulting with medical experts about the state of a pastor's health. However, even though it is the diocesan bishop who ultimately must decide about the pastor's suitability to continue in office, analogous provisions of other canons suggest that it would be well for the bishop to obtain an expert's assessment to assist the bishop in making his determination.[100]

(3) "Loss of a good reputation" by and "aversion" to the pastor are not absolutes. It is not sufficient that the pastor has lost his good reputation in the eyes of some parishioners or even of parishioners in general. Rather, these are factors to be considered only to the extent that they take place among "upright and responsible parishioners." This is an important distinction because of the need to protect the prophetic witness which a pastor may be called upon to give from time to time. For example, it may not be popular to preach against racism, abortion, or capital punishment, and a pastor who does so may become the object of scorn among some parishioners. Presumably, though, "upright and responsible parishioners" would not object if the pastor were teaching the authentic doctrine of the Church. Also, it must be apparent that the difficulty will not cease in a brief time. This means that the bishop must carefully discern whether the problem is an enduring one or merely a passing tension in the parish.

(4) "Grave neglect or violation of parochial duties" must be an enduring problem about which [96] See CIC An, 475, listing CD 31 and ES I, 20, §1.

[97] See LG 18–28.

[98] Stelten, Dictionary of Ecclesiastical Latin, s.v. "imperitia."

[99] See J. Parizek, "The Manner of Procedure in Removing Pastors," in CLSA Com, 1037–1038.

[100] See cc. 1041, 1°; 1044, §2, 2°; 1574–1581; and 1680.

the pastor has been admonished. This reason for removal goes to the heart of the Church's pastoral concern for the "proper care of souls."

(5) "Poor administration of temporal affairs" is also a relative cause; that is, it must result in "grave damage to the Church" and there must be no other available remedy for this problem. It may be that the pastor is wonderfully capable in preaching the gospel and providing for the spiritual care of his parishioners, but he is an inept administrator. If the difficulty could be addressed by hiring a parish business manager, the canon suggests that this would be preferable to removing the pastor.

One of the most vexing and unfortunate problems facing the Church in recent times is that of clerical sexual misconduct with minors. Even Pope John Paul II felt the need to address "this problem of how the sins of clerics have shocked the moral sensibilities of many and become an occasion of sin for others."[101] It is scandalous for any priest to engage in such misconduct, but the difficulty is compounded if the accused priest is the pastor of a parish. Adding to the complexity is the fact that accusations often have to do with things that took place many years in the past, due to the length of time it takes victims (sometimes after years of therapy) to summon the courage to confront the alleged perpetrator. By the time this happens, the peremptory period of prescription may have passed for bringing a canonical process for the imposition of a penalty.[102]

In such cases, the accusation may be very public and the bishop may be morally convinced of the credibility of the allegation. Even if the allegation is not yet public, the bishop may be rightfully concerned about the scandal which would arise if the apparent problem were not adequately addressed. If he is barred by prescription from imposing a canonical penalty, is there not anything he can do?

While canon 2147, §2, 3° of the 1917 code allowed that a pastor could lose his good reputation by recent detection of an earlier crime, the 1983 code eliminated this and the "probable occult commission of a crime" (CIC 2147, §2, 4°) as bases for removal. Thus, it has been observed that attempting to predicate removal on a probable occult crime is improper "since all reasons for removal must be manifestly provable."[103] However, canon 1741, 3° added the reason of "aversion to the pastor," which had not been in the 1917 code.

One might expect that there would be a strong aversion to a pastor whom parishioners reasonably suspect has been involved in sexual misconduct with minors. This is not always the case, however, since people may refuse to believe that someone apparently otherwise so good could do something so bad. Certainly the possibility of false allegations must be considered as well as the priest's right to his good reputation (c. 220). But persistent, even if unfounded, rumors, media reports, and lawsuits can cause aversion to a pastor and render his ministry ineffective. In such cases, the diocesan bishop and the falsely accused pastor would need to weigh very carefully the protection of the priest's good name and reputation with the pastoral needs of the parish.

Sometimes the people remain convinced of the priest's innocence despite extensive adverse information to the contrary. In any event, clerical sexual misconduct with minors could be said to be a "manner of acting which brings grave detriment or disturbance to ecclesiastical communion" (c. 1741, 1°) as well as "loss of a good reputation" (c. 1741, 3°), and therefore be a basis for a priest's removal as pastor. The Holy See has upheld a pastor's removal on these grounds, even when the diocesan bishop was barred by prescription from imposing a penalty. Given the overriding canonical and pastoral concern for the [101] John Paul II, Letter to Bishops of the United States of America, June 11, 1993, in Origins 23 (July 1, 1993) 102.

[102] See cc. 1395, §2 and 1362, §1, 2°, with derogations granted by rescript from an audience of Pope John Paul II for a period of five years, effective April 25, 1994, and subsequently extended for ten or more years until April 25, 2009.

[103] ComCICRec, "Schema canonum de modo procedendi," 199, n. 73.

"proper care of souls" and the need to take into account the "common good of the Church" (c. 223, §1), a pastor's removal is certainly warranted and morally required in such circumstances if the diocesan bishop has determined that the safety of children and the prevention of scandal require it.

Procedure for Removal

Canon 1742 — §1. If the instruction which was carried out has established the existence of one of the causes mentioned in can. 1740, the bishop is to discuss the matter with two pastors selected from the group established for this purpose in a stable manner by the presbyteral council at the proposal of the bishop. If the bishop then judges that removal must take place, he paternally is to persuade the pastor to resign within fifteen days, after having explained, for validity, the cause and arguments for the removal.

§2. The prescript of can. 682, §2 is to be observed for pastors who are members of a religious institute or a society of apostolic life.

The procedure for removal presupposes an inquiry to verify that one of the grounds mentioned in canon 1740 is present. The fact that canon 1741 is not mentioned indicates that the reasons listed there only illustrate examples of when the pastor's ministry has become harmful or at least ineffective. The canon does not mention who does this instruction or inquiry, so presumably the diocesan bishop could do it himself. For the sake of greater objectivity and to demonstrate that he is not acting out of some personal animosity or because of a personality clash, it would make sense for the bishop to ask someone else, such as the vicar general, dean, vicar for priests, or chancellor, to make this inquiry. Although the removal of a pastor is an administrative process and not a penal one, canon 1717 provides a helpful analogy by directing the ordinary "to inquire personally or through another suitable person about the facts, circumstances, and imputability, unless such an inquiry seems entirely superfluous."

If the bishop is satisfied that there is a justified basis for proceeding after this inquiry, the next step calls for consultation with two specially selected pastors. The manner of selecting these two pastors requires careful attention. The bishop cannot proceed by simply picking out two pastors in the diocese. First, the bishop must propose a list of pastors to the presbyteral council. From this list, the presbyteral council (not the bishop) establishes a group of pastors as a sort of standing committee, which might be called the "Pastors' Review Panel." The bishop then can select two pastors from this panel of names. The canon does not specify how many pastors should be in this group, but since the bishop is to select two pastors from the group, presumably the list contains more than two names. Having a larger pool to choose from is helpful in ensuring that there are two impartial pastors who would not be disqualified by close friendship with the pastor being reviewed or by some other conflict of interest which could impair their objective judgment. In establishing this Pastors' Review Panel, the presbyteral council can approve all of the names or only some of the names proposed by the bishop, but the stipulation that it is the bishop who proposes names to the council implies that the council cannot add names which are not on the bishop's list.

Since the consultation with the two pastors is required, it must be carried out properly for validity (c. 127). The minutes of the meeting during which the presbyteral council establishes the group of pastors proposed by the bishop should indicate that the council was properly convoked (c. 166) and that an absolute majority of council members consented to the selection of the group of pastors (c. 127, §1). When the bishop selects the two pastors with whom he will discuss the matter of removal, he is consulting with them as individual persons and not as a collegial body. Thus, for validity, the bishop must hear their counsel, but does not need their consent to act; however, he should not act contrary to their opinion unless, in the bishop's judgment, he has an overriding reason (c. 127, §2, 2°). Moreover, the pastors are obliged to offer their opinion sincerely and, if the bishop so indicates, maintain confidentiality (c. 127, §3). If a pastor believes he cannot fulfill these obligations, he should recuse himself and suggest that the bishop choose someone else to advise him.

If the consultation with the two pastors convinces the bishop to proceed with the removal, canon law once again expresses its preference for avoiding contentious litigation (cf. cc. 1446, 1713, and 1733). The bishop cannot simply decree the pastor's removal, but he "paternally is to persuade the pastor to resign," giving the pastor fifteen days to think about it. The canon does not say fifteen useful days, so it would seem these are fifteen continuous days. After all, the pastor in question does not need access to the diocesan offices during normal business hours to consider the matter. Most likely, he will think about little else for at least the next fifteen days.

In trying to persuade the pastor to resign, the bishop must explain his reasons for the request. This explanation is required for the validity of the process. If the bishop simply asks for the pastor's resignation but does not say why, and if the pastor initially offers it out of a sense of obedience, the pastor can later challenge the resignation as invalid on the ground that he was not provided with the required explanation.

The second paragraph of canon 1742 cites canon 682, §2 as a reminder that either the diocesan bishop or the religious superior, without the consent of the other, can remove a pastor who is a member of a religious institute or a society of apostolic life. Diocesan bishops and religious superiors are to keep each other informed before acting. The courtesy of providing this notice is required for liceity, but not for validity.

Resignation of the Pastor

Canon 1743 — A pastor can submit a resignation not only purely and simply but also conditionally, provided that the bishop can accept it legitimately and actually does accept it.

The possibility of a conditional resignation afforded by this canon allows the pastor to make the effectiveness of his resignation contingent on some fact. For example, the bishop explains that his reason for asking for the resignation is the pastor's embezzlement of church funds. The pastor is contrite and offers to make full restitution. As a sign that he intends to make good on this promise, he offers his resignation if the funds are not fully repaid by a certain date. In order for such a conditional resignation to be effective, the condition must actually be realized. In the example, if the specified date comes and goes without full repayment, the resignation takes effect. On the other hand, if the pastor in fact makes full restitution by the date promised, his resignation is avoided.

It must be legitimate for the bishop to accept the resignation. In the above example, should the pastor promise to make repayment if he can obtain an illegal loan, it would not be legitimate for the bishop to accept such a condition.

A problem arises when a pastor agrees to resign on condition that he be appointed to another parish or office, since canon 153, §3 provides that the promise of any office, regardless of who makes the promise, has no juridical effect.

The bishop must also in fact accept the resignation. Moreover, the general norms on resignation from ecclesiastical office must be observed (cc. 187–189).

Pastor Does Not Answer or Simply Refuses to Resign

Canon 1744 — §1. If the pastor has not responded within the prescribed days, the bishop is to repeat the invitation and extend the useful time to respond.

§2. If the bishop establishes that the pastor received the second invitation but did not respond even though not prevented by any impediment, or if the pastor refuses to resign without giving any reasons, the bishop is to issue a decree of removal.

The lawgiver's pastoral solicitude to avoid contentious litigation continues. Apparently the fifteen-day period provided by canon 1742 is not a fatalia legis, since the bishop is required to repeat the invitation for the resignation if the pastor has not responded within the allotted time. Moreover, the bishop is to give the pastor more time to think about it. No particular period is specified, except that the time is to be "useful."

Not only must the bishop issue a second invitation to resign, but the law also requires the bishop to ascertain that the pastor in fact received the second invitation. If the invitations to resign are not extended in person with a witness present, they should be sent in writing by certified mail in order to have documentary proof for any possible later recourse. Moreover, the bishop must establish that the lack of response was not due to some impediment and that, in fact, the pastor has simply refused to resign without giving any reasons.

Only after the above steps have been exhausted can the bishop proceed to issue a decree of removal.

Pastor States Reasons Opposing the Removal

Canon 1745 — If the pastor opposes the cause given and its reasons and alleges reasons which seem insufficient to the bishop, the bishop, in order to act validly, is:

1° to invite the pastor to organize his objections in a written report after he has inspected the acts, and offer any proofs he has to the contrary;

2° when any necessary instruction is completed, to consider the matter together with the same pastors mentioned in can. 1742, §1, unless others must be designated because those pastors are unavailable;

3° finally, to establish whether the pastor must be removed or not and promptly to issue a decree on the matter.

The preceding canon allows the bishop to issue a decree of removal if the pastor does not respond or if he simply refuses to resign but gives no reasons, and if the time specified has elapsed. However, canon 1745 deals with the situation in which a pastor refuses to resign and alleges reasons which the bishop judges to be insufficient. In this case, the bishop must defer issuing the decree of removal until after the pastor has had an opportunity to offer a defense and the bishop has consulted once again with the two pastors.

If the pastor properly expresses his opposition and his reasons within the peremptory period,[104] then the bishop can either acquiesce and refrain from issuing the decree of removal or he must proceed, for the validity of the removal, as outlined by canon 1745. Accordingly, the bishop must give the pastor to be removed an opportunity to inspect any and all of the acts and invite him to put his objections to his removal in writing and offer any proofs contrary to those of the bishop. Canon 1745, 1° does not mention how much time the pastor has to submit his written rebuttal, but equity would demand, on the one hand, that he be given sufficient time to organize his challenges to the removal and prepare his report; on the other hand, both the bishop and the pastor should proceed expeditiously so as not to impair the pastoral care of souls.

After the pastor's written rebuttal is submitted, the bishop is again to consult with the same two pastors from the "Pastors' Review Panel" previously consulted in this process. If one or both of these pastors is unavailable for any reason, substitution is permitted from the group established for this purpose by the presbyteral council from the list proposed by the bishop.

After all of this is done, the bishop must decide whether or not to remove the pastor and promptly issue a decree announcing his decision. For validity, the bishop must sign this decree (c. 474). For liceity, the decree must also give at least a summary of the reasons for the decision (c. 51) and be co-signed by the chancellor or other ecclesiastical notary (c. 474); the chancellor is also to inform the moderator of the curia of this decision (c. 474).

[104] The peremptory period is within fifteen days of the first invitation to resign (c. 1742, §1) or, if the pastor has remained silent, within the additional time extended by the bishop in his second invitation to resign (c. 1744, §1).

Nothing is said directly in the canons about the type of certitude the bishop is to have in making his decision. Canon 1742, §1 uses constiterit in referring to the causes for removal. Consto in the code generally means moral certitude,[105] but the moral certitude required concerns the cause mentioned in canon 1740, that is, "when the ministry of any pastor becomes harmful or at least ineffective for any cause." The moral certitude in the removal of a pastor involves the bishop's prudential judgment about the effectiveness of a pastor's ministry, but not necessarily about whether the pastor is guilty of committing a canonical crime. In comparison, canon 1608 requires judges to have "moral certitude" for the pronouncement of any kind of sentence; however, the removal of a pastor is an act of executive authority and is not a judicial sentence. Since a decree of removal is an individual administrative act (cc. 35 and 48), the diocesan bishop enjoys considerable administrative discretion in exercising his executive power. Such discretion is not to be exercised arbitrarily, but must be based on moral certitude about the pastor's effectiveness in the pastoral care of souls.

In addition to the specific requirements of these canons on the removal of pastors, canon 50 requires that an authority, before issuing an individual decree, is to "seek out the necessary information and proofs and, insofar as possible, to hear those whose rights can be injured."

Provision Following Decree of Removal

Canon 1746 — After the pastor has been removed, the bishop is to make provision either for an assignment to some other office, if he is suitable for this, or for a pension as the case warrants and circumstances permit.

[105] See, for example, c. 1066.

The preference of the law is for the bishop to provide the removed pastor with another ecclesiastical office. For the provision of any such office, however, the person must be suitable, in keeping with the qualities required for that office (c. 149). If he is not suitable for another office, he is to be given a pension. This follows the principle of at least minimum support due to a cleric even if he is unassigned (cc. 195 and 1350).

Effects of Removal

Canon 1747 — §1. The removed pastor must refrain from exercising the function of pastor, vacate the rectory as soon as possible, and hand over everything belonging to the parish to the person to whom the bishop has entrusted the parish.

§2. If, however, the man is sick and cannot be transferred elsewhere from the rectory without inconvenience, the bishop is to leave him the use, even exclusive use, of the rectory while this necessity lasts.

§3. While recourse against a decree of removal is pending, the bishop cannot appoint a new pastor, but is to provide a parochial administrator in the meantime.

Normally, the removed pastor must cease all pastoral activity in the parish, move out of the rectory, and give everything pertinent to the person assigned by the bishop to care for the parish. The law is solicitous, however, of a pastor who may have been removed because of illness; in such a case, the removed pastor can stay in the rectory and even retain its exclusive use as long as necessary if he cannot be conveniently moved elsewhere.

If the pastor makes recourse against the decree of removal, the recourse has quasi-suspensive effect: the removed pastor retains only title to the office, but otherwise loses his right to exercise the office. Until the recourse is decided, the bishop cannot name a new pastor, but he can and should appoint a parochial administrator (cc. 539–540).

CHAPTER II
THE MANNER OF PROCEEDING IN THE TRANSFER OF PASTORS
[cc. 1748–1752]

Reason for Transfer of Pastors

Canon 1748 — If the good of souls or the necessity or advantage of the Church demands that a pastor be transferred from a parish which he is governing usefully to another parish or another office, the bishop is to propose the transfer to him in writing and persuade him to consent to it out of love of God and souls.

Even though canon law no longer speaks of removable and irremovable pastors, the process for the transfer of pastors has an underlying assumption that pastors enjoy stability in office, and therefore should be appointed for an indefinite period of time (cf. c. 522). Appointment of a pastor for a specified term of office is done only by way of exception when the bishops' conference has provided for this.[106] When the term of a pastor appointed for a specified period of time expires, it is not necessary to use the process for removal or transfer if the diocesan bishop wishes to appoint the priest to another parish or even some other office. The bishop need only notify the priest in writing that he no longer holds the office of pastor by reason of the expiration of his term (c. 186).

It is also not necessary to follow these canons on the transfer of pastors if the pastor is the one initiating the change. Many dioceses now use a process of "open-listing" of parishes in need of a pastor. If a pastor applies for consideration as a candidate to be pastor of another parish, it is obvious that he is not opposed to being transferred. The text and context of the canons on the transfer of a pastor make it clear that this process is intended for use when it is the bishop who is initiating the transfer and the pastor is likely not to be amenable to the change. Canon 190, §2 makes this explicit: when the officeholder is unwilling to accept a transfer, there must be grave cause for the transfer and the procedure prescribed by law is to be observed. The corollary of this norm is that there need not be grave reason and the procedure need not be followed if the officeholder is open to the transfer.

Although in effect all pastors are now removable, there must be sufficient reason for a pastor's involuntary transfer: the good of souls or the necessity or advantage of the Church.[107] Even if the bishop is convinced that such cause exists, he cannot act unilaterally. Again, with solicitude for the pastor's well-being and concern to avoid contentiousness, the legislator requires the bishop to propose the transfer to the pastor in writing and persuade the pastor to agree to the move out of love for God and the good of souls. If the pastor accedes to the proposal, the bishop can then transfer him to another parish or even to some nonparochial office. If the pastor does not agree, then the process outlined in the following canons must continue.

Pastor's Opposition to Transfer

Canon 1749 — If the pastor does not intend to submit to the counsel and persuasions of the bishop, he is to explain the reasons in writing.

If the bishop is not able to persuade the pastor to cooperate, the pastor must put his opposition and the reasons for his opposition in writing. The canon does not specify how much time the pastor is to be given to do this, but, using the analogy of canon 1744, §1, the bishop should indicate the period of time which the pastor has available for his response. Since canon 1752 includes a reminder that canonical equity is to be observed in cases of [106] Six-year (except where noted) renewable terms for pastors are allowed by decree of the episcopal conferences of Australia, Canada, the Gambia, Liberia, Sierra Leone, India (period left up to individual local ordinaries), Ireland, Nigeria ("for a specified period of time"), the Philippines, and the United States of America. See Pamplona ComEng, Appendix III.

[107] See ES I, 20, §2.

transfer, the bishop should not set an unreasonably short period of time for the pastor's response, nor should the pastor be allowed to delay the process through procrastination. If the pastor chooses simply not to respond, the traditional rules of law indicate that silence may be interpreted as consent.[108]

Second Invitation to Be Transferred

Canon 1750 — Notwithstanding the reasons alleged, if the bishop decides not to withdraw from his proposal, he is to consider the reasons which favor or oppose the transfer with two pastors selected according to the norm of can. 1742, §1. If he then decides to implement the transfer, however, he is to repeat the paternal exhortations to the pastor.

If the pastor objects to the transfer and puts his reasons in writing, and if the bishop still insists on the transfer, the bishop is to discuss the reasons for and against the transfer with two pastors chosen according to the same process established for the removal of pastors in canon 1742, §1. The bishop is then to repeat his efforts to persuade the pastor to cooperate.

Decree of Transfer

Canon 1751 — §1. When this has been done, if the pastor still refuses and the bishop thinks that the transfer must be made, he is to issue a decree of transfer, establishing that the parish will be vacant after the lapse of a set time.

§2. If this period of time has passed without action, he is to declare the parish vacant.

Canonical equity again requires a reasonable period of time for the bishop's second effort to persuade the pastor to accept the transfer. After this period has elapsed, if the pastor is still opposed but the bishop continues to insist on the transfer, the bishop can proceed with issuing a decree of transfer. This decree, issued with the usual formalities (see commentary on canon 1745), is to specify a period of time after which the parish will be declared vacant.

The second paragraph of canon 1751, referring to the period of time passing without action, suggests that the bishop is to wait for some response from the pastor. Since at this point there is nothing to prevent the bishop from proceeding if he has correctly followed the process for transfer, the pastor may wish to indicate his willingness to cooperate and avoid the stigma of being transferred involuntarily, unless perhaps he wants to make a statement that he is being moved from the parish against his will. While he might choose not to cooperate in anticipation of having recourse against the decree of transfer, canon 1748 would not suggest great optimism for a successful challenge since the grounds for transfer are so broadly stated. The implication of this second paragraph, however, is that there is to be a second, separate juridic act by the bishop after waiting for the specified period to pass. In this act, the bishop is to declare the parish vacant. Presumably, this is also true when the transferred pastor is given his new assignment. If the pastor is not given a new assignment, he could argue that he has not, in fact, been transferred, but removed. In that case, the more stringent process for removal of a pastor would have to be followed (cc. 1740–1747).

Two additional topics of some practical importance concerning the procedures for the transfer of pastors should be noted:

1. The Apostolic Signatura has expressed concern about the abuse of the transfer process to effect the removal of a pastor by a less cumbersome procedure. The "grave cause" (c. 190, §2) for the transfer of a pastor is "the good of souls or the necessity or advantage of the Church" (c. 1748). In contrast, the ground for removing a pastor is when his ministry "becomes harmful or at least ineffective for any cause" (c. 1740). These are two very distinct situations.

[108] Qui tacet consentire videtur. RI, 43.

2. The Signatura has also taken the position that the simultaneous transfer of multiple pastors (a common practice in most English-speaking countries) is invalid unless each pastor to be transferred has first resigned his parish. This is due to the provision of canon 153, §1, which states that "the provision of an office which by law is not vacant is by that fact invalid and is not validated by subsequent vacancy." An exception is provided in c. 153, §2, which allows for provision of an office within six months before the expiration of a predetermined time; however, it does not take effect until the day the office becomes vacant. In the case of appointment of a pastor, this can be done only if the conference of bishops has permitted term limits for pastors (c. 522).[109]

The Supreme Law of the Church

Canon 1752 — In cases of transfer the prescripts of can. 1747 are to be applied, canonical equity is to be observed, and the salvation of souls, which must always be the supreme law in the Church, is to be kept before one's eyes.

Just as the Latin language often places the most significant word at the end of a sentence for emphasis, the Latin Code of Canon Law puts its most important norm in the very last canon: the salvation of souls is the highest law of the Church. Many areas of Roman culture have been assimilated into the life of the Church, and even this "supreme law" is adapted from Roman law. The fonts for canon 1752 indicate that the source of this maxim is St. Ivo of Chartres (approx. 1040–1115 A.D.), St. Raymond of Peñaforte (1185–1275 A.D.), and St. Thomas Aquinas (approx. 1225–1274 A.D.).[110] However, further historical investigation actually traces the roots of this maxim to the Twelve Tables of Roman Law (approx. 450 B.C.) to which Cicero refers: "the salvation (safety/welfare) of the people shall be the supreme law."[111]

Although this supreme law, substituting "souls" for "the people," is cited along with canonical equity as guiding principles in cases of transfer, the text and context suggest that this reminder is meant to apply to all areas of canonical jurisprudence. Having said that, one must not read too much into it, since such a broadly stated maxim could be cited for conflicting sides of the same argument. For example, the bishop may be convinced that the good of souls requires the pastor's transfer, while the pastor may sincerely believe that the parish will collapse if he leaves. Each could argue his position based on his concern for the supreme law of the Church, namely, the salvation of the parishioners' souls.

One must therefore provide greater specificity regarding the content and implications of this maxim. The effort to do just that is only one reason why the Code of Canon Law contains one thousand seven hundred and fifty-two canons instead of just this one supreme law! Since the details of the law are often daunting to the casual observer, a maxim such as "The salvation of souls is the supreme law of the Church" helps make the law approachable. Lest the law lose its effectiveness, however, by becoming too easily invoked in any and every situation, it must be formed to fit specific circumstances, as William Shakespeare pointed out:

> We must not make a scarecrow of the law,
> Setting it up to fear the birds of prey,
> And let it keep one shape, till custom make it
> Their perch and not their terror.[112]

[109] See the discussion of this issue in CLS-GBIN 104 (1995) 22–32.

[110] CIC An, c. 1752.

[111] Salus populi suprema lex esto. Cicero, De Legibus 3.3.8 (Loeb Classical Library, 1977) 466–467. See also B. Nicholas, An Introduction to Roman Law (Oxford: Clarendon, 1962) 15; and H. Jolowicz and B. Nicholas, Historical Introduction to the Study of Roman Law, 3rd ed. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1972) 5, 13, and 191, n. 1.

[112] William Shakespeare, "Measure for Measure" (1604), Act II, sc. i, l, 1.

APPENDIX I – CHECKLIST OF STEPS TO BE FOLLOWED IN THE REMOVAL OF A PASTOR

The following is a checklist of steps to be followed in the removal of a pastor in accord with the procedures outlined in canons 1740–1747:

______ 1. As provided by canon 1742, §1, the diocesan bishop should propose a list of pastors to the presbyteral council (unless this has already been done). From this list, the presbyteral council establishes a group of pastors to serve as the "Pastors' Review Panel" from which the bishop can select two pastors with whom he will consult as required in the various steps of this process.

______ 2. Although it is not required by canon law, the diocesan bishop might speak informally and pastorally with the priest whose pastorate is in question to discuss the situation.

______ 3. If the bishop believes it is warranted by the circumstances, he can begin the canonical process for removal of the pastor by:

______ a. appointing a priest (e.g., vicar general/chancellor/vicar for priests) in writing to conduct an inquiry to determine if a cause mentioned in canons 1740–1741 is present which would warrant the removal the pastor.

______ b. sending letters to two priest-consultors appointing them to serve in accord with canon 1742, §1.

______ c. (optional:) sending a letter to the pastor informing him that this process is being initiated.

______ 4. The diocesan bishop should meet with the two pastor-consultors, as required by canon 1742, §1, to discuss the matter with them and receive their recommendations. They should be reminded of the obligation of confidentiality (c. 127, §3) and the right to privacy (c. 220) of the parties involved. A memo recording the minutes of this meeting should be drawn up, notarized by a priest-notary, and filed (c. 483, §2).

______ 5. If the diocesan bishop decides that the removal must take place, "he paternally is to persuade the pastor to resign within fifteen days, after having explained, for validity, the cause and arguments for the removal" (c. 1742, §1). This should be done by means of a personal meeting between the bishop and the pastor, with a priest-notary present. If the pastor desires, he should be allowed to have a canonical advocate present also. A letter from the bishop to the pastor, notarized by a priest-notary, should summarize the conversation and request for the pastor's resignation, along with the reasons and arguments for removal.

______ 6. First Scenario – Resignation: If the pastor is willing to resign, this should be done in writing and the bishop should send the pastor a letter accepting the resignation (cc. 189 and 1743). The letter of acceptance should be notarized by a priest-notary (cc. 474 and 483, §2). If the priest resigns, he is no longer pastor and the remaining steps can be disregarded.

______ 7. Second Scenario – No Response or Simple Refusal: "If the pastor has not responded within the prescribed days [15 days], the bishop is to repeat the invitation [to resign] and extend the useful time to respond" (c. 1744, §1). This should be done by means of a letter to the pastor from the bishop. The letter should be notarized by a priest-notary and sent by certified mail, return receipt requested (cf. c. 1744, §2). An additional time period of at least another fifteen days would be a reasonable extension.

______ 8. After the additional time period has expired and the return receipt of certified mail delivery has been received, if there is no response although the pastor is "not prevented by any impediment, or if the pastor refuses to resign without giving any reasons, the bishop is to issue a decree of removal" (c. 1744, §2). Again, this decree should be notarized by a priest-notary.

______ 9. Third Scenario – Opposition to Removal: If the pastor expresses his opposition to the removal and its reasons, alleging reasons which appear insufficient to the bishop, canon 1745 requires the bishop, for validity:

______ a. "to invite the pastor to organize his objections in a written report after he has inspected the acts, and offer any proofs he has to the contrary";

______ b. "when any necessary instruction is completed, to consider the matter together with the same pastors mentioned in can. 1742, §1, unless others must be designated because those pastors are unavailable";

______ c. "finally, to establish whether the pastor must be removed or not and promptly to issue a decree on the matter."

______ 10. After the removal is completed, the bishop is either to give the priest another assignment, if he is suitable for this, or the priest should be provided a pension, as the case requires and circumstances permit (c. 1746).

______ 11. If the removed pastor has recourse to the Holy See, he can no longer function as pastor and cannot live in the rectory (c. 1747, §1) unless he is too sick to be transferred elsewhere (c. 1747, §2), but a new pastor cannot be named while the recourse is pending; meanwhile the bishop is to provide a parochial administrator (c. 1747, §3).

APPENDIX II – CHECKLIST OF STEPS TO BE FOLLOWED IN THE TRANSFER OF A PASTOR

The following is a checklist of steps to be followed in the transfer of a pastor in accord with the procedures outlined in canons 1748–1752:

______ 1. As provided by canon 1742, §1, the diocesan bishop should propose a list of pastors to the presbyteral council (unless this has already been done). From this list, the presbyteral council establishes a group of pastors to serve as the "Pastors' Review Panel" from which the bishop can select two pastors with whom he will consult as required in the various steps of this process.

______ 2. Although it is not required by canon law, the diocesan bishop might speak informally and pastorally with the priest whose transfer is being considered to discuss the situation.

______ 3. If the bishop believes it is warranted by the circumstances, he can begin the canonical process for transfer of the pastor by proposing the transfer to him in writing and persuading him to consent to it "out of love of God and souls" (c. 1748).

______ 4. "If the pastor does not intend to submit to the counsel and persuasions of the bishop, he is to explain the reasons in writing" (c. 1749).

______ 5. Having reviewed the pastor's reasons for opposing the transfer, if the bishop still wishes to proceed, he should ______ a. send letters to two priest-consultors, appointing them to serve in accord with canon 1750;

  ______ b. meet with the two pastor-consultors, as required by canon 1750, to discuss the matter with them and receive their recommendations. They should be reminded of the obligation of confidentiality (c. 127, §3) and the right to privacy (c. 220) of the parties involved. A memo recording the minutes of this meeting should be drawn up, notarized by a priest-notary, and filed (c. 483, §2).

______ 6. If the diocesan bishop decides to implement the transfer, "he is to repeat the paternal exhortations to the pastor" (c. 1750). This should be done by means of a personal meeting between the bishop and the pastor, with a priest-notary present. If the pastor desires, he should be allowed to have a canonical advocate present also. A letter from the bishop to the pastor, notarized by a priest-notary, should summarize the conversation and request for the pastor's consent to the transfer, along with the reasons and arguments for the transfer.

______ 7. If the pastor is still unwilling to be transferred, the bishop "is to issue a decree of transfer, establishing that the parish will be vacant after the lapse of a set time" (c. 1751, §1). If there is no action after the time period has expired, the bishop is to declare the parish vacant (c. 1751, §2). This should be done in a written document (c. 190, §3) notarized by a priest-notary (cc. 474 and 483, §2).

Recourse against Administrative Decrees (cc. 1732–1739)

Alesandro, J. "Response to Bishop Malone's Address." CLSAP 50 (1988) 33.

American Arbitration Association. Labor Arbitration: Procedures and Techniques. New York: American Arbitration Association, 1979.

———. Voluntary Labor Arbitration Rules. New York: American Arbitration Association, 1979.

American Bar Association Standing Committee on Dispute Resolution. Alternative Dispute Resolution: A Handbook for Judges. Chicago: ABA Publications, 1987.

American Judicature Society. "Alternative Dispute Resolution and the Courts." Judicature 69 (February-March 1986) 252–314.

Archdiocese of Chicago. Office of Conciliation: Norms and Procedures. Chicago: Archdiocese of Chicago, 1987.

Beal, J. "Confining and Structuring Administrative Discretion." J 46 (1986) 70–106.

———. "Protecting the Rights of Lay Catholics." J 47 (1987) 132–133.

Bernardin, J. "Due Process in the Church." Homiletic and Pastoral Review 69 (1969) 756–757.

Blair, C. "A Court System on Overload: The Need for Alternative Dispute Resolution." Chicago Bar Association Record (November 1989) 12–13.

Buzzard, L., J. Buzzard, and L. Eck. Readiness for Reconciliation: A Biblical Guide. Oak Park, Ill.: Christian Legal Society, Christian Conciliation Service, 1982.

Buzzard, L., and L. Eck. Tell It to the Church: Reconciling out of Court. Elgin, Ill.: David C. Cook Publishing Co., 1982.

Byrne, R., J. Woodward, and J. Lapinski. "Court-Annexed Mandatory Arbitration Practice and Procedure in Illinois." Chicago Bar Association Record (May 1990) 14–20.

Cane, P. An Introduction to Administrative Law. Oxford: Clarendon, 1986.

CLSA. Due Process in Dioceses in the U.S.: 1970–1985: Report on a Task Force Survey. Ed. J. Provost. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1987.

Ehrman, K. "Why Business Lawyers Should Use Mediation." American Bar Association Journal (June 1989) 73–74.

Fleming, R. The Labor Arbitration Process. Urbana, Ill.: University of Illinois Press, 1965.

Goldberg, S., E. Green, and F. Sander. "Litigation, Arbitration or Mediation: A Dialogue." American Bar Association Journal (June 1989) 70–72.

Ghirlanda, G. "De obligationibus et iuribus Christifidelium in communione ecclesiali deque eorum adimpletione et exercitio." P 73 (1984) 373.

Krukowski, J. "Responsibility for Damage Resulting from Illegal Administrative Acts in the Code of Canon Law of 1983." In Le Nouveau Code de Droit Canonique/The New Code of Canon Law: Proceedings of the 5th International Congress of Canon Law, ed. M. Thériault and J. Thorn, 231–242. Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1986.

Lefebvre, C. "De tribunalibus administrativis." P 67 (1978) 583–591.

Maida, A. "Rights in the Church." In A Pastoral Guide to Canon Law, ed. G. Dyer, 40–41. Dublin: Gill and Macmillan, 1977.

Malone, J. "The Canon Law Society and the Church in the United States." CLSAP 50 (1988) 24–32.

Matthews, K. "The Development and Future of the Administrative Tribunal." Stud Can 18 (1984) 3–233.

McManus, F. "Administrative Procedure." J 32 (1972) 417–418.

———. "The Second Vatican Council and the Canon Law." J 22 (1962) 280.

Meszaros, J. "Procedures of Administrative Recourse." J 46 (1986) 133.

Molloy, T. "Administrative Recourse in the Revised Code of Canon Law." CLSAP 44 (1982) 271.

Moodie, M. "The Administrator and the Law." J 46 (1986) 57.

———. The Constitution and Competence of Interdiocesan Administrative Tribunals according to the 1980 Schema of the Code of Canon Law. JCD diss., Rome: Pontifical Gregorian University, 1984.

NCCB. On Due Process. Rev. ed. Washington, D.C.: NCCB, 1972.

Paprocki, T. "Parish Closings and Administrative Recourse to the Apostolic See: Recent Experiences of the Archdiocese of Chicago." J 55 (1995) 875–896.

———. Vindication and Defense of the Rights of the Christian Faithful through Administrative Recourse in the Local Church. JCD diss., Rome: Pontificia Universitas Gregoriana, 1991. Reprint, Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms International, 1993.

Provost, J. "Promoting and Protecting the Rights of Christians: Some Implications for Church Structure." J 46 (1986) 314.

Putnam, L., and Folger, J. "Communication, Conflict, and Dispute Resolution: The Study of Interaction and the Development of Conflict Theory." Communication Research 15 (August 1988) 349.

Ray, L. "Emerging Options in Dispute Resolution." American Bar Association Journal (June 1989) 66–68.

Schwartz, A. "A Primer on Alternative Dispute Resolution." Chicago Bar Association Record (September 1988) 19.

Staffa, D. "Praesupposita recursus ad Alteram Sectionem Signaturae Apostolicae." P 67 (1978) 524–525.

Urrutia, F. "Administrative Power in the Church according to the Code of Canon Law." Stud Can 20 (1986) 261.

The Procedure in the Removal or Transfer of Pastors (cc. 1740–1752)

Parizek, J. "Canonical Changes of Procedures in the Administrative Removal and Transfer of Pastors since Maxima Cura." JCL thesis, Catholic University of America, 1978.

(Formula for making the Profession of Faith in those cases where it is required by law)

I, N., with firm faith believe and profess each and every thing that is contained in the symbol of faith, namely:

I believe in one God, the Father, the Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, of all that is seen and unseen. I believe in one Lord, Jesus Christ, the only Son of God, eternally begotten of the Father, God from God, Light from Light, true God from true God, begotten, not made, one in Being with the Father. Through him all things were made. For us men and for our salvation he came down from heaven: By the power of the Holy Spirit he was born of the Virgin Mary, and became man. For our sake he was crucified under Pontius Pilate; he suffered, died and was buried. On the third day he rose again in fulfillment of the Scriptures; he ascended into heaven and is seated at the right hand of the Father. He will come again in glory to judge the living and the dead, and his kingdom will have no end. I believe in the Holy Spirit, the Lord, the giver of life, who proceeds from the Father and the Son. With the Father and the Son he is worshiped and glorified. He has spoken through the Prophets. I believe in one, holy, catholic and apostolic Church. I acknowledge one baptism for the forgiveness of sins. I look for the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come. Amen.

With firm faith I also believe everything contained in God's word, written or handed down in tradition and proposed by the Church, whether by way of solemn judgment or through the ordinary and universal magisterium, as divinely revealed and calling for faith.

I also firmly accept and hold each and every thing that is proposed definitively by the Church regarding teaching on faith and morals.

Moreover, I adhere with religious submission of will and intellect to the teachings which either the Roman Pontiff or the college of bishops enunciate when they exercise the authentic magisterium, even if they proclaim those teachings by an act that is not definitive.

OATH OF FIDELITY ON ASSUMING AN OFFICE TO BE EXERCISED IN THE NAME OF THE CHURCH

(Formula to be used by the faithful mentioned in canon 833, nn. 5–8)

I, N., in assuming the office of __________, promise that both in my words and in my conduct I shall always preserve communion with the Catholic Church.

I shall carry out with the greatest care and fidelity the duties incumbent on me toward both the universal Church and the particular church in which, according to the provisions of the law, I have been called to exercise my service.

In fulfilling the charge entrusted to me in the name of the Church, I shall hold fast to the deposit of faith in its entirety, I shall faithfully hand it on and explain it, and I shall avoid any teachings opposed to that faith.

I shall follow and foster the common discipline of the whole Church and I shall observe all ecclesiastical laws, especially those which are contained in the Code of Canon Law.

In Christian obedience I shall unite myself with what is declared by the bishops as authentic doctors and teachers of the faith or established by them as those responsible for the governance of the Church; I shall also faithfully assist the diocesan bishops, in order that the apostolic activity exercised in the name and by mandate of the Church may be carried out in the communion of the same Church.

So help me God, and God's holy Gospels, on which I place my hand.

(Changes in paragraphs four and five of the formulary, for use by those faithful indicated in canon 833, n. 8)

I shall foster the common discipline of the whole Church, and I shall insist on the observance of all ecclesiastical laws, especially those which are contained in the Code of Canon Law.

In Christian obedience I shall unite myself with what is declared by the bishops as authentic doctors and teachers of the faith or established by them as those responsible for the governance of the Church; I shall also cooperate fully with the diocesan bishops, in order that, without prejudice to the character and purpose of my own institute, the apostolic activity exercised in the name and by mandate of the Church may be carried out in the communion of the same Church.

So help me God, and God's holy Gospels, on which I place my hand.

CONTRIBUTORS

CHARLES D. BALVO is a priest of the Archdiocese of New York. Since 1987 he has worked in the diplomatic service of the Holy See and is currently assigned to the Apostolic Nunciature in Jordan. He obtained his J.C.L. and J.C.D. degrees respectively from The Catholic University of America and the Gregorian University in Rome.

DIANE L. BARR holds a J.C.D. from Saint Paul University in Ottawa, Ontario, and a J.D. from the University of Idaho, College of Law. She is currently director of the Office of Canonical Affairs for the Diocese of Boise, Idaho.

JOHN P. BEAL is associate professor of canon law at The Catholic University of America. He earned his J.C.L. and J.C.D. from The Catholic University of America. Before coming to Catholic University, he served for eight years as the judicial vicar of the Diocese of Erie, Pennsylvania. He has published articles in various scholarly journals, presented papers at regional and national conventions of canon lawyers, and served as consultor to several committees of the NCCB.

JAMES A. CORIDEN is professor of church law and dean emeritus at the Washington Theological Union. He earned an S.T.L. and a J.C.D. at the Gregorian University and a J.D. at The Catholic University of America. He has taught canon law for more than thirty years and has published several articles on canonical issues. He wrote An Introduction to Canon Law (1990) and The Parish in Catholic Tradition (1996), and served as one of the editors and authors of The Code of Canon Law: A Text and Commentary (1985). He was born in Hammond, Indiana, in 1932, and is a presbyter of the Diocese of Gary.

CRAIG A. COX, a priest of the Archdiocese of Los Angeles, is judicial vicar and chair of the Archdiocesan Theological Commission. He earned a J.C.D. at The Catholic University of America and a D.Min. at St. Mary's Seminary and University in Baltimore. He assists in parish ministry, teaches canon law, and has served actively in the Canon Law Society of America on a number of committees and as a consultor on the Board of Governors.

RICHARD G. CUNNINGHAM is a professor of canon law at St. John's Seminary, Brighton, Massachusetts and Pope John XXIII National Seminary, Weston, Massachusetts. He also serves on the faculty of the Summer Program for the Licentiate in Canon Law at The Catholic University of America. He earned his J.C.L. at The Catholic University of America and his J.C.D. at the Lateran University in Rome. Formerly assistant judicial vicar of the Metropolitan Tribunal of the Archdiocese of Boston, he has taught canon law for the past twenty-six years, published various articles and reviews, and lectured in many dioceses on the revised Code of Canon Law.

BARBARA ANNE CUSACK is chancellor for the Archdiocese of Milwaukee and serves as a judge in second instance for the Metropolitan Tribunal of Milwaukee and the Interdiocesan Tribunal of the Province of Illinois. She also teaches at St. Francis Seminary and serves on the faculty of the Summer Program for the Licentiate in Canon Law at The Catholic University of America. She received a J.C.D. degree from The Catholic University of America.

SHARON A. EUART, R.S.M. is associate general secretary of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops. She holds master's degrees in liberal arts and in administration and supervision from Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore and a J.C.D. from The Catholic University of America. She has taught canon law at The Catholic University of America and has published articles on pastoral planning, religious life, lay pastoral ministry, the role of women in the Church, episcopal conferences, and the canonical mandate for theologians in Catholic colleges and universities. She has served as a member of the board of governors of the Canon Law Society of America.

JOHN D. FARIS, a priest of the Maronite Eparchy of Saint Maron, is assistant secretary general of the Catholic Near East Welfare Association. He received a J.C.O.D. degree from the Pontifical Oriental Institute in Rome. He has published books and articles on Eastern churches and canon law. He is a former president of the Canon Law Society of America.

ROBERT J. GEISINGER, S.J. is professor of canon law at the Pontifical Gregorian University in Rome. He received his J.C.D. at the Pontifical Gregorian University. He is a former associate chancellor of the Archdiocese of Chicago, where he also served the Metropolitan Tribunal at various times as advocate, defender of the bond, and presiding judge. He enjoys parish ministry.

THOMAS J. GREEN is professor of canon law at The Catholic University of America. He received his S.T.L. and J.C.D. degrees from the Gregorian University in Rome. He has published articles in various canonical journals and served the Canon Law Society of America in several capacities. He also served as one of the editors and authors of The Code of Canon Law: A Text and Commentary (1985).

BERTRAM F. GRIFFIN is adjutant judicial vicar of the Metropolitan Tribunal of Portland, Oregon and pastor of St. Michael Parish in Portland. He received his M.Div. from the Sulpician Seminary of the Northwest and his J.C.D. from the Lateran University in Rome. He has taught canon law as adjunct professor at The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C. and Mt. Angel Seminary, Oregon. He is a recipient of the Role of Law Award and has served the Canon Law Society of America in several capacities including that of president.

KEVIN T. HART has served both as judge and defender of the bond in the Tribunal of the Archdiocese of Washington and is the pastor of St. Mary Church, Piscataway, Maryland. He received his J.C.D. degree from the Angelicum University in Rome. He served as a lecturer in the Summer Program for the Licentiate in Canon Law at The Catholic University of America from 1991 to 1998.

SHARON L. HOLLAND, I.H.M. is on the staff of the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life in Rome and teaches canon law at the Pontifical Institute Regina Mundi. She received a J.C.D. from the Gregorian University and has been a contributor to a number of CLSA publications.

JOHN M. HUELS, O.S.M. is professor of canon law at Saint Paul University in Ottawa, Ontario. He received an M.Div. and an M.A. in theology at the Catholic Theological Union in Chicago and a J.C.D. at The Catholic University of America. He has published seven books and numerous articles on canonical and liturgical topics. He is an active member of the Canon Law Society of America, the Canadian Canon Law Society, and the North American Academy of Liturgy.

JOHN G. JOHNSON is currently pastor of St. Peter Parish in Columbus, Ohio and adjutant judicial vicar for the Diocese of Columbus. John G. Johnson was ordained in 1974. He has pursued graduate studies in English literature at Loyola University in Chicago, Illinois and has degrees in theology from the Pontifical College Josephinum and in canon law from The Catholic University of America. He has served as judicial vicar, taught canon law at the Josephinum, and lectured and published on questions of jurisprudence and procedural law.

PETER J. JUGIS is judicial vicar of the Diocese of Charlotte, North Carolina. He received his J.C.L. degree from the Gregorian University and his J.C.D. degree from The Catholic University of America.

ROBERT J. KASLYN, S.J. is adjunct professor of canon law at Weston Jesuit School of Theology, Cambridge, Massachusetts and a judge in the Diocesan Tribunal, Diocese of Worcester, Massachusetts. He also teaches in the Summer Program for the Licentiate in Canon Law at The Catholic University of America. He earned his S.T.L. degree from Regis College, University of Toronto and his J.C.D. from Saint Paul University, Ottawa. His work focuses on the ecclesiology of communio.

ROBERT T. KENNEDY is associate professor of canon law at The Catholic University of America. He holds a J.D. degree from Harvard University and a J.U.D. degree from the Lateran University in Rome. A past president of the Canon Law Society of America, he has served as consultant to several committees of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops and as a member of the Papal Commission for the Development of Administrative Law in the Church.

JOHN E. LYNCH, C.S.P. is professor of the history of canon law and medieval history at The Catholic University of America. He earned an M.S.L. at the Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies and a Ph.D. at the University of Toronto. At The Catholic University of America he has served as chair of both the Department of Canon Law (1974 to 1978) and the Department of History (1983 to 1986) and was vice provost for graduate studies from 1991 to 1998. For the Canon Law Society of America he has served as vice president and board member and on various committees. He received the society's Role of Law Award in 1984. He has published many articles and one book dealing with history and canon law.

ROSE M. McDERMOTT, S.S.J. is associate professor of canon law at The Catholic University of America. She received an M.A. degree from Providence College and a J.C.D. degree from The Catholic University of America. She is a member of the Canon Law Society of America and an assistant editor of Roman Replies and serves as consultor for institutes of consecrated life and their members.

JOHN P. McINTYRE, S.J. is a writer in residence at St. Mary's Hall, Boston College. After receiving his J.C.L. and his J.C.D. at The Catholic University of America, he taught canon law at Saint Paul University in Ottawa, Ontario. He has presented a seminar for the Canon Law Society of America and has published in The Jurist, Studia Canonica, and Periodica. Presently he serves as a judge for the Canadian Appeal Tribunal.

FREDERICK R. McMANUS is professor emeritus of canon law at The Catholic University of America and formerly served as dean of the School of Canon Law and as academic vice president of the university. He received his J.C.D. degree from The Catholic University of America and holds several honorary doctorates as well as the John Courtney Murray award from the Catholic Theological Society, the Berakah award from the North American Academy of Liturgy, and the Michael Mathis award from the University of Notre Dame. After serving in pastoral, canonical, and educational positions in the Archdiocese of Boston, he joined the faculty of The Catholic University of America in 1958, where he also served as editor of The Jurist. He has published widely and served in various liturgical, ecumenical, and canonical positions, including the secretariat of the NCCB Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy, the Liturgical Consilium, and the Code Commission.

MICHAEL R. MOODIE, S.J. received a J.C.D. from the Pontifical Gregorian University in 1984. He has served as judge in the Archdiocesan Tribunals of San Francisco and Los Angeles. From 1984 to 1995 Fr. Moodie taught at Loyola Law School. From 1995 to 1996 he worked in the procurator general's office of the Society of Jesus in Rome. For the past two years he has been on the faculty of St. Ignatius College Preparatory, San Francisco, California.

MICHAEL A. O'REILLY, O.M.I. is judge of the Dublin Regional Marriage Tribunal. He received his J.C.D. degree from the Gregorian University in Rome. He has been a professor in the canon law faculty of Saint Paul University, Ottawa, Ontario, and has served as procurator general at the Holy See for the Oblates. He has published articles in various canonical periodicals.

LADISLAS M. ÖRSY, S.J. is visiting professor of philosophy of law and canon law at Georgetown University Law Center, Washington, D.C. Formerly, he taught at the Gregorian University in Rome, Fordham University in New York, and The Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C. He has graduate degrees in theology (Louvain), canon law (Gregorian), and civil law (Oxford).

ROCH PAGÉ is full professor and dean of the faculty of canon law at Saint Paul University in Ottawa, Ontario. He received a J.C.L. degree from the Gregorian University, a J.C.D. from Saint Paul University, and a Ph.D. from the University of Ottawa. He has published a number of books and has written and collaborated in the writing of numerous articles in various canonical journals.

THOMAS J. PAPROCKI is chancellor of the Archdiocese of Chicago, where he was ordained in 1978. He received an S.T.L. from St. Mary of the Lake Seminary in Mundelein, Illinois. After ordination, he obtained a J.D. at DePaul University College of Law and was admitted to the Illinois Bar in 1981. Working as a parish priest in South Chicago, he co-founded the Chicago Legal Clinic to provide legal services for the poor. He earned a J.C.D. at the Pontifical Gregorian University in Rome in 1991. He has authored several articles in various publications and also teaches as a member of the adjunct faculty at Loyola University School of Law in Chicago.

JAMES H. PROVOST is professor of canon law at The Catholic University of America. He earned M.A. and S.T.B. degrees at the University of Louvain and a J.C.D. degree at the Lateran University in Rome. He is managing editor of The Jurist and has published articles in various canonical journals. He is a former president and executive coordinator of the Canon Law Society of America.

JOHN A. RENKEN is vicar general/moderator of the curia, judicial vicar, and a pastor in the Diocese of Springfield, Illinois. He received his J.C.D. and S.T.D. degrees from the University of Saint Thomas Aquinas in Urbe and an M.A. in civil law at the University of Illinois at Springfield. He has published articles in various canonical journals and lectures widely. He teaches in the Summer Program for the Licentiate in Canon Law at The Catholic University of America. He has served the Canon Law Society of America in various capacities, including as a member of its board of governors, chairperson of the Committee for the New Translation of the Code of Canon Law, and CLSA president, 1999-2000.

LYNDA A. ROBITAILLE works as a judge for the Vancouver Regional Tribunal. She is also an adjunct professor of canon law at Saint Paul University, Ottawa, Ontario. She received her J.C.L. and J.C.D. as well as a specialization in jurisprudence from the Gregorian University in Rome. She has published articles in canonical journals and served as president of the Canadian Canon Law Society from 1997 to 1999.

FRANCIS J. SCHNEIDER is chancellor of the Diocese of Rockville Centre. He earned a J.C.L. from the Gregorian University and a J.C.D. from The Catholic University of America. He is an adjunct professor at the Seminary of the Immaculate Conception, Huntington, New York, and has served in various parish positions. He was born in Rockville Centre, New York in 1956.

ROSEMARY SMITH, S.C., a Sister of Charity of Saint Elizabeth, currently lives and works in Houston, Texas, where she serves as director of women's advocacy for a religious congregation, adjunct professor of canon law at St. Mary's Seminary, and judge in the Diocesan Tribunal. She received her J.C.D. from The Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C. and her M.A. in English literature from Montclair State University in New Jersey. She has held leadership positions in her religious congregation and has published several articles on religious life.

KNUT WALF is professor of canon law at The Catholic University of Nijmegen in the Netherlands. He received a J.C.D. degree and obtained his "Habilitation" in canon law from the University of Munich. From 1972 until 1977 he was a lecturer at the University of Munich. He was visiting professor at the University of Fribourg in Swtizerland, the University of Saarbrücken in Germany, and The Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C. and is the author of numerous canonical publications.

MYRIAM WIJLENS was born in 1962 in Losser, the Netherlands. She earned an S.T.L. in Nijmegen in 1986, a J.C.D. in Ottawa in 1990, and a "Habilitation" in canon law in Münster in 1997. Dr. Wijlens has been teaching in the Department of Canon Law (Institut für Kanonisches Recht) of the Westfälische-Wilhelms-Universität in Münster since 1992. She has served as a visiting professor at the Pontifical Beda College in Rome and on the staff of the Diocesan Tribunal of Münster since 1991. She is a member of several commissions of the Episcopal Conference and of the Conference for Major Superiors in The Netherlands.

LAWRENCE G. WRENN served as the judicial vicar of the Archdiocese of Hartford from 1965 to 1983 and as the judicial vicar of the Court of Appeals of the Province of Hartford from 1983 to 1995. He is presently a judge on the Metropolitan Tribunal of Hartford. He received his J.C.D. from the Lateran University in Rome and has published several articles and books.

NOTE: Boldface numbers indicate canon numbers. Roman numbers indicate page numbers.

1917 Code
1959, revision begun in, 12
1967 synod of bishops and revision of, 503 abrogation by new code, 6
administrative recourse, 1835 alienation of temporal goods of Church, 1291
apostolic life, societies of, 893 application of Mass intentions, 901
associations, 399; 402; 415
auditors (judge instructors), 1428
baptism, See Baptism
books and written publications, canons on, 828; 832 canonical chapters and parishes, 510 canonical mission (missio canonica), 812
cardinals, creation of, 351
college of consultors, 652
Collegial and non-collegial parallel to universitates personarum and universitates rerum, 160
common life, practice of, 280
confirmation, 890; 892; 1077
consecrated life, institutes of, 741-743 consistories, 353
contumacy, decree of, 1592
delicts and penalties
1983 Code, relationship to, 1531; 1532 appeals of and recourses against penalties, effect of, 1353
individual delicts, 1574
interdicts, 1332
membership in forbidden societies, 1374
diocesan judges, 1421
diocesan synods, 610
dispensations, 127
divine worship other than sacraments, 1400
ecclesiastical governance, 129; 130
ecclesiastical offices, 195
ecumenical councils, 336; 337
education and schools, canons addressing, 14
Eucharist, 911; 944; 1097
extinction of juridic persons, 123
groupings of particular churches, 566; 567 inappropriate activities of clerics, negative obligations regarding, 285; 373 incardination of clerics, 269; 329
indulgences, 1172
initiatory sacraments, 842
judicial procedure, 1612-1613; 1754
juridic acts, 124; 177
laity, treatment of, 291 liturgy, canons on celebration of, 999 loss of clerical state, 382
marriage, See Marriage
Mass offerings, 1130
metropolitans, 566; 572
missionary activities, 790; 938
mixed marriages, 1124; 1125; 1343
ordination, 1193
ordination, nullity of, 1799
parishes, 515; 518; 674-675
parochial vicars, 547; 725
particular churches, 502; 504 particular councils, presidents of, 442 patriarchs, 566
penance, 1139-1140; 1167
pious causes, gifts given to Church for, 1299
plenary councils, 439 preaching, content of, 768
prelatures, 394
primates, 566
principles of revision of, 503 private associations not described in, 415 procedural formalities, complaints regarding, 1754 profession of faith or oath of fidelity, 833
quasi-parishes, 516 ratio peccati, use of, 1401
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions, 1791-1792 relationship between pope and bishops, 330 revision of, 11; 12; 558, Appendix I rights and obligations of clerics, 343; 373
Roman Curia, 475
Roman Curia, canons relating to, 12 sacred places and times, 1424
secret marriages, 1130; 1352
separation of spouses, 1790
temporal goods of Church, 1260; 1454
time and timing, 233-234
trial, standing to bring an action at, 1476
universitates personarum and universitates rerum parallel to collegial and non-collegial, 160 vacant metropolitan see, provincial councils not to be convoked during vacancy, 440 Viaticum, ministers of, 911
vicars forane, 729-730
1983 Code
abrogation of previous law, 6
administrative recourse, 1818; 1835
apostolic life, societies of, 893
associations, 399
auditors (judge instructors), 1428
cardinals, 466
college of bishops, pope as head of, 425
conferences of bishops, 22-24; 566
consecrated life, institutes of, 741-743 definitive and nondefinitive teachings, 21-22
delicts and penalties
1917 Code's Book V, relationship to, 1531; 1532 1968 Synod, importance of, 1531 conciliar themes, influence of, 1532
delicts, See Delicts
interdicts, simplification of, 1332
key aspects of, 1532-1533
membership in forbidden societies, 1374
penalties, See Penalties revision process, 1531 sources and influences, 1532
structure of, 1531-1532
diocesan bishop, references to, 559-562, Appendix II
dispensations, 126
divine worship other than sacraments, 1400
ecclesiastical governance, 129
ecclesiastical offices, 196 ecclesiastical provinces and regions, 566 ecumenical canons, 16 ecumenical councils, provisions on, 426 education canons, 14-16 historical overview of developments since promulgation of, 11-26 inappropriate activities of clerics, negative obligations regarding, 285; 373 incardination of clerics, just cause requirement added for, 270
infallibility, 21-22
judicial procedure, 1612
juridic acts, 124; 177
lay people, expanded treatment of, 291 loss of clerical state, 382
marriage, 1102; 1245; 1315; 1327
metropolitans, 566
missionary activities, 784
ordination, nullity of, 1799
particular churches, 503 particular councils, 442; 566
prelatures, 394
profession of faith, canons regarding, 19-22
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions, 1791-1792
retirement of bishops, 401
Roman Curia, reform of, 12-13
Sacrae disciplinae leges, promulgated in, 12
separation of spouses, 1790
several priests in solidum, parishes entrusted to, 517; 534
Vatican Council II, 11-12; 24-26
widowed deacons, 277

A quo
initial day, what constitutes, 203
AAS (Acta Apostolica Sedis), 8
Abandoned children residence and domicile, 101
Abatement
contentious trials, See Trials
Abbacies nullius dioeceseos, See Territorial abbacies Abduction
marriage, for purposes of, 1089
Abortion
baptism of aborted fetuses, 871
confessors, 1398
defined, 1398
feticide, including, 1398
imputability, 1398
ordination, irregularities for reception of, 1041 parties involved in, 1398
penalties for, 1398
Abrogation, 20
administrative recourse, 1739
previous law, 6
Absolution, See Penance
Abuse of authority
aggravation of imputability by, 1326
penalties for, 1389
Abuse of Church or religion
penalties for, 1369
Academic freedom, 218
Academy of Sciences, 489
Accomplices in sin
names of, confessor to refrain from asking, 979 sins against sixth commandment, absolution of accomplice in, 977; 1378 Acolytes
deacons required to receive ministry of, 1035
Eucharist
exposition of reserved sacrament, minister of, 943 extraordinary ministers, as, 910
lay people as, 230
Acquired rights and privileges, 4
Acquisition of goods, See Temporal goods of Church Acquisitive prescription, 230
Act of contrition, 962
Acta Apostolica Sedis (AAS), 8
Actio reconventionalis (counterclaims), 1462; 1495
Ad gentes
diaconate, restoration of, 236
missionary activities, 938 relationship between religious and diocesan bishops in missionary territories, 790 role of pope and bishops in, 782 outreach efforts, importance of, 771
pastoral councils of particular churches, 666
universal Church, instruction in solicitude for, 257
Ad limina visits, 400
papal legates, role of, 364
stages of, 400
Ad pascendum
formation of permanent deacons, 236
Ad quem
final day, what constitutes, 203
Ad suburbicarias dioeceses cardinal presbyters, 350
Ad tuendam fidem
oath of fidelity and profession of faith, 15; 19-22 penalties for doctrinal violations, 1371
Adjutant judicial vicars, 1420
Administration of the Patrimony of the Apostolic See, 489
Administrations, apostolic, See Apostolic administrations Administrative acts, See Singular administrative acts Administrative interpretation, 16
Administrative norms, general, 48 Administrative procedure
appeal or recourse, 1732; 1818-1820
1917 Code, 1835
1983 Code, 1818; 1835
act of administrative power defined for purposes of, 1821-1824 advocate or procurator, right to, 1738; 1837 amendment of original decree, 1739
Apostolic Signatura, 1732
confirmation of original decree, 1739 critique of provisions, 1835-1837
discretionary authority of hierarchic superior, 1739
ecumenical council, no appeal of acts of, 1732 equitable decision and remedies, right to, 1837 hearing, right to, 1837 hierarchic recourse, See Hierarchic recourse impartiality, right to, 1836 invalidity or nullity of original decree, 1739 notice, adequacy of, 1836-1837 obrogation of original decree, 1739 petition to revoke or modify decree, See Petition or libellus rescission or revocation of original decree, 1739
rights, 1818-1819; 1836-1837
Roman Pontiff, no appeal of acts of, 1732
scope of, 1732
subrogation of original decree, 1739 suspension of decree, See Suspension of penalties time period
decision on petition, 1735
hierarchic recourse, 1737
submission of petition, 1734
tribunals, See Administrative tribunals waiver of petition, 1734
dismissal from clerical state, 1317
pastors
removal of, See Removal of pastors transfer of, See Transfer of pastors
penal process, 1718; 1720; 1810 penalties, imposition of, 1314; 1342; 1532
separation of spouses, 1692
temporal goods of Church, administration of, See Temporal goods of Church vicars forane, administrative duties of, 555 Administrative tribunals defined for purposes of administrative recourse, 1824-1826 trials before, 1400
Administrators
diocesan, See Diocesan administrators parochial, 539; 540
Admissibility
appeal stage, introduction of new proof or new grounds for petition at, 1639
incidental cases, 1589
proofs, See Proofs Adopted children
baptism and recording of parental names for, 877 marriage impediments, 1094
relationship or affinity established by adoption, 110
ADR, See Alternative dispute resolution (ADR) Adult baptism, See Baptism
Adult confirmation, 1085
1971 Rite of Confirmation, 1069
non-Catholic ecclesial communities, those baptized into, 883 priests as ministers of confirmation to, 883; 1069
Adultery
separation of spouses, as grounds for, 1152 Advena (temporary residents)
juridic personality, 100
Adverse possession, See Prescription Advisors
lay people functioning as, 228 Advocates and procurators, 1646 administrative recourse, right to counsel in, 1738
age requirements, 1483
appointment of, 1481
contentious trials, See Trials
defined, 1646
delicts and penalties
bribes, accepting, 1488; 1489
expulsion by judge, 1487
reprehensible actions, 1488 respect and obedience, penalties for lack of, 1470
suspension, 1470
diocesan bishop's approval of, 1483 examination of witnesses, presence at, 1559
expulsion by judge, 1487

fees, setting, 1649
mandates, 1484-1486 marriage nullity cases, rights in, 1678
number of, 1482
ordinary mandate, 1484
penal process, 1723 permanent staff of, 1490 presence of petitioner and respondent despite appointment of, 1477
qualifications of, 1483
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions, not allowed in, 1701 removal by mandator, 1486 review of acts prior to publication, 1598
special mandate, 1485
suspension of, 1470
suspension of trial due to change in status of, 1519 Aetatis novae
media communications, 772; 822
Affidavits, 1687-1688
Affinitas non gignit affinitatem, 109
Affinities, See Relationships or affinities African missionaries polygamy, dealing with, 1370
White Fathers (Society of African Missions), 892
Age restrictions
abstinence and fasting, 1252
advocates and procurators at trials, 1483 baptismal sponsors, 874 binding force of ecclesiastical laws and, 11
bishops, 378
cardinals, 354; 465-466
coadjutor and auxiliary bishops, 411 confirmation, reception of, 891; 1067-1068; 1069
deacons, 1031
ecclesiastical offices, loss of, 184; 185; 186 Eucharist, reception of, 913; 1067-1068
imputability
sixteen years, minors at or over, 1324
sixteen years, minors under, 1323
marriage, 1083; 1095
ordination, 1031
papal legates, 367
pastors, 538
penance
confessor obliged to pay proper attention to age of penitent, 978 frequency of confession after reaching age of discretion, 989
priests, 1031
reason, age of, See Reason, age of reason, use of, 11; 97
religious novitiate of religious order, admission to, 642; 643 perpetual profession, 658
secular institutes, admission to, 721
seven years of age, significance of, 11; 97
Aggregates of persons or things juridic personality as, 115
Albanian church
Byzantine rite, observing, 1
Eastern code, under "other churches" category of, 32-33 Alcohol abuse
diminishing imputability, 1324
exempting from imputability, 1323
not mitigating imputability, 1325
Alexander III (Pope)
consensual model of marriage, 1326; 1361 Alexandrian tradition and patriarchate, 1; 32 Alexis Comnenos (Emperor)
marriage celebrations, uniformity of, 1326
Alger of Liège
dispensations, 126
Alienation of goods, 1492
1917 Code, 1291
advice as to, 1292
civilly valid but canonically invalid, 1296 conflict of interest, avoiding, 1298
defined, 1291
divisible assets, 1292
minimum and maximum amounts, 1292; 1293 penalties for unlawful alienation, 1377 permission for, 1291; 1292 price of alienated goods, 1294 reasons required for alienation, 1293 relics, 1190
restrictions on, 1291
sacred objects and images, 1190 transactions similar to alienation, 1295
unlawful alienation of church property, 1377
use of money received in alienation, 1294
Alms
begging for, 1265
canonical chapters and parishes, 510
Altars, 1438
blessings, 1237
bodies buried beneath, 1239
construction of, 1236
dedications, 1237; 1400
defined, 1235
fixed, 1235
loss of dedication or blessing, 1238 movable, 1235
profane use, sacred place relegated to, 1238 relics placed in, 1237 reservation for divine worship, 1239
reverence for, 1239
stone, of, 1236
use of, 1239
Alternative dispute resolution (ADR)
administrative recourse, as form of, 1733 judicial procedure, instead of, 1713-1716 Altitudo
polygamy, 1370
Ambrosian rite of Milan, 1
American Procedural Norms, 1476 collegiate tribunals, 1426
Anchorites
consecrated life, institutes of, 603
Andrea, Johannes, 1387
Anglo-American law
interpretation of law, 16
ownership of temporal goods, 1256
presumption of innocence compared to Roman law, 1321
Anointing of the sick, 998; 1179-1181
administration, licit, 844
age of reason, doubt regarding whether person has reached, 1005 bishops, blessing of oil by, 999 broader use, encouragement of, 1179 carriage of blessed oil for purposes of administering, 1003 circumstances warranting, 1004 conscious ability to ask for sacrament, 1006
danger of death, 1005
death of person to receive, doubt regarding, 1005
defined, 998
diocesan bishops, blessing of oil by, 999 doubt, anointing in cases of, 1005 dying, treatment primarily as sacrament for, 1179; 1180-1181
Eastern code, 37; 998; 1180-1181
Eucharist, See Viaticum formula used for, 1000
historical background, 1179-1180
licit administration, 844
liturgical celebration of, 999-1002; 1182
ministers of, 1003
personal performance of anointing by, 1000
priests, 1003
minor children, 1005
non-Catholic ministers, reception by Catholics of sacraments from, 844
non-Catholics receiving sacraments from Catholic ministers, 844 obstinate perseverance in manifest grave sin, 1007
oil, blessing of, 999
pastors, responsibilities of, 1001
pastor's special duty regarding, 530 persons to be anointed, 1004; 1187
conscious ability to ask for sacrament, 1006 doubt regarding use of reason, dangerous illness, or death, 1005 obstinate perseverance in manifest grave sin, 1007 repeated anointing of same person, 1004 request of, implicit or explicit, 1006 several persons at once, 1002
priests
blessing of oil by, 999
minister of sacrament, as, 1003
pastoral responsibilities to the sick, 1001
repeated anointing of same person, 1004 request of person to receive, implicit or explicit, 1006 responsibilities to the sick regarding, 1001

several persons at once, 1002 single anointing on forehead, 1000 sui juris church members receiving sacraments from Catholic ministers, 844
theology of, 998
Vatican Council II, 1179
Viaticum, See Viaticum
Anti-modernist oath replacement of, 19
Antiochene tradition, 1; 32
Apology of Tertullian judicial procedure described in, 1609-1610
Apostasy, See Heresy, apostasy, and schism
Apostolate
defined, 216; 394
diocesan bishops' responsibility for fostering, 394 religious, See Religious, subhead mission and apostolate right of Christian faithful to exercise, 216
secular institutes, 713
Apostolic administrations, 371
defined, 371
dimissorial letters of ordination, power to issue, 1018
particular churches, as, 368
titular bishops, apostolic administrators as, 376
Apostolic Camera, 489
Apostolic delegates, 363
Apostolic life, societies of, 731; 741-743; 892-893
1917 Code, 893
1983 Code, 893
admission to, 735
Apostolic See and transfers to or from institutes of consecrated life, 744
authority
diocesan bishops, 738 house or community, establishment of, 733 members subject to, 738
moderators, 738
permission to live outside society, 745
common life, practice of, 740
Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life, See Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life consecrated life, transfer to or from an institute of, 684; 730; 744
defined, 731
dimissorial letters of ordination, power to issue, 1019
diocesan bishops, 738
dismissal, See Dismissal from secular institutes or societies of apostolic life
Eastern code, 731; 893
ecclesiastical governance, 734 establishment of communities, 733 evangelical counsels (chastity, poverty, and obedience) assumption of, 731
temporal goods, administration of, 741
formation, 735
France, earliest societies founded in, 892
historical background, 892-893 houses of, 733
incardination of clerics, 736; 738
incorporation, 737
juridic personality, 741; 893
missionary activities, 892-893
moderators, 738; 745
oratories, 733
People of God, members as, 207
permission to live outside society, 745
religious institutes applicable canons regarding, 732
transfer to or from, 684; 730; 744 removal of pastors who are members of, 1742
rights and obligations
clerical obligations, 739
members, 737
secular congregations prior to 1917 Code, referred to as, 893 secular institute, transfer to or from, 684; 730; 744 separation from society definitively incorporated members departure of, 743
dismissal of, 746
members not yet definitively incorporated, dismissal or departure of, 742 permission to live outside society, 745 transfer to other society or an institute of consecrated life, 744
temporal goods, administration of, 741 transfer to or from institute of consecrated life or other society of apostolic life, 744
Apostolic Penitentiary, 486
general confession, instruction issued during World War II on, 961 indulgences, concession and use of, 1173 Apostolic prefectures, 371
college of consultors, 502
defined, 371
dimissorial letters of ordination, power to issue, 1018
particular churches, as, 368
presbyteral councils, 495
vacant sees, 420
Apostolic privilege
prescription, exemption from, 199
Apostolic See, 331
Academy of Sciences, 489
administration of seminaries by, 259 apostolic life, transfers to or from an institute of consecrated life, 744 appeal or recourse against denial of primacy, as, 1372
no legal remedy for, 333; 426; 1629; 1732
review of confirmations by pontiff, 1405 appeal or recourse to tribunals of, See Tribunals, subhead Apostolic See, tribunals of archives, 489
associations
erection of public associations, 312
suppression of public associations, 320
vigilance of Holy See, subject to, 305 authority, See subhead powers of bishop of Roman Church, pope defined as, 331
bishops
nomination and appointment, right of, 377; 378 ordination of, pontifical mandate required for, 1013
papal delegates, as, See Bishops papal delegates or vicars, as theology combating, 184; 566-567
Vatican Council II on, 183-184
viewed as, 428
papal legates, as assistance of bishops as role of, 364
titular bishops, 376 penalties, right to impose, 415 unauthorized consecration of, 1382 blessings, ministers of, 1169
books and written publications, See Media communications burial in churches, 1242
canon law, influence of papal documents on, 24-26 cardinals and college of cardinals, See Cardinals and college of cardinals cathedral chapters' erection, alteration, or suppression reserved to, 504 celibacy, dispensation from, 290
centralizing function, 425-426 clerics' duty of obedience and reverence to, 273
college of bishops, pope as head of, 331; 425 collegiality between pope and bishops, 330; 333; 334; 423-429
conferences of bishops
communication with, 456
establishment, suppression, or alteration of conferences by, 449 special territorial norms, establishment of, 448
consecrated life, institutes of, See Consecrated life, institutes of consecration of pope, 332 death of pope, See subhead vacancy in diocesan administrators, removal of, 430
disobedience, 1372
dispensations, 87; 135-136
divine word, role in ministry of, 756 doctrinal violations, warnings about, 1371

ecclesiastical provinces, establishment, alteration, or suppression of, 431
ecclesiastical regions, provinces united into, 433
ecclesiastical universities and faculties, establishment of, 816; 817
ecumenical councils
role and powers of, 338
vacancy during council, 340
election of pope, See Elections Fabric of St. Peter's Basilica, 489 financial issues
council of cardinals to advise pope of organizational and economic problems, 481 Prefecture for Economic Affairs of the Holy See, 489 full power of, 331
function of, 331
immediacy of papal power, 428
immunity of pontiff, 1404
impeded diocesan sees, notification of, 412; 413; 415 impediment to exercise of office, 335 incapacity of pope, 332
indulgences, 995
infallibility, 749
interim governance between death and election of pope, 335 judge, Roman Pontiff as supreme, 1442 judicial role of, See Forum, subhead extraordinary or singular forum jurisdiction, powers of, 331 legates, See Papal legates liturgy, direction of celebration of, 838
marriage, 1075; 1078
Mass obligations in pious wills, reduction of, 1308
media communications
pastoral vigilance, need for, 823
scriptures, approval of publication of, 825 metropolitans, special powers granted to, 436 missionary activities, role in, 782 moral person, status of, 113
Office for the Liturgical Celebrations of the Supreme Pontiff, 489 ordinary power of, 331
ordination
bishops, pontifical mandate required for ordination of, 1013
dispensation from irregularities and impediments, 1047
organizational problems, council of cardinals to advise pope of, 481 particular churches, functions with regard to, 331 particular council, approval of president of, 441
personal prelatures
erected by See, 294; 394-395 statutes established by See, 295
Peter, continuation of office of, 331
Peter-apostles/pope-bishops analogy, 330; 424
physical attacks on pope, 1370
pious wills, modification of, 1308; 1310
plenary councils, 439
powers of, 331; 426-427 college of bishops, control of, 336; 337 ecclesiastical provinces, establishment, alteration, or suppression of, 431 ecumenical councils, power over, 338
full power, 331
immediacy of papal power, 428 judicial procedure, See Forum, subhead extraordinary or singular forum jurisdictional powers, 331
ordinary power, 331
primacy of, See Primacy of papacy Roman Curia's exercise of vicarious papal power, 478
supreme power, 331
synod of bishops, control over, 343; 344 universal power, 331
vacancy or impediment, exercise of primacy during, 335
Prefecture of the Papal Household, 489 presumed death of spouse, consultation regarding, 1707; 1798 primacy of, See Primacy of papacy privileges
abuse of privilege power, notification of, 84 acquired or granted by, 4 privileges granted by, 4 public associations, erection of, 312 radical sanation of invalid marriage, 1165
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions, See Ratum et non consummatum dissolutions religious, See Religious
rescripts
extension of Apostolic See's rescript by diocesan bishop, 72 loss of clerical state via (laicization), 290 return to clerical state via, 293 reservation of matters to, 135-136 reservation of power to absolution of accomplice, excommunication for, 1378
remission of penalties, 1354
resignation of pope, 332
rite, permission to change, 111; 112
Roman Curia
affairs of Apostolic See conducted through, 360 use of term Apostolic See to include, 361
sacraments, 841; 1018-1019
scriptures, approval of publication of, 825
secular institutes
dimissorial letters of ordination, power to issue, 1019
permission to depart sought from, 727 religious institute or society of apostolic life, transfer to or from, 684; 730; 744 supreme power of, 331
synods of bishops
decision-making powers of, 343
relationship with, 344
teachings of Church and, See Teaching function of Church, subhead pope and bishops temporal goods of Church, See Temporal goods of Church titles of, 331
tribunals of, See Tribunals unifying function, 425-426 universal Church, pastor of, 331 universal power of, 331 vacancy in Apostolic Camera, role of, 489 college of cardinals' powers during, 359
dean of college of cardinals, duties of, 352 ecumenical council, automatic interruption of, 340 interim governance upon, 335 papal legates' office not ceasing on, 367 vacant diocesan sees, notification regarding, 422
Vatican Library, 489
Vicar of Christ, as, 331
vows, dispensation from, 1196
Apostolic Signatura, 18; 486; 1445; 1629; 1673; 1732
Apostolic Tradition
Hippolytus on sacrament of confirmation, 1066 Apostolic vicariates, 371
college of consultors, 502
defined, 371
particular churches, as, 368
presbyteral councils, 495
titular bishops, apostolic vicars as, 376
vacant sees, 420
Apostolic works of public juridic persons, 172-173
Apostolicam actuositatem catholicity of schools, 803 definition of apostolate, 394 right of Christian faithful to exercise apostolate, 216
social justice, obligation of faithful to support, 222 Apostolico sollicitudo synod of bishops, 455 et seq.
Apostolos suos
conferences of bishops, 22-24
Appeal or recourse
administrative recourse, See Administrative procedure Apostolic See, against denial of primacy, as, 1372

no legal remedy for, 333; 426; 1372; 1629; 1732
review of confirmations by pontiff, 1405 Apostolic See, appeal to tribunals of, See Tribunals, subhead Apostolic See, tribunals of
censures, 1357; 1372
concordant or conforming judgments, 1644; 1684
contentious trials, See Trials
dismissal from religious institute, 700
hierarchic recourse, See Hierarchic recourse judicial expenses, 1649
marriage nullity, See Marriage nullity
oral contentious process, 1669
penal process, 1727
penalties, 1353; 1532
petition or libellus, See Petition or libellus
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions grounds for resubmission by legal expert, 1705
rejection of petition, 1699
remission of penalties by confessor contingent on, 1357
removal of pastors, 1745; 1747
res iudicata, 1629; 1642
Roman Curia, administrative acts of, 480 second instance, tribunals of, See Second instance, tribunals of separation of spouses, ordinary contentious process used for, 1693 suspension of penalties during, 1353 third instance, tribunals of, 1444
trials, See Trials tribunals, appellate, See Tribunals Application of Mass, 1130
any person living or dead, for, 901; 1130 collective intentions, 948
computing number of Masses applied for offering, 950 loss of Mass offering, Mass to be applied despite, 949 number of applications per day per priest, 951
one offering for one Mass regardless of size of offering, 948 permission to receive offering for, 945
Aquinas (Saint Thomas Aquinas), 90; 96; 252; 906; 1253; 1299; 1305; 1752
Arbitration, 1713-1716; 1733
Archbishops
defined, 435
metropolitan, See Metropolitans non-residential bishops, title given to, 435
Archives, 489
diocesan, See Diocesan archives
parishes, 491; 535
temporal goods of Church, inventory of, 1283
Archpriests, See Vicars forane
Armenian tradition and patriarchate
Eastern code, 32
rite observed by, 1
Assemblies of hierarchs
Eastern code, 34
Assemblies, plenary
Roman Curia, 480
Assembly of synod of bishops, See Synods of bishops Assembly, right of, See Association and assembly Association and assembly
clerics, See Clerics
freedom of, 215; 278
religious, 672
Associations, 298; 398-401
1917 Code, 399; 402; 415
1983 Code, 399
Apostolic See
erection of public associations, 312
suppression of public associations, 320
vigilance of Holy See, subject to, 305 authority, See subhead competent ecclesiastical authority canonical status of U.S. church-related institutions, 172-176
"Catholic" in name or title, permission to use, 300
chaplains of public associations, 317; 412 clerical associations, 302 clerics' right to form, See Clerics competent ecclesiastical authority preference for associations established by, 298 private associations, vigilance regarding, 323 public associations established only by, 301; 312 trustee of public association, appointment of, 318 vigilance of, subject to, 305; 323 confederations of public associations, 313
confraternities, 402; 405 cooperation between, 311; 328
criteria of ecclesiality to be found in, 400 de facto Catholic institutions, 174-176 deacons' right to form or participate in, 278
defined, 298
Eastern code, 401
ecclesiastical governance of, 780, See also subhead competent ecclesiastical authority extinction of private associations, 325 forbidden institutions, membership in, 1374 fruits expected from, 400 functioning of, 169; 309 juridic personality and juridic status, See Juridic personality lay associations, 327; 418-419; 420-421 cooperation with other associations, 328 formation of members, 329
juridic status, 420-421
purpose of, 327; 418-419 meetings, holding, 309
membership, 406
admission methods, 307; 316
conditions of, 306
dismissal from, 306; 308; 316 lay associations, formation of members of, 329
public associations, 316
valid reception into association, 306
moderators, 309
private associations, 324
public associations, 317; 318; 412 name or title, choice of, 300; 304
nature of, 401
norms common to, 401
norms, establishing, 309
officers
chaplains of public associations, 317; 412
designation of, 309
moderators, See subhead moderators
private associations, 324
public associations, moderators of, 317; 318; 412 spiritual advisors of private associations, 324 organization, 169; 309; 405 pious unions, 402; 405
private associations, 299; 415 1917 Code, not described in, 415 administration of goods of, 325
autonomy of, 321
canonical status of, 174 competent ecclesiastical authority, vigilance of, 323 extinction of, 325
freedom of activity enjoyed by, 416 functioning, 416
juridic personality, See Juridic personality moderator, designation of, 324
nature of, 415
obligations and rights, 310 officers, designation of, 324 recognition by Church, 299 spiritual advisors, 324
statutes, 304; 321
temporal goods, See subhead temporal goods
public associations, 409
Apostolic See
erection by, 312
suppression by, 320
chaplains, 317; 412; 568
competent ecclesiastical authority, established only by, 301; 312
confederations of, 313
conference of bishops
erected by, 312
suppressed by, 320
defined, 301
diocesan bishop, erection by or consent to, 312 dismissal of members, 316 initiative, right of, 315

juridic personality, 313; 420-421
membership, 316
mission, reception of, 313
moderators, 317; 318; 412
nature of, 409
recognized status, 420-421
statutes, 304; 314
suppression of, 320
temporal goods, administration of, 319
trustees, designation of, 318
purpose of, 298
recognized status, 420-421
acquiring or not acquiring, 400 criteria for acquiring, 298
private associations, 299
public associations, 420-421
rights and obligations
private associations, 310
right to form, 215; 278
spiritual advisors of private associations, 324
statutes, 304; 309
private associations, 321
public associations, 314
suppression of public associations, 320
temporal goods
private associations
administration of goods of, 325 extinction of, allocation of goods on, 325 local ordinary, subject to authority of, 325 private nature of goods of, 310 public associations, administration of goods of, 319
third orders, 303; 311; 567
trustee of public association, appointment of, 318
types of, 402
U.S. church-related institutions, canonical status of, 172-176 vigilance, subject to, 305
Attachment of clerics to ecclesiastical entity, See Incardination of clerics Attacks, physical, See Physical violence Attempted delicts
imputability, 1328; 1330
Auditors (judge instructors)
tribunals, 1428
witnesses, questioning, 1561
Augustine of Hippo (Saint), 1235-1236; 1237; 1360; 1361 Authority, See also Ecclesiastical governance abuse of authority
aggravation of imputability by, 1326
penalties for, 1389
administrative recourse, discretionary authority of hierarchic superior in granting, 1739 apostolic life, societies of, See Apostolic life, societies of Apostolic See, See Apostolic See, subhead powers of associations, See Associations, subhead competent ecclesiastical authority bishops' powers, source of, 566-567 cardinals and college of cardinals, 359 civil authority, See Civil authority college of bishops, 336
conferences of bishops, 455
consecrated life, institutes of, See Consecrated life, institutes of contumacy or contempt for church authority, censures addressing, 1312
dimissorial letters of ordination, power to issue, 1015; 1018; 1019
diocesan administrators, 427
diocesan bishops, 381; 391; 518
disobedience, 1372
dispensations, granting, 87-89 doctrinal violations in face of, 1371
ecclesiastical offices, See Ecclesiastical offices ecclesiastical provinces, 432
ecclesiastical universities and faculties approval of statutes and plans, 816
conferral of academic degrees with canonical effects, 817
establishment of institutions, 816
excardination, 272
free exercise of ecclesiastical function, interference with, 1375 full communion, submission to ecclesiastical governance as bond indicating, 205 general decrees, power to issue, 29; 30 general executory decrees, power to issue, 31
governance, power of, See Ecclesiastical governance hatred of, 1373
impediments to marriage, authority to establish, 1075 incardination, 272
indulgences, granting, 995
infra-universal, See Local ordinaries juridic personality, authority to create, 114 legislative authority to establish penal law, 1315 liturgical books, preparation and publication of, 838
liturgy, direction of celebration of, 838
marriage, See Marriage
membership in forbidden societies, 1374
metropolitans, 436
negligent exercise of, 1389
obedience as obligation of Christian faithful, 212 opposition to, 1373
ordination, See Ordination parishes, erection, suppression, or alteration of, 515
particular churches
establishment of, 373
pastoral councils of, 513
particular councils
authority of, 445
authority over, 441
pastoral councils of particular churches, 513
patriarchs, 438
penal law, establishment of, 1315
penalties
Church's authority, delicts against, 1370-1377
establishment and determination of penalties, 1315
power to remit penalties, See Remission of penalties, subhead power to remit physical violence against figures of, 1370 plenary councils, authority to convoke, 439
primates, 438
private chapels, permissions concerning, 1226; 1228 privileges, granting acquired or granted by Apostolic See, 4 cessation of privilege based on judgment of competent authority, 83 expiration of authority granting privilege, 81 provincial councils, authority to convoke, 440 radical sanation of invalid marriage, competency to grant, 1165
religious, See Religious remission of penalties, See Remission of penalties, subhead power to remit resignation, acceptance of, 189 rights, regulation of exercise of, 223
Roman Curia's exercise of vicarious papal power, 478
sacramentals, 1167
sacraments, validity of, 841
sacred places, exercised in, 1213 sacred times, establishment or suppression of, 1244; 1246
schools, See Schools
secular institutes, See Secular institutes synod of bishops, 343
universities and colleges, Catholic, See Universities and colleges, Catholic usurpation of, 1381
vicars forane, 555
vicars general and episcopal vicars, 479
vows, dispensation from, 1196
Automatic penalties, See Latae sententiae
Auxiliary bishops, See Coadjutor and auxiliary bishops

Balasuriya, Tissa, 1364
Baltimore
particular council held at, influence of, 577-578 Banns, publication of, 1067
Baptism, 849; 1033-1034
1917 Code, 1033

name restrictions, 855 persons baptized, abandonment of use of recipient or subject as term for, 1051-1052 private versus solemn baptism differentiated in, 869 sponsors (godparents), 872 water used in baptism, 854
aborted fetuses, 871 adopted children, recording of parental names for, 877
adults
catechetical age, children who have reached, 850; 852 confirmation and participation in Eucharist to immediately follow baptism of, 866 danger of death, adults in, 865; 866
defined, 852
diocesan bishop's administration of baptism of persons fourteen or older, 863 Easter vigil, celebration of baptism during, 856 formation for, 851; 865
prerequisites for, 865 proof of baptism on oath of baptized adult, 876 reason, those who have attained use of, 852
rites used for, 850
sponsors (godparents), 872 any person with right intentions as minister of baptism in case of necessity, 861; 871 binding force of ecclesiastical laws on baptized Catholics, 11 bishops as ministers of, 861 catechesis in preparation for, 851; 865
children
abandoned or foundling children, 870
adopted children, recording of parental names for, 877
catechetical age, children who have reached, 850; 852 infants, See subhead infants more than one child, baptismal rites for, 850
rites used for, 850
unmarried mothers, recording of parental names for infants born to, 877 conditional conferral due to doubt as to reception or validity of reception, 845; 869 conferences of bishops, use of immersion or pouring according to prescripts of, 854
confirmation adults, confirmation and participation in Eucharist to immediately follow baptism of, 866 initiatory sacraments of baptism and Eucharist, interrelationship with, 1066; 1068-1069 notification of pastor of place of baptism regarding confirmation, 895
prerequisite for confirmation, 889 danger of death, See subhead necessity or danger of death deacons as ministers of, 861
defined, 849
diocesan bishop's administration of baptism to persons fourteen or older, 863
Easter
blessing of font at time of pastors' duties regarding, 530
preference for, 853
celebration of baptism during Easter vigil, 856
Eastern code, 36; 1033-1034 ecclesiological function of, 204; 243 effect of, 849
fonts
Easter blessing of
pastors' duties regarding, 530
water used in baptisms, preference for, 853
other churches or oratories in parish with fonts, 858 parish churches required to have, 858
form of celebration of, 850-860; 1037
formation for, 851; 865
full communion
conferred by baptism, 96
what constitutes, 205
godparents, See subhead sponsors (godparents) hospitals, celebrated in, 860 immersion, conferral of baptism by, 854
indulgences, 996
infants
abandoned or foundling children, 870
aborted fetuses, 871
adopted children, recording of parental names for, 877 birth, baptism to follow shortly on, 867 danger of death, infants in, 867; 868
defined, 852
formation for parents and sponsors of, 851 funerals in church for non-baptized infants, 1183
historical background to time of baptizing, 867 parents of, See subhead parents of infants proof of baptism of, 876
sponsors (godparents), 872 time for celebration of, 867
unmarried mothers, recording of parental names for infants born to, 877 initiation, sacrament of, 842; 851 initiatory sacraments of confirmation and Eucharist, interrelationship with, 1066; 1068-1069
juridic personality
conferral by baptism, 96; 849
standing to bring an action at trial, 1476
marriage and, See Marriage marriage nullity of baptized persons, 1671 matter and form essential to, 850
ministers of, 861; 1049
any person with right intentions in case of necessity, 861 bishops as, 861
catechists as, 861
deacons as, 861
designated persons as, 861
diocesan bishop's administration of baptism to persons fourteen or older, 863 extraordinary ministers, 861
ordinary ministers, 861
priests as, 861
recording baptism, 877
territorial restrictions, 862
name given at, 855
necessity of baptism for salvation, 849 necessity or danger of death, 850
adults, 865; 866
hospitals, celebration in, 860
infants, 867; 868
ministers of baptism, 861 private homes, celebration in, 860 water used for baptism, 853
non-Catholic ecclesial communities, members of sponsors (godparents), as, 874
status of baptism of, 869
nonrepeatability, 845
ordination
notice of ordination to pastor of place of, 1054 required for ordination, 1024
parents of infants
adopted children, recording of parental names for, 877 Catholic faith, ability of parents to bring up children in, 868 consent of, 868
danger of death of infant, baptism against will of parents in cases of, 868 formation of, 851
parish of parents preferred as place for baptism of infant, 857 prerequisites for licit baptism of infant, 868 sponsors not allowed to be parent of baptismal candidate, 874 unmarried mothers, recording of parental names for infants born to, 877
parish churches font, every parish church to have, 858 home parish of adult candidate or parents of infant candidate, celebration of baptism preferably in, 857
other churches or oratories in parish with fonts, 858
pastor's special duty regarding, 530
People of God, defining, 204; 243 personalities conferred by, 849

persons baptized, 1051-1052 1917 Code's use of recipient or subject as term for, abandonment of, 1051-1052 universal capacity for baptism, 864 place of celebration of alternative churches or fitting places, use of, 859 church or oratory as proper place for, 857 hospitals, 860
other churches or oratories in parish with fonts, 858 parish church of adult candidate or parents of infant candidate preferred for, 857 private houses, 860 pouring of water, conferral of baptism by, 854 priests as ministers of, 861 private homes, celebrated in, 860
proof of
adopted children, recording of parental names for, 877 conditional conferral due to lack of, 845; 869 oath of baptized adult, 876
register, recording baptism in, 877
unmarried mothers, recording of parental names for infants born to, 877 witness to baptism, 875; 876
rectors of non-parochial churches, 558
register, recording baptism in, 877
registers, parochial, 535
religious novitiate, admission to, 645
rite, choice of, 111
rites used in, 850
second baptism, profession of evangelical counsels as type of, 743 seminaries, admission to, 241 separation of baptized spouses, 1692; 1790 sponsors (godparents), 872; 1060
1917 Code, 872
adults, to, 872
age restrictions, 874
confirmation, same sponsor preferred for, 893
formation of, 851
godparents and sponsors distinguished, 872 infants, to, 872
non-Catholic members of ecclesial communities, 874 number of sponsors, 873 parents of baptismal candidate, not allowed to be, 874 penalties, not bound by, 874 presence at ceremony, 872 proper designation of, 874
qualifications of, 872; 874
responsibilities of, 872 sex, one sponsor of each, 873 witness to baptism, as, 875
Sunday, celebration of baptism on, 856 territorial restrictions on ordinary ministers of, 862
theology of, 849
time of celebration of, 856
trial, standing to bring an action at, 1476 universal capacity for, 864
validity of, 849; 850
water used in blessing of, 852
cleanliness of, 853
Easter vigil, water blessed during, 853 flowing water, use of, 853 immersion in, 854
necessity, use of unblessed water in cases of, 853 pouring, conferral of baptism by, 854
"true" or natural water, use of, 849 Basel and Constance, ecumenical councils of
college of bishops, 336
power of pope not dominant at, 337
Baum, William (Cardinal), 259 Beeswax
reserved Eucharist, lamp burned before, 940
Begging for alms, 1265
Beliefs, essential diocesan bishops' duty to protect unity and integrity of faith, 750
penalty for failure to hold required beliefs, 20; 1371
requirements regarding, 750
Bellarmine, Robert, 1247
Belorussian church
Eastern code, under "other churches" category of, 32-33
Benedict XIV (Pope), 1099; 1343; 1352; 1370; 1426 Benefices
historical background to, 195
reform of, 1272
Benefits, ecclesiastical, See Ecclesiastical benefits Bernardin, Joseph (Cardinal), 212; 1390
Bérulle, Pierre de
Oratory of Jesus and Mary Immaculate, founder of, 892 Bevilacqua, Anthony (Cardinal), 212; 962 Beyer, Jean, 274
Bible
divorce, Jesus' explicit condemnation of, 1235 ecclesial judgments in, 1609 Jacob and Leah, marriage of, 1097
marriage, 1234; 1237; 1363 publication of scriptures, 825 temporal goods, ownership of, 129; 1451 translations of, 825
Bible discussion groups preaching, as type of, 770
Bination
Eucharist celebrated twice in one day by single priest, 905 Binding force
canon law, 8; 11
ecumenical councils, decrees of, 341
Bishop of Roman Church, See also Apostolic See pope defined as, 331
Bishops, 511-512
age restrictions, 378
anointing of the sick, blessing of oil used for, 999
Apostolic See, See Apostolic See
appointment of, 377
archbishops, See Archbishops
authority of, 749; 753
auxiliary bishops, See Coadjutor and auxiliary bishops baptismal ministers, as, 861
blessings, ministers of, 1169
books and written publications, See Media communications cardinals exempt from power of ecclesiastical governance of, 357 cardinals required to be ordained as, 466 catechesis
norms, issuance of, 775
pastoral responsibilities of, 773
chrism/oils used in administration of sacraments to be obtained from, 847 civil authority, lack of rights of appointment over, 377
clerics' duty of obedience and reverence to, 273
coadjutor bishops, See Coadjutor and auxiliary bishops college of, See College of bishops collegiality between pope and, 330; 333; 334; 423-429 conferences of, See Conferences of bishops confessors by law, as, 967
confirmation, ministers of, See Confirmation Congregation for, See Congregation for Bishops consecration procedures, 379
procedures for, 377
significance of, 375
taking possession of diocese, 382 time requirements regarding, 379
unauthorized, 1382
consecrations, ministers of, 1169
continence and celibacy of religious and clerics, right to establish norms and pass judgment regarding, 277
dedications, ministers of, 1169
diocesan bishops, See Diocesan bishops divine institution of, 375
divine word, role in ministry of, 756
Eastern code, 34; 511
ecclesiastical regions, meetings of bishops within, 434
ecclesiastical universities and faculties establishment of higher institutions of the religious sciences, 821 students, responsibility to supply, 819

education
responsibilities regarding, 794
schools, responsibility to establish, 802 equality of, 375
Eucharist, ordinary ministers of, 910 excardination, letter of, 267
exorcism, specific permission to perform, 1172
functions of, 375
in partibus infidelium, 376 infallibility in ecumenical council, 749 institution of, 375
liturgical ministers, as, 835
media communications, See Media communications
metropolitans, See Metropolitans
missionary activities, See Missionary activities needs, desires, and opinions of faithful, obligation to pay attention to, 212 nomination of Apostolic See, role of, 377 civil authority, lack of rights of, 377 conference of bishops, role of, 377
papal legates, role of, 364
terna of candidates, 377
oath of fidelity, required to take, 380 oils/chrism used in administration of sacraments to be obtained from, 847
ordination as, 1009
co-consecrators, 1014 pontifical mandate required for, 1013 powers conveyed by, 566-567
significance of, 375
ordination by consecrated bishop as proper minister of ordination, 1012 dimissorial letters, issuing, See Ordination diocesan bishops, See Diocesan bishops documents, responsibilities regarding, 1052
Eastern rite, subjects of, 1015 eligibility of bishops to receive dimissorial letters, 1021
extra-territorial ordination, permission required for, 1017 intention of ordaining bishop, 1024
jurisdiction, 1017
personal ordination of own subjects preferred, 1015 priests or deacons, unauthorized ordination of, 1383 specific doubts about candidate, 1052
territorial restrictions, 1017
papal delegates or vicars
theology combating, 184; 566-567
Vatican Council II on, 183-184
viewed as, 428
papal legates
assistance of bishops as role of, 364 titular bishops, as, 376 participation of faithful in councils and synods of, 212 penalties imposed on, 414
Peter-apostles/pope-bishops analogy, 330; 424
physical attacks on, 1370
powers, source of, 566-567
preaching, See Preaching primacy of papacy, episcopal assistance in exercise of, 334
private chapels, 1227
profession of faith, required to take, 380; 833 public associations, erection of or consent to, 312 qualifications required of, 378 religious as, See Religious, subhead episcopate, raised to sacraments, 841
schools, See Schools
seminaries, See Seminaries
suffragans, See Suffragan bishops synod of, See Synods of bishops teachings of Church and, See Teaching function of Church, subhead pope and bishops terna of candidates, 377
titular bishops, 376
conferences of bishops, as members of, 450
particular councils, participants in, 443
types of, 376
universal Church, right and duty to be solicitous toward, 567 universities and colleges, Catholic, See Universities and colleges, Catholic vocations, duty to foster, 233
Blasphemy
penalties for, 1369
Blessed individuals veneration of, 1187
Blessings
altars, 1237
baptism, water used in, 852 Book of Blessings, 1167; 1169; 1400 certificate of, 1208
defined, 1170
graves, 1240
lay persons ministering, 1403
ministers of, 1169; 1207
oils used in administration of sacraments, 847
oratories, 1229
private chapels, 1229
recipients of, 1170
revision of rites for, 1167; 1400
sacred objects, 1171
sacred places, 1207
altars, 1237
certificate of blessing, 1208 loss of blessing, 1212 oratories and private chapels, 1229
proof of, 1209
solemn blessings outside church, pastors' duties regarding, 530
Blood relationships, 108
Boff, Leonardo, 1364 Bologna, School of
marriage, 1236; 1361
Bonnet, M., 128; 138
Books and written publications, 977 canon law code, 830
catechisms, 827
censors, 830
churches, books available in, 827
collections of acts and decrees, 828
Eastern code, 977
history of attempts to regulate, 977 Index of prohibited books, 977
indulgences, 997
liturgical books, See Liturgical books original text versus translations or new editions, 825; 829 pastoral vigilance regarding writings, 823 permission to publish approval versus permission, 824 censors, from, 830
prayer books, 826
pre-publication review and judgment approval versus permission to publish, 824
catechisms, 827
censors, 830
churches, books available in, 827
collections of acts and decrees, 828 definition of book for purposes of, 824
liturgical books, 826
local ordinaries competent to make evaluation, 824
original text versus translations or new editions, 825; 829
pastoral vigilance, need for, 823
permission to publish, See subhead permission to publish prayer books, 826
religious, writings by, 832
scriptures, 825
textbooks, 827
theological matters, books dealing in, 827 voluntary submission for, 824; 827
religious, writings by, 832
Roman Curia's oversight of, 481
scriptures, 825
Secretariat of State's oversight of, 481
textbooks, 827
theological matters, books dealing in, 827
translations
Bible, 825
liturgical books, 838
unfriendly journals, prohibition on writing for, 831 Borromeo, Charles (Saint) vicars forane inspired by, 729-730 Bribery
church officials, 1386
Broad interpretation of law, 18

Bulgarian church
Byzantine rite, observing, 1
Eastern code, under "other churches" category of, 32-33
Burden of proof, 1526
judicial confessions, effect of, 1536
who bears, 1526
Burials
altars, beneath, 1239
blessing of graves, 1240
cemeteries, See Cemeteries church buildings, in, 1239; 1242
funerals, See Funerals place of, 1180
Business or trade, clerics engaging in, See Commercial activities, clerics engaging in Byelorussian church, 1
Byzantine rite, 1; 1326

Cagliari, bishop of Gregory I's letter on confirmation to, 1067 Called to be Catholic: Church in a Time of Peril, 212
Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops (CCCB) legislation enacted by, 603-607
Candles
reserved Eucharist, lamp burned before, 940
Canon law, 47-48
1917 Code, See 1917 Code
1983 Code, See 1983 Code applicability of code of, 1 autonomy of law, theory holding, 4 binding force of, 8; 11 change and development of, reasons for, 2-3 Church as both generator and receiver of, 7-9 civil law and, 55-56 canonization of civil law, 22; 1290
contract law, limited canonization of, 1290 identification with, 4 viewed as identical to civil law, 4 communio indicating unique nature of law in Church, 245 constitutive laws, 86
curial developments, influence of, 25-26 custom, See Custom
defined, 6-7
diocesan curias to observe Book VII, Procedures, 472 disqualifying laws, 10; 14; 15
divine law
affinity with, 2-3
embraced by canon law, 55-56 doubtful revocation of law, 21 doubts of law, 14
ecclesiastical laws, 7-22; 55-56 effective date, 8
equitable principles, 18
error regarding, 15
establishment of law, 7 Eucharist as source of, 5-6 general decrees, relationship to, 29 general executory decrees, relationship to, 33 historical overview, 1983-1999, 11-26 ignorance, 15
instructions, 34; 97
interpretation, See Interpretation invalidating laws, 10; 14; 15
Italian School theory, 4 ius and lex, 47-48
juridical method, viewed as theological discipline with, 4-5 jurisprudence, 18
Latin church, code applicable only to, 1
legal positivism, 4
Munich School, 4-5 mutual exclusivity of Church of charity and law, theory holding, 3-4
nature of, 2
Navarra School theory, 4 ordinance of faith, viewed as, 5 origin of, 2
papal documents, influence of, 24-26 particular laws, 12 place of law in the Church, 1-3 pragmatic positivism, 4 previous law, effect of new code on, 6 promulgation, 8
purpose of, 2
reason for existence of, 209
relationship of code to other juridic realities, 48; 49 removal from ecclesiastical offices by law itself, 194
retroactivity, 9
revocation of law, 20 role of law in the Church, 1-3
Roman Curia
juridical principles regarding, 477-479
reform of, 12-13
Roman law, historical reasons for basis in, 8-9 stages of, 8
theology
relationship to, 1-9 viewed as branch of, 4-5 theories of, 3-6 universal laws, 12; 20
vacatio, 8; 31
values, linked to, 3; 8 Vatican Council II, effect of, 11-12 vicars general and episcopal vicars, qualifications of, 478 Canon lawyers
ecclesial vocation of, 9 Canonical mission (missio canonica)
universities and colleges, Catholic, 812
Canonization process
Congregation for the Causes of Saints, 483-484; 1403
tribunals, 1403
Canons, chapters of cathedral chapters, See Cathedral chapters collegiate chapters, See Collegiate chapters parishes and, 510
qualifications of canons, 509 religious houses of canons regular or monks, autonomy of, 613 Canons penitentiary, 508; 968
Cantors
lay people as, 230
Capability of laws, 10
Captivity or persecution separation of non-baptized partners due to, 1149
Cardinals and college of cardinals, 349; 464-466, See also specific cardinals
1983 Code, 466
age restrictions, 354; 465-466
Apostolic See
cooperation with, 356
council of cardinals to advise pope of organizational and economic problems, 481 creation by, 351
dean's right to ordain pope, 355
papal legates, significance of role as, 358; 465 senior cardinal deacon's right to announce name of newly elected pontiff, 355 special envoys of, 358
special relationship with, 355 vacancy of, powers during, 359 assistant dean, 352; 355
authority, 359
bishops, required to be ordained as, 351; 466 burial in churches, 1242
confessors, 967
consistories, 353
council to advise pope of organizational and economic problems, 481 creation of cardinals, 351 curial offices, resignation from, 354 dean, 350; 352; 355
defined, 349
diaconal order, 350; 355 diocesan bishop, exempt from power of ecclesiastical governance of, 357
Eastern code, 350; 464
election of pope
age restrictions, 354
number that may vote in, 350
responsibility for, 349
episcopal order of, 350
extraordinary consistories, 353
historical background, 464-466
juridic person, college of cardinals as, 352
jurisdiction, 357
metropolitans, right of senior cardinal deacon to bestow pallium on, 355
name, origins of, 464-465 Nicholas II (Pope), decree of, 465 number of cardinals, 350 orders or ranks of, 350

ordinary consistories, 353
papal legates, significance of role as, 358; 465
powers of, 359
presbyteral order, 350 priority and precedence among, 350
profession of faith, persons obliged to make, 833 public announcement of name of new cardinal, 351
purpose of, 349
reforms of, 465-466
reforms of and changes in, 465-466 reservation in pectore, 351
resignation, 354
rise in importance of, 465
Roman Curia
council to advise pope of organizational and economic problems, 481 link to, 466
meetings of cardinal dicastery heads, 480-481 Rome, requirement that dean and assistant dean reside in, 352
senior cardinal deacon, 355
special envoys of Apostolic See, 358 titular church, relationship to, 350; 357; 464 transfers between orders, 350
Carrez-Maratray, Martine
1996 World Congress, comments on associates of secular institutes at, 725
Carthage
particular council held at, influence of, 577 Catechesi tradendae
bishops, 774
pastoral responsibility, catechesis as, 773 religious, catechesis by, 778
Catechesis, 933
all faithful, responsibility of, 774
baptism, preparation for, 851; 865
bishops
norms, issuance of, 775
pastoral responsibilities of, 773
books dealing with, publication of, 827 confirmation, for, 889; 890
defined, 933
development of faith via, 777
diocesan bishops, 386
disabled persons, 777
documents issued on, 933
Eastern code, 36; 777; 933
education of catechists, 780 Eucharist, in preparation for receiving, 913; 914
formation of clerics, 256
marriage, preparation for, 1063; 1125 means of, 779
means of ministry of divine word, as, 761 minors, needs of, 777
missionary activities, See Missionary activities
mixed marriages, 1125
norms, issuance of, 775 parental responsibility, as, 774 parish ministry, responsibilities of, 773; 776 pastoral responsibility, as, 773
penance, See Penance priesthood, responsibilities of, 773; 776
purpose of, 777
religious orders, by, 778
sacramental instruction, 777; 843
Catechesis in Our Time, 933 Catechism of the Catholic Church, 775; 933 lay people, treatment of, 291-292 Catechisms
publication of, 827
Catechists
continuing education, 780
education, 780
missionaries, as, 785
Catechumenate
funerals for catechumens, 1183
missionary activities involving instruction of, 788
People of God, as part of, 206
Cathars
marriage, 1237
Cathedral chapters
Apostolic See, erection, alteration, or suppression reserved to, 504 appointment of canons to, 509
canons penitentiary, 508; 968
college of consultors' functions entrusted to, 502 constitution, statutes defining, 506
defined, 503
diocesan bishops
appointment of canons, 509
functions entrusted by, duty to fulfill, 503 pastoral norms, establishing, 510
statutes, approval of, 505
diocesan synods, members of, 463
function of, 503
officers, 507
organization of, 507
parishes and, 510
president, 507
qualifications of canons, 509
statutes, 505; 506
Cathedrals
archives, 491
metropolitans required to notify diocesan bishop regarding performance of sacred functions in, 436
ordinations normally celebrated in, 1011
Catholic Apostolate, Society of the, 893 Catholic Church, See Church Catholic education, See Education
"Catholic" in name or title, permission to use apostolate, right to exercise, 216
associations, 300
schools, 803
universities and colleges, Catholic, 804
Catholic universities and colleges, See Universities and colleges, Catholic Catholics
ecclesiastical laws binding on, 11 Causas matrimoniales auditors, 1428
collegiate tribunals, 1426
lay participation in ecclesiastical governance, 274
lay people as diocesan judges, 1421
CCCB (Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops) legislation enacted by, 603-607
CDF, See Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (CDF)
Celebret
Eucharist, permission to celebrate, 903
Celestine (Pope)
missionary activities, comments on, 782
Celiac disease
use of gluten-free eucharistic wafers for persons with, 924
Celibacy, See Continence and celibacy of religious and clerics
Cemeteries, 1240; 1440 behavior and discipline in, 1243 burials preferably in, 1180
civil authority, 1243
family cemeteries, 1241
juridic personality, 1241
parishes, 1241
particular laws, 1243
place of, 1240
private cemeteries, 1241
religious, 1241
Censors
books and written publications, 830
Censures, 1312; 1530; 1549
Apostolic Penitentiary's power to absolve censures reserved to pope, 486 appeal or recourse against, 1357; 1372
confessor's power to remit, 1357 contumacy or contempt for church authority, addressing, 1312 duration, indefiniteness of, 1549
excommunication, See Excommunication expiatory penalties, distinguished from, 1549
focus of, 1549
interdict, See Interdict marriage of persons under, 1071
Mass offerings, trafficking in, 1385 procedures for imposing, 1347
purpose of, 1312
reform and reintegration of offender with church community, addressing, 1312; 1549
remission, basis for, 1312
remission of penalties, 1357; 1358
suspension, See Suspension suspension of censure, 1335 warning required for, 1347
withdrawal from contumacy, effect of, 1347; 1358

Ceremonial of Bishops (Caeremoniale episcoporum), 389; 396
burial in churches, 1242
desecration of sacred places, prayer following, 1211
pallium, use of, 437
revision of, 1400; 1424
Certificates
blessing or dedication, 1208
marriage, valid and licit celebration of, 1066
Cessation, See specific topics Chaldean tradition and patriarchate
Eastern code, 32
rite observed by, 1
Chancellors and vice-chancellors, 635
appointment of, 482
assistant, vice-chancellor appointed as, 482
diocesan archives
access to, 487
responsibility for, 482 diocesan curias, signature on acts of, 473 notary status by virtue of office, 482
purpose of, 482
removal from office, 484
secretary of curia by virtue of office, 482 Chapels
oratories, See Oratories
private chapels, See Private chapels
Chaplains, 564
appointment of, 565
colleges and universities, 568
defined, 564
faculties of, 566
institutions or groups, serving, 564 latae sententiae, ability to absolve, 566 lay religious institutes, 567 migrants, exiles, refugees, nomads, sailors, and others deprived of ordinary pastoral care, 568 military, 518; 569
non-parochial churches, 570
pastor of local church, relationship to, 571 pastoral care provided by, 566
public associations, 317; 412; 501
removal of, 572
students, 568
types of, 564
universities and colleges, 568
Chapters
canons, See Canons, chapters of cathedral chapters, See Cathedral chapters collegiate chapters, See Collegiate chapters consecrated life, institutes of, See Consecrated life, institutes of, subhead superiors and chapters of
religious, See Religious Charitable donations
temporal goods of Church, 1285
Chastity
clerics, See Continence and celibacy of religious and clerics
consecrated life, institutes of, 599
marriage impediment, perpetual vows of chastity as, 1088 religious, See Continence and celibacy of religious and clerics Children, See Minor children Chrism
confirmation
anointing with chrism as part of, 880 consecration of chrism used in, 880 sacraments, used in administration of, 847
Chrismation
confirmation in Eastern Churches, 36-37; 1070 Christfideles, See People of God Christfideles laici associations, criteria of ecclesiality to be found in, 400
lay people, role of, 291 marriage, importance and role of, 226
Christian faithful, See People of God Christus Dominus
adapting preaching to congregation, 769
bishops, 375
bishops, lack of rights of appointment over, 377
catechesis as pastoral responsibility, 773
coadjutor and auxiliary bishops, 403-411; 417; 540
conferences of bishops, 22-24; 447-459; 590 content of preaching, 768
diocesan bishops
apostolate, responsibility for fostering, 394
pastoral role of, 383
powers of, 381
presbyters, relationship with, 384
retirement of, 401
sanctifiers, as, 387
teaching function of, 386 vocations, role in fostering, 385
dioceses, 369
dispensations, 127; 128
ecclesiastical regions, provinces united into, 433 ecumenical councils, participants at, 339 ecumenical involvement, 383 exempt dioceses now to be attached to ecclesiastical provinces, 431 exercise of papal primacy, 333
formation of clerics, 232
groupings of particular churches, 567 immediacy of powers of pope, 428 liturgical books, preparation and publication of, 838 means for carrying out preaching ministry, 762 obedience and reverence to pope and local ordinary, cleric's duty of, 273
outreach efforts, 771
outreach efforts, importance of, 771
parishes, 515
particular churches, 503
pastoral councils of particular churches, 666; 667
pastors, 515; 523
personal prelatures not part of hierarchical constitution, 394 preaching role of presbyters and deacons, 757
religious, catechesis by, 778
Roman Curia, reform of, 12 schools, authority over, 806
synod of bishops, 342; 455
universal Church, instruction in solicitude for, 257
vacant diocesan sees, 417
vicars general and episcopal vicars, coadjutor and auxiliary bishops appointed as, 406
Church
change and development in, 1-2 civil authorities, agreements with, 3 generator and receiver of canon law and theology, as, 7-9 growth and sanctification of, obligation of Christian faithful to promote, 210 human community, as, 1; 7
moral person, status of, 113
mutual exclusivity of Church of charity and law, theory holding, 3-4 mysterion, as, 1-2
nature of, See Ecclesiology religious mission and apostolate in name of, 675 role and place of canon law in, 1-3 sacramentum, as, 1-2
Church buildings, 1214; 1428-1429 baptisms performed in, 857; 858 burials in, 1239; 1242
cathedrals
archives, 491
metropolitans required to notify diocesan bishop regarding performance of sacred functions in, 436
ordinations normally celebrated in, 1011
chapels
oratories, See Oratories private, See Private chapels collections in, 1266
consent to build, 1215
dedications, 1217; 1400
defined, 1214
diocesan bishop's consent to build, 1215 expert advice on, 1216 free entry for divine worship, 1220 liturgical norms for, 1216
oratories, See Oratories penance performed in, 964
private chapels, See Private chapels profane use, relegation of church to, 1221
religious consent to build church, 1215 right of clerical institutes to have church, 611 right to divine worship in, 1219

shrines, See Shrines
title, 1218
Churches sui iuris, 1
applicability of code to Latin church only, 1 communio ecclesiarum, as, 209
concelebration of Eucharist, 902 diocesan bishop's relationship with faithful of rites other than his own, 383 divorce in, 1237-1238; 1360
Eastern code, 32
Eucharist, participation in, 923 marriage between members of, 1057; 1127
ordination, 1015; 1021
religious novitiate, admission of members of Eastern churches to, 645 right of Christian faithful to follow particular spiritual life or rite of worship, 214 sacraments received from Catholic ministers by members of, 844 Church-State relationships agreements between Church and civil authority, 3 alternative dispute resolution/arbitration in ecclesiastical context, recognition of, 1716 Church's right to judge church matters, civil recognition of, 1401
delicts and penalties, 1529-1530
free exercise of ecclesiastical function, interference with, 1375
seal of confession, violation of, 1388
Cicero, 1752
Citations, 1507
absent respondents, checking on reception of citation by, 1592 beginning of trial, marking, 1517 guardian or curator, communication to, 1508 illegitimate communication, result of, 1511 immediate and simultaneous communication to parties, 1508 legitimate communication, result of, 1512
marriage nullity, 1507 methods of communicating, 1509
oral contentious process, 1659; 1661
petition or libellus attached to, 1508 public postal services, use of, 1509 refusal to accept, 1510
Civil authority agreements between Church and, 3 alienations of temporal goods of Church that are civilly valid but canonically invalid, 1296
alternative dispute resolution/arbitration in ecclesiastical context, recognition of, 1716
bishops, lack of rights of appointment over, 377
canon law and, See Canon law
cemeteries, 1243
Church's right to judge church matters, recognition of, 1401
clerics
exemptions from exercising public functions foreign to clerical state, required to exercise, 289
military service, 289
public or political office, prohibited from, 285; 287
deference to, 1803
ecclesiastical penalties, infliction of, 1529-1530
marriage, See Marriage parental right to educational assistance, 793
prescription
civil terms for, 230
reception by Church as to civil legislation, 197 proofs through public civil documents, 1540 religious prohibited from assuming public or political office, 672 right of lay faithful to all civil liberties, 227 schools, laws regulating, 799 separation of spouses in civil forum, 1692 temporal goods of Church and, See Temporal goods of Church Vatican City State, Code of Civil Procedure for, 1754
Clandestine marriages, 1237; 1326; 1327; 1352
Clandestine ordinations Czechoslovakia, in, 1074
Clement of Alexandria, 1235
Clement V
oral contentious process introduced by, 1754 Cleri sanctitati metropolitans required to obtain pallium in order to exercise powers, 437 Clerical institutes of consecrated life, See Consecrated life, institutes of
defined, 588
neither clerical or lay nature of state of consecrated life, 588
religious, See Religious secular institutes, See Secular institutes
Clerics
acceptance of assignments by, 274
association and assembly celibacy, associations likely to endanger, 277
deacons, 278
freedom of, 278
purposes and activities inimical to clerical state, associations with, 278
restrictions on, 277; 278 right to form associations, 278 associations of, 302
attachment to ecclesiastical entity, See Incardination of clerics auditors (judge instructors) of tribunals, 1428
bishops, See Bishops business or trade, engaging in, See Commercial activities, clerics engaging in celibacy, See Continence and celibacy of religious and clerics
civil authority
exemptions from exercising public functions foreign to clerical state, required to exercise, 289
military service, 289
public or political office, prohibited from, 285; 287
commercial activities, prohibited, 1392
common life, practice of, 280
Congregation for the Clergy, 278; 485
consecrated life, institutes of, See Consecrated life, institutes of continence and celibacy, See Continence and celibacy of religious and clerics continuing education, 279; 555
cooperation required between, 275
deacons, See Deacons
defenders of the bond, 1435
diocesan judges, as, 1421
dismissal from clerical state, See Dismissal from clerical state distribution of, 271; 294
dress requirements, 284
Eastern code, 34
ecclesiastical offices, monopoly on, 195; 274
education
continuing, 279
formative, See Formation
seminaries, See Seminaries elderly clerics, support for, 281 enrollment of, See Incardination of clerics Eucharist, duty to celebrate, 276
excardination
confessional faculty, loss of, 975
procedures for excardination, 267; 269; 270
religious institute, departure from, 693
financial obligations, permission required to undertake, 285 financial support of, 281 foreign activities, 285 formation of, See Formation
free exercise of ecclesiastical function, interference with, 1375
freedom from coercion in choosing state in life, 219 holy life, duty to lead, 276
illegitimate exercise of ministry, 1384
illness of, 281 inappropriate activities, negative obligations regarding, 285-289; 373 incapacity of, 281
incardination of, See Incardination of clerics juridical versus sacramental status, 382 labor organizations, membership in, 278; 285; 287 laicization (rescript of Apostolic See for grave cause), 290, See also subhead loss of clerical state lay people, requirement to acknowledge and promote mission of, 275 liturgy of the hours, required to observe, 276; 1174 loss of clerical state, See Loss of clerical state Marian devotions, duty to engage in, 276 married clerics and religious, See Married clerics and religious masons, membership in, 278

mature vocations, 233
military service, 289
minor children, association with, 277 minor orders, elimination of, 230 obedience and reverence, duty of, 273 ordination, illicit, 1383
pastoral councils, members of, 512 pastoral duties, required to fulfill, 276
peace and harmony, as fosterers of, 287 penance, obligation to approach, 276
People of God, as, 207
personal prelatures, See Personal prelatures physical attacks by, 1370
physical attacks on, 1370
political organizations, membership in, 285; 287 prayer, duty to engage in, 276 preaching obligations, 276; 762
priests, See Priesthood prohibited offices and administrations, 285; 286; 1042 promissory notes, permission required to sign, 285
promoters of justice, 1435
public or political office, 285; 287
rectors, See Rectors
religious
cooperation with, 680
novitiate, admission to, 644; 645 secular clerics separated from institute, 693
remuneration, 281
reputation of, See Reputation rescript of Apostolic See loss of clerical state via petition for (laicization), 290
return to clerical state via, 293
residence requirements, See Residence of clerics retirement of, 281
retreats, obligation to make time for, 276 return to clerical state, 293
rights and obligations, See Rights and obligations of Christian faithful Rotary Clubs, membership in, 278 sacramentals, ministers of, 1168 sexual abuse of minors by, See Sexual abuse of minors simplicity of life, requirement to pursue, 282
special obligations, violations of, 1392-1396
spiritual life, duty to nurture, 276 surety, permission required to give, 285 temporal goods, proper use of, 282 trade or business, engaging in, See Commercial activities, clerics engaging in unattached, problems related to, 265 unions, membership in, 278; 285; 287 vacations, right to, 282
vanity, duty to refrain from, 282 vicars forane, duties of, 555
witnesses and witness testimony, 1548; 1550
women, association with, 277
Worker Priests, 285
Cloistered orders, 606; 667
Closed case exceptions, 1462
Coadjutor and auxiliary bishops, 376; 539-540
age restrictions, 411
appointment of, 377; 403
assistance rendered to diocesan bishop, 408 conferences of bishops, See Conferences of bishops consultation by and collaboration with diocesan bishop, 407
defined, 539-540
diocesan synods, membership in, 463 documents as basis for, 540 episcopal vicar, appointment as, 406 impeded diocesan sees, 413
particular councils, participants in, 443 residence obligations, 410
resignation, 411
retirement, 411
rights and obligations diocesan bishop not to entrust habitually to another, 408 outline of, 405
residence, 410
special faculties, auxiliary bishops with or without, 403; 539 succession, right of, 403
taking possession of office, 404
vacant diocesan sees notification of Apostolic See, 422
successors of or temporary substitutes for diocesan bishop, as, 403; 409; 416; 419 validity of actions until certain notice of vacancy is received, 417 vicar general, appointment as, 406
Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches, See Eastern code Coercion
complaint of nullity against the sentence based on, 1620 confessions resulting from, 1538
exemptions from imputability due to, 1323
juridic acts, deficient, 125
marital consent due to, 1103
novitiate of religious order, impediment to admission to, 643 remission of penalties by, 1360 state in life, freedom from coercion in choosing, 219 teaching function of Church, prohibition on use in exercising, 748 Cohabitation
marriage, not constituting, 1057
Collaboration of the Non-ordained, 17-19; 292
Collaboration or conspiracy
imputability, determining, 1329
Collateral consanguinity
marriage and, 1078; 1091
Collections
churches and oratories, in, 1266
College of bishops, 336
apostolic origins of, 336
authority, 336
consent of pope, collegial actions requiring, 336; 337
defined, 336
ecclesiastical provinces and, 431
ecumenical councils
exercise of power in, 337 expression of collegiality between pope and bishops, as, 426 participants at, 339 exercise of power by, 337
full power, 336
membership in, 336; 375
Peter-apostles/pope-bishops analogy, 330; 424 pope as head of, 331; 336; 425
powers of, 336; 426-427
retired diocesan bishops as members of, 402
supreme power, 336
College of cardinals, See Cardinals and college of cardinals
College of consultors, 502
1917 Code, 652
apostolic vicariates and prefectures, 502 cathedral chapter, functions entrusted to, 502
diocesan administrators consent of college, acts requiring, 427
election of, 421
diocesan bishops, role of, 502
Eastern code, 652
eparchal consultors, college of, 652
finance officer, appointment of, 494
functions of, 502
impeded diocesan sees, choice of interim leaders for, 413
membership in, 502
president, 502
size of, 502
vacant diocesan sees consent required by diocesan administrator for certain acts, 427 election of diocesan administrator, 421 interim government, role in, 419
notification of Apostolic See, 422
Colleges and universities
Catholic universities, See Universities and colleges, Catholic
chaplains, 568
ecclesiastical universities and faculties, See Ecclesiastical universities and faculties

Collegiality
juridic acts, collegial, 127; 180 pope and bishops, between, 330; 333; 334; 423-429 universitates personarum and universitates rerum parallel to collegial and non-collegial, 160 Collegiate chapters
appointment of canons to, 509
canons penitentiary, 508; 968
constitution, statutes defining, 506
defined, 503
diocesan bishops
appointment of canons, 509
pastoral norms, establishing, 510
statutes, approval of, 505
function of, 503
officers, 507
organization of, 507
parishes and, 510
president, 507
qualifications of canons, 509
statutes, 505; 506
Collegiate churches diocesan archival records, 491 Collegiate tribunals, 1425
auditors (judge instructors), 1428
deferral of decisions by, 1609 judicial vicars, 1425; 1426
non-unanimous decisions by, 1609
ponens or relators, 1429; 1610 pronouncement and sentencing norms, 1609; 1610
relators or ponens, 1429; 1610
reservation of cases to, 1425
retraction of initial conclusions, 1609 Commentators
lay people as, 230
Commercial activities, clerics engaging in deacons' exemption from prohibition on, 288 penalties for clerics or religious engaged in prescribed trade or business, 1392
religious, 672; 1392
restrictions on, 286
Commissio
missionary activities, initiation of, 786; 790 Commission for the Authentic Interpretation of the Code, 830; 1098
Commissions
Roman Curia, 488
Common discipline
diocesan bishops' role in fostering, 392
Common good rights, exercise of, 223
Common Ground project, 212
Common law (Anglo-American)
interpretation of law, 16
ownership of temporal goods, 1256
presumption of innocence compared to Roman law, 1321 Common-law marriage
invalidity of, 1057
secret marriages and, 1130; 1352
Common life, practice of
apostolic life, societies of, 740
clerics' obligations regarding, 280
consecrated life, institutes of, 602
deacons, 280
defined, 280
marriage, 1151
parochial vicars, 550
religious, 607
secular institutes, 714
Communicatio in sacris indiscriminate sacramental sharing, 1365 sharing in sacred things, concept of, 844; 1024 Communications media, See Media communications Communio, See Communion (communio) Communio et progressio
media communications, 772; 822
opinions, right of Christian faithful to express, 212 Communion (communio)
baptism
conferral of full communion by, 96
what constitutes full communion, 205
communio ecclesiarum, 209
communio fidelium, 209
communio hierarchia, 209
consecrated life, exemption from governance of local ordinary of institutes of, 591
ecclesiastical offices
communion with Church required for, 149 removal from ecclesiastical offices by law, 194 ecclesiastical provinces as expression of, 431 ecclesiology based on, 204; 242-245 evangelization and, 211
excommunication, See Excommunication full communion, See Full communion obedience as obligation of Christian faithful, 212 organic reality requiring legal form, 333
particular churches, 501 pope and bishops, relationship between, 333 religious' mission and apostolate carried out in, 675
removal from ecclesiastical offices by law, 194 removal of pastors due to detriment or disturbance to, 1741 rights and obligations of Christian faithful based on ecclesiology of communio, 254-258 controls on exercise of, 223 obligation to maintain communion with Church, 209
religious, 828
secular institutes, 716
temporal goods of Church, 1451
Communion of life, See Common life, practice of Communion (sacramental), See Eucharist Communionis notio college of bishops, authority of, 336 Communities for which parishes cannot be erected
chaplains, 568
pastoral care of, 516
Community
custom, introducing, 25
delicts
offenses primarily against community, 1529-1530 reaction to, 1530-1531 Commutation
oaths, 1203
sacred times, obligations regarding, 1245
vows, 1197
Company of Priests of S. Sulpice, 892 Compensation, See Remuneration
Competency or incompetency
associations, See Associations, subhead competent ecclesiastical authority ecclesiastical offices, competent authority to confer, 148 executive power, exercise of, 139
forum
extraordinary or singular forum, incompetency of lower courts over cases involving, 1406 ordinary forum requirements, 1407
marriage nullity, See Marriage nullity radical sanation of invalid marriage, competency to grant, 1165 trials, judges, or tribunals, See Trials, subhead competency or incompetency Complaint of nullity against the sentence, 1726 amendment of sentence, 1626 appeal, linked to, 1625 defenders of the bond lodging, 1626 eligibility to lodge, 1626 irremediable nullity, 1620; 1621 judges dealing with, 1624
oral contentious process, use of, 1627 parties lodging, 1626 petition or libellus, impropriety of, 1620 promoters of justice lodging, 1626 remediable nullity, 1622; 1623 retraction of sentence, 1626 right of defense, denial of, 1620 Roman Rota, sentences issued by, 1624
sanation or healing of null acts, 1619 Compromise
elections to ecclesiastical offices via, 174; 175 Computation of time, 200; 233-234 continuous time, 201
day, what constitutes, 202
final day (ad quem), 203
initial day (a quo), 203
month, what constitutes, 202

useful time, 201
year, what constitutes, 202
Concelebration of Eucharist, 902
Mass offerings, 951
Conciliation
alternative dispute resolution, as means of, 1733
Concordant or conforming judgments marriage nullity cases, 1684
new and grave proofs required for appeal or recourse following, 1644
ordination, nullity of, 1712
Concubinage
penalties for, 1395
secret marriages of couples long living in, 1130; 1352 Concupiscence
marriage as antidote to, 1236; 1238
Confederations of public associations, 313
Conferences of bishops, 22-24; 588-590
1983 Code, 566
abstinence and fast from meat or other foods, setting, 1251; 1253 alms, norms on begging for, 1265 alternative dispute resolution, norms for, 1714; 1733
Apostolic See
communication with, 456
establishment, suppression, or alteration of conferences by, 449
special territorial norms, establishment of, 448
authority of, 455
baptism by immersion or pouring according to prescripts of, 854 begging for alms, norms on, 1265
coadjutor and auxiliary bishops
members, as, 450
voting rights, 454
communications
Apostolic See, with, 456 general secretariat's responsibilities regarding, 458 decrees issued by, 455
defined, 447
diocesan bishops
members, as, 450
powers not usurped by conference, 455
voting rights, 454
diocesan synod declarations and decrees, communication of, 467
dispensations from laws issued by, 88
documents used as source of canons regarding, 589 Eastern hierarchs as members of, 450
ecclesiastical regions, provinces united into, 433 establishment, suppression, or alteration of, 449 general secretariat, 452; 458
historical background, 588-589
holy days of obligation, authority over, 1246 infallibility of bishops in ecumenical council, 749 investigation of freedom to marry, norms for, 1067
juridic personality, 449
juridic powers, 455
legislative powers, 455 liturgical books, authority to prepare and publish, 838
marriage, See Marriage
meetings, 453
membership, 376; 450
mixed marriages, 1126
national scope of, 448 nomination of bishops, 377
officers of, 452
papal legates, role of, 364; 450
parishes, particular law on, 717, Appendix 1 particular councils, authority over, 441 permanent council, responsibilities of, 457
personal prelatures, 294
plenary councils, 439
plenary sessions, 453
notification of Apostolic See at end of, 453 permanent council's responsibilities regarding, 457
powers of, 455
president of, 452
public associations
erection of, 312
suppression of, 320
purpose of, 447
relations between conferences, 459
sacramental sharing, norms for, 844
sacraments, 841
seminaries, diocesan or interdiocesan, 237
statutes of, 451
temporal goods of Church, See Temporal goods of Church
territorial restrictions, 448
theological status of, 589 titular bishops as members of, 450
universities and colleges
Catholic universities, episcopal conference's right to establish and govern, 809
ecclesiastical universities and faculties, establishment of, 821
U.S. bishops' conference
Economic Justice for All: Catholic Social Teaching and the U.S. Economy, 231 Fulfilled in Your Hearing: The Homily in the Sunday Assembly, 767 media communications, participation in, 831
Vatican Council II, formal status given by, 589 voting rights in, 454 Conferences of major superiors
religious institutes, 708; 709; 876
Confession, See Penance
Confessionals
confessions normally to be heard in, 964
Confessions, 1535
burden of proof, effect on, 1536
defined, 1535
error, force, or fear, effect of, 1538
extrajudicial, 1537
public good, cases regarding, 1536
self-incrimination protections in penal process, 1728
Confessors, 1151-1153
abortion, remission of penalty for, 1398
absolution
conditions for granting, 980
sins against sixth commandment, absolution of accomplice in, 977 solicitation of sexual sins in confession, false denunciators of, 982
accomplices
names of, confessor to refrain from asking, 979
sins against sixth commandment, absolution of accomplice in, 977
Apostolic Penitentiary, See Apostolic Penitentiary bishops as confessors by faculty of law, 967
canons penitentiary, 508; 968
cardinals, 967
cessation of faculty or capacity required for, 975 concession, duration of, 972
excardination, 975
office, loss of, 975
residence and domicile, loss of, 975
revocation, by, 974 concession, faculty from, 969 duration of concession, 972
externs, 971
writing, concession required to be in, 973 confidentiality requirements, 983; 984
danger of death
absolution of accomplice in sins against sixth commandment, 977 penitents in, 976; 986
externs, concessions to, 971 faculty or capacity required for, 966; 1152-1153
bishops, 967
cessation of, See subhead cessation of faculty or capacity required for concession, faculty from, See subhead concession, faculty from danger of death, penitents in, 976 grant from competent superior, 967 law, faculty from, 966; 967
office, faculty from, 968
pastors, 968
revocation of, 974
freedom of penitent to choose confessor, 991 grant from competent superior, faculty by, 967 healer or physician, confessor as, 978 interpreter's knowledge of sins confessed, use of, 983; 984 judge, confessor as, 978

knowledge of sins confessed, use of, 983; 984
local ordinaries, 968
magisterium and norms, adherence to, 978 novices and seminary students, 985
office, faculty from, 968 pastors by faculty from office, 968 penances imposed by, 981
penitent's age and condition, proper attention paid to, 979 priesthood, ministry of penance restricted to, 965; 1151 prudence and discretion required of, 978 qualifications and requirements for, 970; 978; 983; 984 questions asked by, 979
religious, 630; 968; 969
remission of penalties, 1357; 1398
residence of clerics
cessation of confessional faculty on loss of domicile, 975
externs, 971
grant of faculty from competent superior, 967 restrictions on penitents of, 985
revocation of faculty or capacity required for, 974
rights and obligations
absolution, giving, 980 availability of sacrament, 986
danger of death, penitents in, 986
freedom of penitent to choose confessor, 991
seal of confession, violation of, 1388 seminary students and novices, 985
solicitation of sexual sins in confession, 1387
expiatory penalties for, 1387 false denunciators of, 982; 1387; 1390
territorial restrictions
grant of competent superior, confessors by faculty from, 967 law, confessors by faculty from, 967 office, confessors by faculty from, 968 revocation of faculty, 974 translator's knowledge of sins confessed, use of, 983; 984
witnesses and witness testimony, 1548; 1550
Confidentiality and secrecy
confessors, 983; 984
diocesan archives, secret, 489; 490; 1719 diocesan curia, 471
judges, 1455
penal preliminary investigations, acts of, 1719
penance, 983; 984
testimony, exemption or disqualification from, 1548; 1550
tribunals, 1455
Confirmation, 879; 1065-1070
1917 Code, 890; 892; 1077
1971 Rite of Confirmation, 883; 891; 1068-1070
adults, 1085
1971 Rite of Confirmation, 1069
non-Catholic ecclesial communities, those baptized into, 883 priests as ministers of confirmation to, 883; 1069 age at which confirmation is received, 891; 1067-1068; 1069
baptism
adults, confirmation and participation in Eucharist to immediately follow baptism of, 866
initiatory sacraments of baptism and Eucharist, interrelationship with, 1066; 1068-1069 notification of pastor of place of baptism regarding confirmation, 895
prerequisite for confirmation, 889
bishops as ministers of 1971 Rite of Confirmation, 1069
chrism, consecration of, 880 diocesan bishops, See subhead diocesan bishops equivalents of diocesan bishops as special ministers by law, 883
historical background, 1066-1067 ordinary minister, as, 882 original minister, as, 882 catechesis for, 889; 890
children
age at which confirmation is received, 891; 1067-1068; 1069 confirmands, as, 889 parents and pastors, responsibilities of, 890
chrism
anointing with, 880
consecration of, 880 church, celebration in, 881 concession of faculty to a priest, 884 conditional conferral due to doubt as to reception or validity of reception, 845
confirmands
adults, See subhead adults baptism as prerequisite for, 889 capacity for confirmation, 889
children, 889
rights and obligations, 889; 890
danger of death
sacrament given to those in danger of, 530
valid ministers in cases of, 883 deacons as ministers of confirmation in absence of priest, historically, 1066 definition and understanding of, 879; 1067
diocesan bishops
concession of faculty to a priest, 884
duty to see to proper conferral of, 884; 885
equivalents of diocesan bishops as special ministers by law, 883 licit confirmation of those not of his diocese, 886 permission to confirm outside of diocesan territory, 886 personal administration of sacrament by, 884 religious houses within diocesan boundaries, 888
Eastern code, 1067; 1070
Eucharist
change in order of reception in relationship to, 1068 close link to, 1068-1069
form of celebration of, 1073
matter and form essential to, 880
place of celebration, 881
formation for, 889; 890
full communion, admission of Catholic or non-Catholic baptized adults into, 883 hands, laying on of, 880 Hippolytus, Apostolic Tradition, 1066
historical background, 1066-1070; 1077
initiation, sacrament of, 842; 1066; 1068-1069 juridic effect, 894
laying on of hands, 880
marriage, received prior to, 1065
Mass, celebration during, 881 matter and form essential to, 880
ministers of, 1077
bishops, See subhead bishops as ministers of concession of faculty to a priest, 884
danger of death, 883
deacons in absence of priest, historically, 1066 diocesan bishops, equivalents of, 883 exempt places, 888
historical background, 1066-1067; 1077 law, special ministers by, 883 ordinary minister, bishop as, 882 priests, See subhead priests as ministers of
rights and obligations, 885-888 special ministers, 882; 883
territorial restrictions on
diocesan bishops, 886
exempt places, 888
priests, 887
non-Catholic ecclesial communities, those baptized into, 883
nonrepeatability, 845
notification
pastor of place of baptism, 895 pastor of place of confirmation, 895
order of reception of sacraments, 1068; 1070
ordination, required for, 1033
ordinary minister, bishop as, 882

parents or parental surrogates
responsibilities of, 890
sponsors, as, 893
pastors, responsibilities of, 530; 890
place of celebration of, 881
priests as ministers of adult catechumens, 883; 1069 concession of faculty to a priest, 884
danger of death, 883
historical background, 1066-1067; 1077
rights and obligations, 885; 887 special minister, as, 882
territorial restrictions on, 887
proofs, 894; 895; 1092
registration of, 895
religious houses within diocesan boundaries, 888
religious novitiate, admission to, 645
rights and obligations
confirmands, 889; 890
ministers of confirmation, 885-888
parents and pastors, responsibilities of, 890
sponsors, 892
"soldier of Christ," viewed as creating, 879; 1067
sponsors, 892; 1089
baptismal sponsor preferred for, 893 parents as, 893
requirements and qualifications, 893
rights and obligations of, 892 territorial restrictions on ministers of
diocesan bishops, 886
exempt places, 888
priests with faculty of administering confirmation, 887
theology of, 879; 880; 1066-1067
Vatican Council II, 1068
Conflict of interest
leasing or alienation of church property, 1298 Conforming or concordant judgments marriage nullity cases, 1684
new and grave proofs required for appeal or recourse following, 1644
ordination, nullity of, 1712
Conforti, Guido Maria (Bishop), 791
Confraternities, See Associations Congregation for Bishops, 484
ad limina visits, 400
ecclesiastical provinces, establishment, alteration, or suppression of, 431
particular churches, 368; 373
retired diocesan bishops, norms for, 402
Congregation for Catholic Education, 485-486; 785; 796; 812; 962 formation of clerics (Ratio fundamentalis institutionis sacerdotalis), 232-238 Congregation for the Causes of Saints, 483-484
tribunals, 1403
Congregation for the Clergy, 485 associations, clerical membership in, 278
Congregation for Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments
celibacy, dispensation from, 291 rescript of Apostolic See (laicization), competence for, 290 Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (CDF), 482-483 associations, clerical membership in, 278
biblical translations, 825
celibacy, dispensation from, 291
confessions, recording or publication of, 1388
impotence, 1084
"in favor of the faith" marriage dissolutions, 1372-1373 membership in forbidden societies, request to add canon on, 1374
mixed marriages, 1343
profession of faith, new formula for, 750 religious, publications by, 832
Congregation for the Eastern Churches, 26; 483 Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples, 484; 783; 790 mission territories, 371; 373
particular churches, 368; 373
Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life, 485
missionary activities, 783 reporting requirements on separation from religious institutes, 704
statutes, approval of, 587
Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith founding of, 892
Congregation of Jesus and Mary (Eudists), 892 Congregation of the Mission, 892
Congregations, 481-486, See also individual Congregations
Conjugicide
marriage impediment, as, 1090 Consanguinity
marriage and, 1078; 1091
relationships or affinities due to, 108 Conscience, freedom of coercion or force, prohibition on use of, 748 penal law not addressing, 1312; 1529 Conscience, marriage of, 1352
Consecrated life, institutes of, 573; 741-743 accretions unrelated to original aim and purpose, 578 admission to institute, qualifications for, 597 aggregation of, 580
anchorites, 603
Apostolic See
authority over all institutes, 590 changes in institutes affecting things approved by, 583 Diocesan right institutions, consultation prior to erection of, 579 documents of Apostolic See regarding institute, promotion of knowledge and observance of, 592 exemption of institute from governance of local ordinary, 591
individual members' duty of obedience to Supreme Pontiff, 590 mergers, unions, federations, and confederations, 582
new forms, recognition and approval of, 605
pontifical right institutes, See subhead pontifical right institutes
religious, See Religious reporting to, 592
suppression of institutes, 584 assumption of consecrated life, 573
authority
aggregation of institutes, 580
Apostolic See's authority over all institutes, 590 autonomy of life and governance, 586 communion (communio), effect of conciliar teaching of, 591
diocesan right institutes, 579,594; 595
division of institute into parts, 581 evangelical counsels, authority of Church to interpret and direct practice of, 576 individual members' duty of obedience to Supreme Pontiff, 590
mergers, unions, federations, and confederations, 582
new forms, recognition and approval of, 605
pontifical right institutes, 593
religious, See Religious statutes, approval or change of, 587 superiors and chapters, See subhead superiors and chapters of autonomy of life and governance, 586
changes in institutes affecting things approved by Apostolic See, 583 chapters of, See subhead superiors and chapters of chastity, 599, See also subhead evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty, and obedience clerical institutes
defined, 588
neither clerical or lay nature of state of consecrated life, 588
religious, See Religious
secular institutes, See Secular institutes
common life, practice of, 602
communion (communio), effect of conciliar teaching of, 591
confederations of, 582
Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life, See Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life Definition and nature of consecrated life, 573
diocesan bishops
authority over diocesan right institutes, 579; 594; 595 autonomy of institute, preservation and safeguarding of, 586 erection of institutes, 579 exemption of institute from governance of, 591

new forms, recognition and approval of, 605
religious, See Religious
diocesan right institutes
authority over, 579; 594; 595
defined, 589
dispensation from statutes, authority of diocesan bishop to grant, 595
erection of, 579
religious accounting responsibilities regarding temporal goods, 637
alienation of temporal goods, 638
temporary vows, separation of members in, 688
statutes, 595
division of institute into parts, 581
documents
Apostolic See documents regarding institute, promotion of knowledge and observance of, 592 prayer books, traditions, customs, and statutes, 587
Eastern code, 742
ecclesial dimension of, 574
ecclesiastical governance
autonomy of, 586
communion (communio), effect of conciliar teaching of, 591
exemption of institute from governance of local ordinary, 591
lay institutes, 596 superiors and chapters, 596
erection of, 579; 747 evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty, and obedience authority of Church to interpret and direct practice of, 576 chastity particularly, 599 Christ's life, modeled on, 575
individual members' duty of obedience to Supreme Pontiff, 590 obedience particularly, 601 poverty particularly, 600
profession of, 573
religious, See Religious second baptism, profession of counsels as type of, 743
secular institutes
incorporation into institute, 723
statutes required to address, 712
temporal goods, administration of, 718 statutes, enshrined in, 598 temporal goods, administration by religious of, 634
theology of, 575
exemption of institute from governance of local ordinary, 591
federations of, 582
founders' intentions, importance of remaining true to, 578 free assumption of, 573
hermits, 603
history and patrimony, importance of remaining true to, 578 juridic elements included in statutes, 587
lay institutes
defined, 588
ecclesiastical governance, 596
neither clerical or lay nature of state of consecrated life, 588
religious, See Religious
secular institutes, See Secular institutes mergers of, 582
moderators of, See subhead superiors and chapters of neither clerical or lay nature of state of consecrated life, 588; 711
new forms, recognition and approval of, 605
norms outside general statutes, 587 obedience, 601, See also subhead evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty, and obedience papal legates, role of, 364
People of God, 207
pontifical right institutes, 589
Apostolic See, subject to, 593
defined, 589
superiors and chapters of, 596 poverty, vow of, 600, See also subhead evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty, and obedience prayer traditions and documents, 587 preparation required for admission to institute, 597 provincial statutes, 587 qualifications for admission to institute, 597
religious, See Religious
secular institutes, See Secular institutes sex, equality of, 606 spiritual elements included in statutes, 587
statutes of, 587
approval of, 587
diocesan right institutes, 595 evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty, and obedience included in, 598 juridic elements included in, 587
norms outside general statutes, 587
provincial statutes, 587
religious, See Religious
secular institutes, See Secular institutes spiritual elements included in, 587
structure of, 581
superiors and chapters of, 596
Apostolic See documents regarding institute, promotion of knowledge and observance of, 592
ecclesiastical governance, 596
pontifical right institutes, 596
religious, See Religious
statutes, approval or change of, 587
suppression of, 584; 747
Apostolic See, reserved to, 584
parts of institute, 585
theology of, 573
unions of, 582
variety of gifts and purposes of, 577 virgins, orders of and individuals consecrated as, 604 vocation for, 574
vows
assumption of consecrated life through, 573
religious, 607
Consecrated species, See Eucharist
Consecrations
bishops, See Bishops
defined, 1169
ministers of, 1169
Consent
marriage and, See Marriage Consistories, 353
Consolidation of juridic persons, 121
Conspiracy or collaboration imputability, determining, 1329
Constance, Council of
college of bishops, 336
Constantine
judicial procedure in time of, 1611 Constantinople I, ecumenical council of, 337
Constantinopolitan tradition
Eastern code, 32
Constitutive laws, 86
Construction, See Interpretation
Consultors, college of, See College of consultors Consummation of marriage, 1061; 1142
broader views of what constitutes, 1364-1365 human manner, consummation required to be in, 1364 Middle Ages, view during, 1236-1237
ratum et consummatum, 1061; 1141
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions, See Ratum et non consummatum dissolutions ratum tantum, 1061
Contemplative orders
mission and apostolate of, 674
Contempt for Church
comments exciting, penalties for, 1369 physical violence prompted by, 1370
Contentious trials, 1655-1656, See also Trials
defined, 1613
Continence and celibacy of religious and clerics bishops' right to establish norms and pass judgment regarding, 277
concubinage, 1395
delicts and penalties
married clerics and religious, 1394

minors, sexual sins involving, See Sexual abuse of minors partners of married clerics and religious, 1394 sixth commandment, sins against, 1395
Eastern code, 277
formation of clerics, 247
loss of clerical state, dispensation from celibacy and, 290; 291
married clerics and religious, See Married clerics and religious minors, sexual sins involving, See Sexual abuse of minors obligations of clerics regarding celibacy, 277 ordination, assumption of obligation of celibacy required for, 1037 positive focus of, 277 Protestant clergymen who are married, permitted ordination of, 277 threats or violence, sexual sins involving, 1395 Continuing education
catechists, 780
clerics, 279; 555
religious, 672
vicars forane, duties regarding, 555
Continuous time, 201
Contracts, 1492
civil contract law, limited canonization of, 1290 marriage viewed as, 1055; 1237; 1238; 1241-1242; 1247 tribunals of, 1411; 1673
Contrition, act of, 962
Contumacy, decree of, 1592
Convalidation of marriage, 1378-1380
contracting marriage anew, 1160 defects of canonical form, 1160; 1163; 1378 defects of consent, 1159; 1162; 1378
defined, 1378
diriment impediments, 1156
documentation of, 1123
external/internal forum defects of consent, provable/public and unproven/occult, 1159 impediments public/provable or unprovable/occult, 1158
historical background
radical sanations, 1387-1388
simple convalidation, 1380-1381
mixed marriages, 1379
non-baptized persons, marriage between, 1379 pastoral concerns, 1368-1369
proofs
defects of consent, provable/public and unproven/occult, 1159
impediments public/provable or unprovable/occult, 1158 public nature and provability of impediment, 1158 radical sanations, See Radical sanation of invalid marriage registers, recorded in, 1123
renewal of consent necessity of, 1157
occult impediments, 1158 public and provable impediments, 1158
simple convalidation, 1156-1160; 1380-1381 true consent, providing, 1159
Conventiones, 3
Conversion of the soul
religious, 664
Coptic church, 1
Core doctrines
diocesan bishops' duty to protect unity and integrity of faith, 750
penalty for failure to hold required beliefs, 20; 1371
requirements regarding, 750
Corecco, Eugenio, 5
Coriden, James A., 277
Cottin-Biguard, Stéphanie and Jeanne, 791 Councils
ecumenical, See Ecumenical councils episcopal, 473
finance council, See Finance council and finance officer parish pastoral councils, 536 particular, See Particular councils pastoral, See Pastoral councils of particular churches plenary, See Plenary councils presbyteral, See Presbyteral councils of particular churches provincial, See Provincial councils
religious, See Religious Counter Reformation
presbyteral confirming, 1077
Counterclaims (actio reconventionalis or reconventio), 1463; 1495
Covenant
marriage viewed as, 1055
Cremation, 1176; 1184
Criminal actions
abduction or kidnapping as marriage impediment, 1089 administrative procedure for issuing decree regarding, 1720
homicide, See Homicide
marriage impediments abduction or kidnapping, 1089
homicide of spouse, 1090
ordination, irregularities for reception of, 1041
passion, crimes of
exemption from imputability, 1323
mitigation of imputability, 1324
non-mitigating factors, 1325
prescription, 1362
Criminal law, See Penal law
Criminal penances, See Penal penances Criminal precepts, 1319
Criminal process, See Penal process
Criminal remedies, See Penal remedies Criminal transfers, See Penal transfers expiatory penalties involving, 1336
physical violence, acts of, 1395
Criminal trials, See Penal trials Culpa, See Negligence or culpa
Culture, Pontifical Council for, 488
Cultus, See Divine worship Cum frequenter
impotence as marital impediment, 1084
Cum gravissima
cardinals, creation of, 351 Cum sanctissimus
associates of secular institutes, 725
secular institutes, 725; 878
Curators, See Guardians or curators Curia
diocesan, See Diocesan curias Roman, See Roman Curia
Custom, 86-87
accord with the law, in, 86-87 beyond the law, 86
community introducing custom, 25
contrary to canons
defined, 86
reasonableness of custom, 24
reprobation of, 5
revocation of custom, 28
time required for contrary custom to obtain force of law, 26
defined, 5; 86
Eastern code, 25; 87
factual custom, 86
impediments to marriage, 1076
interpretation of law, 27
legal custom, 23; 86-87
legislation versus, 86
marriage
common-law marriage, invalidity of, 1057
impediments, 1076
mixed marriages, 1343
mixed marriages, 1343
optional practices, 86
proofs, 94
reasonableness requirement, 24
reprobation of, 5; 24
revocation of, 28
source of canon law, as, 86 time of observance of, 26
Cyprian (Saint), 1360 Czechoslovakia clandestine ordinations in, 1074

Damages, 1649
abusive exercise of authority or ecclesiastical function, 1389 juridic acts, repair of damage inflicted by, 128
negligent exercise of authority or ecclesiastical function, 1389 penal process, See Penal process, subhead action to repair damages

Danger of death
anointing of the sick, 1005
baptism, See Baptism, subhead necessity or danger of death confessors of penitents in, 976; 977; 986
confirmation
sacrament given to those in danger of, 530
valid ministers in cases of, 883
Eucharist
children, 913
personal retention or carrying about of reserved hosts, 935
Viaticum for, See Viaticum marriage in cases of authorized witness, 1116
dispensations, 1079
investigations into freedom to marry, 1068
penance, See Penance
sacrament for those in, See Anointing of the sick separation of spouses, as grounds for, 1153 suspension of censure or prohibition due to, 1335; 1352 Daughters of Charity, 892
De benedictionibus, 1400; 1424
De episcoporum muneribus commercial activities, restrictions on clerics engaging in, 286 demarcation of competencies of pope and bishops, attempts at, 333
dispensations, 86; 87; 88; 93; 128
public or political office, clerics prohibited from, 285
radical sanations of invalid marriages, 1388
De facto Catholic institutions, 174-176
de Marillac, Louise (Saint) Daughters of Charity founded by, 892
de Paul, Vincent (Saint)
Congregation of the Mission founded by, 892
De Propaganda Fide (Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples), 783; 790 De scholis
ecclesiastical universities and faculties, 972
Deacons
age restrictions, 1031
associations, rights regarding, 278
baptismal ministers, as, 861
blessings, ministers of, 1169
cardinals, 350; 355
commercial activities, not subject to prohibitions on, 1392 commercial activities, undertaking, 288
common life, practice of, 280
confirmation, ministers of, 1066
divine word, role in ministry of, 757 dress requirements for clerics not applicable to, 288
Eucharist
aged, elderly, or disabled priests, assistants to, 930
exposition of reserved sacrament, minister of, 943
ordinary ministers, as, 910 financial obligations, undertaking, 288
formation of permanent deacons, 236
incardination through reception of diaconate, 266
labor organizations, membership in, 278; 288
liturgical ministers, as, 835 liturgy of the hours, duty to recite, 276 marital status of candidates, 1031
marriage celebration, role in, 1108; 1111; 1246 marriage of celibacy and, 277
ordination, See Ordination remuneration of married deacons, 281 widowed deacons, remarriage of, 277; 291
missionary activities, 784
ordination, sacrament of, See Ordination pastors of parishes, as, 517 political office, allowed to hold, 285; 288 political organizations, membership in, 288
preaching
homily, 767
principal duty of, 762
rights and restrictions, 764 public or political office held by, 285; 288
remuneration, 281
senior cardinal deacon, 350; 355
transfer of, 271
unions, membership in, 278; 288
widowed, 277
Deans, See Vicars forane
Death
anointing of the sick, See Anointing of the sick bishop, vacant diocesan sees on death of, 416 danger of, See Danger of death
diocesan administrators, 430
ecclesiastical offices
loss of, 184
presentation of alternative candidate following death of first candidate, 161 indulgences, application of, 994 marriage and spouses, issues involving affirmation of contracting parties regarding validity of marriage, 1068 danger of death, cases involving authorized witness, 1116
dispensations, 1079
investigations into freedom to marry, 1068
dissolution by death, 1141 marriage nullity proceedings and death of one or both spouses pending case, during, 1675
petition for nullity subsequent to, 1675
presumed death of spouse, 1707; 1798 pope, See Apostolic See, subhead vacancy in temporal goods given to Church mortis causa dispositions, 1299
pious wills, See Pious wills Viaticum as true sacrament for the dying, 1179; 1180-1181 Death register
funerals recorded in, 1182
Debtors
administration of temporal goods, responsibility for, 639
novitiate, admission to, 644
Declarations of mind or intent
imputability, 1330
Declarative interpretation of law, 16
Declared latae sententiae, See Latae sententiae Decree on the Pastoral Office of Bishops, 760; 761 Decrees
general, See General decrees general executory, See General executory decrees judicial, 1617; 1618
singular, See Singular decrees and precepts Decretals
Gregory IX (Pope), 1611-1612
Dedications
altars, 1237; 1400
certificate of, 1208
church buildings, 1217; 1400
defined, 1169
diocesan bishops, 1206
loss of, 1212
ministers of, 1169; 1206
proof of, 1209
sacred objects, 1171
Defectors from Catholic Church by formal act marriage, form of, 1117
Defenders of the bond
appeals, 1628; 1636
appointment of, 1432; 1435
clerics as, 1435
complaint of nullity against the sentence, eligibility to lodge, 1626
lay people as, 1435
marriage nullity, 1432; 1678
need to cite, 1433
nullity of marriage or ordination, 1432
ordination, nullity of, 1711
qualifications, 1435
questions presented to judge by, 1533
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions, 1701
rights, 1434
same person as promoter and defender, 1436
Defenses
norms for defense briefs, 1602
penal proccss
administrative process, opportunity for self-defense in, 1720
advocates for accused, provision of, 1723
last word allowed to accused, 1725
rebuttal, 1603

right of defense
complaint of nullity against the sentence based on denial of, 1620 marriage nullity cases and right to review acts prior to publication, 1710-1711 Definitive teachings
disagreement versus dissent, 205; 218
examples of definitive and nondefinitive doctrines, 21-22 infallibility of, See Infallibility
penalty for failure to hold required beliefs, 20; 1371
requirements regarding, 750
Dei Filius
decrees and constitutions, teaching by, 754 Dei miseratione
collegiate tribunals, 1426
defenders of the bond, 1432
Dei verbum belief, requirements regarding, 750
teaching function of Church, 747 Delegated power ecclesiastical governance, See Ecclesiastical governance executive power, See Executive power Delegates, papal apostolic delegates, 363
bishops as
theology combating, 184; 566-567
Vatican Council II on, 183-184
viewed as, 428
papal legates, See Papal legates
Delicts, 1529
1917 Code, See 1917 Code
1983 Code, See 1983 Code
abortion, 1398
abuse of authority
aggravation of imputability by, 1326.
penalties for, 1389
abuse of Church or religion, 1369
advocates and procurators at trials, See Advocates and procurators alienation of church property, unlawful, 1377 alleged commissions of, 1321
apostasy, 1364
appeal or recourse against Apostolic See, 1372
attempted, 1328; 1330 authority of Church, against, 1370-1377 beliefs and core doctrines, failure to hold to, 20; 1371
blasphemy, 1369
bribery of church officials, 1386
censures for, See Censures civil authority to punish, use of, 1529-1530
commercial activities, prohibited, 1392 communicatio in sacris (indiscriminate sacramental sharing), 1365
community
offenses primarily against, 1529-1530 reaction of, 1530-1531 community, against, 1529-1530
concubinage, 1395
consecrated species, violations of, 1367
consecration of bishops, unauthorized, 1382
contempt for Church, comments exciting, 1369
continence and celibacy, violations of, See Continence and celibacy of religious and clerics declarations of mind or intent, 1330
defined, 1321; 1529
disobedience
commission of, 1372
incitement or provocation of, 1373 recourse against the pope, censure for, 1372 diversity, tolerance for, 1530
doctrinal violations, 1371
Eastern code, 41
ecclesiastical functions, exercise of, 1378-1379 error equivalent to ignorance, committed in, 1323; 1324 exemption from consequences of, 1323 extraordinary circumstances for which no explicit canon exists, 1399
falsehood, See Falsehood
fear, actions due to diminishment of imputability, 1324
exemptions, 1323
feticide, 1398
foreseeable events, failure to avoid, 1326
free exercise of ecclesiastical function, interference with, 1375 hatred of Church, comments exciting, 1369
heresy, 1364
heretical views, 1330
human life, integrity, and freedom, violations of, 1397; 1398
ignorance, commission of delict in, See Imputability
illegitimate exercise of ministry, 1384
imputability, See Imputability
inadvertence, commission of delict by, 1323
indiscriminate sacramental sharing (communicatio in sacris), 1365
individual, 1574-1575
infra-universal, See Local ordinaries judges, abuse of office by, 1457
legality, principle of, 1399
local ordinaries, See Local ordinaries
married clerics and religious, 1394
Mass offerings, trafficking in, 1385
membership in forbidden societies, 1374
minors, parents or parental surrogates allowing non-Catholic education or baptism of, 1366 morals, attacks on, 1369
necessity or grave inconvenience, actions due to diminishment of imputability, 1324
exemptions, 1323
negligent exercise of authority or ecclesiastical function, 1389
nondefinitive teachings, pertinacious rejection of, 752 nulla poena sine lege or nulla poena sine culpa, 1399
occult delicts
defined, 1340
latae sententiae imposed on, 1314
public penances not to be imposed for, 1340
ordination
illicit ordination of priests or deacons, 1383 irregularities and impediments to reception of, 1044
passion, crimes of
exemption from imputability, 1323
mitigation of imputability, 1324
non-mitigating factors, 1325
penal obligations, violations of, 1393
penance, involving, 1586 perjury before ecclesiastical authority, 1368 physical force or coercion, due to, 1323
physical violence, See Physical violence
profanation of sacred objects, 1376 proof of commission of, 1321 public, See Public delicts religion, against, 1364-1969
religious institutes, mandatory dismissal from, 695 residence and domicile, violation of obligations regarding, 1396 sacraments, involving, 1585-1586
sacred objects, profanation of, 1376
sacred rites, prohibited participation in, 1365
schism, 1364
seal of confession, violation of, 1388
self-defense, in, See Self-defense
simony, sacraments received through, 1380
simulation of sacraments, 1378; 1379
special obligations, violations of, 1392-1396
temporal goods of Church
free exercise of ecclesiastical function, interference with, 1375
profanation of sacred objects, 1376
unlawful alienation of church property, 1377 theological rationale for punishing, 1530-1531 trials regarding, 1400; 1401
tribunal judges and ministers, abuse of office by, 1457
unforeseeable occurrences, 1323
unity of Church, against, 1364-1969
universal, 1315; 1532
usurpation of ecclesiastical office, 1381
violence, See Physical violence Demonic possession, See Exorcism Denis, J., 127
Desecration of sacred places, 1211
Determinate penalties, See Obligatory penalties

Deus scientiarum Dominus canonical mission (missio canonica) in Catholic universities and colleges, 812
ecclesiastical universities and faculties, 972-973
significance of, 14
Developmentally disabled persons, See Mentally disabled persons Devotional practices, See Spiritual exercises Diaconate, See Deacons Didascalia of Tertullian judicial procedure described in, 1610 Dignitatis humanae
common good, 223
religious freedom, ownership of temporal goods in context of, 1254 schools, freedom of parents to choose, 797
teaching function of Church, 747 truth, obligation and right to search for, 218 Dilatory exceptions
adjudication of, 1459
Dimissorial letters, See Ordination
Diocesan administrators
age restrictions, 425
Apostolic See, removal reserved to, 430
authority of, 427
cessation of ministry of, 430
college of consultors
consent of, acts requiring, 427 election by, 421
death of, 430
defined, 413
election of, 421; 424
finance officer, required to be separate from, 423 interim government prior to designation of, 419 invalidly designated, 425
liturgy, celebration of, 429
metropolitan, designation by, 421; 425; 436 norm for electing, 424 notification of Apostolic See of election of, 422 one only to be designated, 423 parishes, role in, 719, Appendix II
powers of, 427
qualifications of, 425
removal of, 430
residence and domicile requirements, 429
resignation of, 430
rights and obligations of, 427
successors to, 430
suffragan bishop, designation by, 425 transferred bishops having powers of, 418 validity of designation, 425 Diocesan archives, 486; 639 access
general archive, 487
secret archive, 490 cathedral records, 491
chancellors and vice-chancellors access of, 487
responsibilities of, 482
collegiate churches, records of, 491 copies and photocopies, right to obtain, 487 curias
required to have, 486
responsibilities of, 482 destruction of documents, 489 diocesan bishop's access to general archive, 487
historical archives, 491
secret archive, 490
general archive, 486-488
historical archives, 491 inventory or catalogue of, 486 parish records, 491; 535 removal of documents from general archive, 488
historical archives, 491
secret archive, 490
secret archive, 489; 490; 1082; 1719 security requirements, 487
Diocesan bishops, 376; 518
1983 Code references to, 559-562, Appendix II absence from diocese, 394 ad limina visits, See Ad limina visits advocates and procurators for trials, approval of, 1483
anointing of the sick, blessing of oil used for, 999
apostolate, responsibility for fostering, 394
apostolic life, societies of, 738
appointment of, 377 archives of diocese, access to general archives, 487
historical archives, 491
secret archive, 490
auxiliary bishops, See Coadjutor and auxiliary bishops baptism of persons fourteen or older, 863
burial in churches, 1242
canon penitentiary, appointment of, 508
canons, chapters of
cathedral chapters, See Cathedral chapters collegiate chapters, See Collegiate chapters catechesis, norms for, 386
cathedral chapters, See Cathedral chapters church, consent to build, 1215 churches sui iuris other than his own, relationship with faithful of, 383
coadjutor bishops, See Coadjutor and auxiliary bishops college of consultors, role regarding, 502
collegiate chapters
appointment of canons, 509
pastoral norms, establishing, 510
statutes, approval of, 505
common discipline, role in fostering, 392 companions on visitations, right to choose, 396
conferences of bishops
members, as, 450
powers not usurped by conference, 455
voting rights, 454
confirmation, ministers of, See Confirmation consecrated life, institutes of, See Consecrated life, institutes of curias
appointment of officers, 470
assistance provided to, 469
coordinative and pastoral responsibilities, 473
dedications, 1206
defenders of the bond, appointment of, 1435
defined, 376
dispensations, 87; 88
ecclesiastical discipline, role in fostering, 392
ecclesiastical governance, 134; 183-184; 391
ecclesiastical offices, 157; 199
ecumenical involvement, 383
emeritus, See Retirement episcopal vicars, See Vicars general and episcopal vicars equivalent positions, 381
Eucharist
eucharistic presiders, diocesan bishops as, 389 exposition of reserved sacrament, prescripts as to ministers of, 943
processions, regulations as to, 944 executive powers, 134; 518 finance council and finance officer finance officer, appointment of, 494
president of council, 492
relatives of, 492
freedom in investigating truths, recognition of, 386
funerals of, 1178
holy life, duty to live, 387
immediacy of power, 381
impeded sees, See Impeded diocesan sees
judges
diocesan bishops as, 1419
execution of sentence by, 1653 exercising power through judges, 391
judicial powers, 518
judicial vicars, See Judicial vicars juridic representative of diocese, as, 393
jurisdiction, 183-184
legislative powers, 518
liturgy, celebration of, 388
liturgy, direction of celebration of, 838
media communications, 386
non-baptized, relationship with, 383 non-Catholics, baptized; relationship with, 383
ordinary power, 381
ordination by
extra-territorial ordination, permission required for, 1017 proper minister, diocesan bishop as, 1016

papal delegates or vicars, as
theology combating, 184; 566-567
Vatican Council II on, 183-184
viewed as, 428
parishes, See Parishes
particular councils, participants in, 443 pastoral councils of particular churches, See Pastoral councils of particular churches pastoral role of, 383
pastors
provision of office by, 523
suitability, consultation as to, 524 penance, determination of need for general confession and absolution, 961
pious wills, modification of, 1310
pontifical functions and insignia, 390 powers and authority of, 381; 391; 518
preaching, 386
presbyteral councils, See Presbyteral councils of particular churches presbyters, relationship with, 384
presumed death of spouse, declaration of, 1707 promoters of justice, appointment of, 1431; 1435 proper power, 381
protection of unity and integrity of faith, duty of, 386
Quinquennial Report, 399
absences from diocese, reporting, 394 ad limina visit in year required to submit, 400
radical sanation of invalid marriage, 1165
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions, 1699; 1700; 1704
rectors of churches
appointment of, 557
removal of, 563
religious, See Religious removal of pastors, role in, 1742 rescripts granted by Apostolic See, power to extend, 72
residence of clerics, 394
resignation, 401
retirement, See Retirement
sacramental sharing, norms for, 844
sacraments, See Sacraments
sacred times, 1244
sanctifier, as, 387
secular institutes
clerical members subject to, 713
permission to separate from institute, 726; 727
suffragans, See Suffragan bishops
synods, See Diocesan synods
taking possession of office, 382; 418
teaching function of, 386
temporal goods of Church, See Temporal goods of Church
transfer of, 416; 418
transfer of pastors, role in, 1748-1751 vacant sees, See Vacant diocesan sees
vicars forane
appointment of, 553
removal of, 554
vicars general, See Vicars general and episcopal vicars
visitations, 396
burden or hardship, care not to impose, 398
companions on visitations, right to choose, 396 due diligence, performance with, 398
religious, 397
scope of, 397
vocations, duty to foster, 385
Diocesan curias, 622-623
acts, validity of, 473 appointment of officers, 470; 471
archives
required to have, 486
responsibility for, 482
Book VII of canon law, Procedures, to be observed by, 472 chancellor, signature of, 473
defined, 469
diocesan bishops
appointment of officers, 470
assistance provided to, 469
coordinative and pastoral responsibilities, 473
Eastern code, 622
ecclesiastical governance, 469
episcopal councils, 473
juridic effect of documents, 473
moderators, 473
oath of office, 471
purpose of, 469
secrecy requirements, 471 secretaries of, chancellor and vice-chancellor automatically regarded as, 482 signatures on acts of, 473 validity of acts, 473
Vicars general and episcopal vicars as moderators of, 473
Diocesan domicile or quasi-domicile, 102
Diocesan judges, 1421; 1422
Diocesan pastoral councils, See Pastoral councils of particular churches
Diocesan synods, 610-611
1917 Code, 461; 610
canons of cathedral church as members of, 463
cessation of, 468
conference of bishops, communication of declarations and decrees to, 467
convocation of, 461
defined, 460
diocesan bishop
assistance for, 460
convocation by, 461
presiding over synod, 462 temporarily presiding over diocese, 462
Eastern code, 611
ecclesiastical governance, 466
eparchal assemblies, 611 impediment to membership, proxy members in cases of, 464 lay people as members of, 463 legislative powers, 466
membership, 460
proxy members, 464
required and allowed members, list of, 463 metropolitan, communication of declarations and decrees to, 467 more than one diocese, spanning, 461 observers, 463
president of, 462
proxy members, 464
purpose of, 460
rectors of major diocesan seminaries as members of, 463 religious superiors as members of, 463 secular institutes or societies of apostolic life, 463 subject matter discussed at, 465
theology of, 460
vacancy or impediment to episcopal see, 468
vicars forane, 463
vicars general and episcopal vicars delegated to preside over, 462
membership of, 463
Diocesan tribunals, 1421; 1422; 1438
Dioceses, 369
archives, See Diocesan archives bishops, See Diocesan bishops chancellors, See Chancellors and vice-chancellors constitutive elements of, 369 curias, See Diocesan curias
defined, 369
finance council and finance officer, See Finance council and finance officer impeded sees, See Impeded diocesan sees mission churches, canonical status of, 516 parishes, divided into, 515
particular churches, as, 368
pastoral councils, See Pastoral councils of particular churches prayers and spiritual exercises specific to, 839
synods, See Diocesan synods taking possession of office by bishop, 382; 418
theology of, 566-567
vacancy of diocesan see, 403; 409
vacant sees, See Vacant diocesan sees vice-chancellors, See Chancellors and vice-chancellors Diplomatic relations, See Papal legates Direct affinity
marriage and, 1092
Direct consanguinity
marriage and, 1078; 1091
Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms of Ecumenism, 16; 755

Diriment impediments
marriage, 1073; 1083-1094; 1156; 1272; 1378 Disabled persons
catechetical needs of, 777
mental disabilities, See Mentally disabled persons schools for special needs, 802
Disagreement versus dissent, 205; 218
Discipline, ecclesiastical diocesan bishops' role in fostering, 392
Discretion in imposing penalties
facultative penalties, 1343
indeterminate circumstances, restraint to be exercised in, 1349 last resort, penalties as, 1341
multiple delicts, 1346
obligatory penalties, 1344
procedures used for, 1342
quasi-penal options, 1348
waivers, 1345
Discretionary authority of hierarchic superior administrative recourse, granting, 1739 removal from ecclesiastical offices conferred at discretion, 193 Discretionary penalties, See Facultative penalties Discussion phase
contentious trials, 1601-1606
Dismissal from clerical state, 1336
concubinage, 1395
continence and celibacy of clerics and religious, violations of, 1394; 1395 facultative penalty, as, 1343 judicial procedures generally required for, 1317 local ordinaries unable to legislate for, 1317
married clerics and religious, 1394
physical violence, acts of, 1395
sexual abuse of minors, 1317; 1395 sexual sins involving threats or violence, 1395 support of cleric subject to, provision for, 1350
Dismissal from religious institute, 864 abortion, participation in, 1398
access of dismissed member to supreme moderator, 698
appeal or recourse, 700
confirmation of decree by Apostolic See, 700 decision on dismissal, making, 699
facultative dismissal, 696
imposed exclaustration, 686
ipso facto dismissal, 694 juridic effect of decree of dismissal, 701
mandatory dismissal, 695 married religious, 694,1394
physical violence, acts of, 1397
proof of reasons for, collection of, 697 warnings regarding, 697 Dismissal from secular institutes or societies of apostolic life abortion, participation in, 1398
definitively incorporated members, 746
members not yet definitively incorporated, 742 perpetually incorporated members, 729
physical violence, acts of, 1397
Disobedience
commission of, 1372
inciting or provoking, 1373
recourse against the pope, censure for, 1372
Dispensations, 85; 126-129
1917 Code, 127
1983 Code, 126
Apostolic See, 87; 135-136 authority to dispense, 87-89
cessation, 93
conferences of bishops, from laws issued by, 88 constitutive laws not subject to, 86
defined, 85; 126-127
diocesan bishops, 87; 88
diocesan laws, from, 88
doubt concerning reason for granting dispensation, 90
ecclesiastical office by postulation, See Ecclesiastical offices, subhead postulation eligible persons to receive, 91 emergency cases, 87
historical background, 126-128
interpretation, 92
marriage, 1078; 1277
age restrictions, 1083
Apostolic See, reserved to, 1078 authority to provide, 1078 consanguinity, no dispensation for, 1078
death, danger of, 1079
documentation of, 1081; 1082; 1121
Eastern code, 1127
mixed marriages
canonical form, dispensation from, 1127
historically requiring dispensation, 1124 ordination as impediment, 1087 wedding preparations, completion of, 1080
mixed marriages
canonical form, dispensation from, 1127
historically requiring dispensation, 1124
oaths, 129; 1203
ordination, irregularities and impediments petition to obtain, procedure for, 1049 power to grant dispensation, 1047
pastors' authority to grant, 89 plenary councils, from laws issued by, 88 priests' authority to grant, 89 provincial councils, from laws issued by, 88 ratum et non consummatum dissolutions of marriage referred to as, 129; 1697 reasons for granting, 90
rescripts containing, 75
Roman law, 126
sacred times, obligations regarding, 1245
strict interpretation, 93
temporal goods, administration and distribution of, 129 time period, lapse of, 93
validity
doubt concerning reason for granting dispensation, 90
Vatican Council I, 127
Vatican Council II, 126; 127
vinculum or obligatory bond, assumption of, 129
vows, 129; 1196
vulnus legis or wounding of the law, referred to as, 85 Dispute resolution, alternative means of administrative recourse, as form of, 1733
judicial procedure, instead of, 1713-1716
Disputed forum, 1416
Disqualifying laws, 10; 14; 15
Dissent versus disagreement, 205; 218 Distribution of clerics
personal prelatures, 294
temporary service and incardination, 271 Diversity levels of tolerance for, 1530 Divinae consortium naturae confirmation, shift in emphasis in, 880
Divine law
affinity of canon law with, 2-3 embraced by canon law, 55-56
prescription, exemption from, 199
Divine Office, See Liturgy of the hours Divine word, ministry of, 920 basis for, 760
bishops, role of, 756
catechesis, See Catechesis deacons, role of, 757 definition of divine word for purposes of, 920 education, via, 761 entire people of God involved in, 920 lay people acting in absence of or impediment to ministers, 230
means of, 760
pastor's parochial role, 528
pope, role of, 756
preaching, See Preaching presbyters, role of, 757
purpose of, 760
religious, role of, 758
sources of, 760
women, role of lay women, 759
religious, 758
Divine worship, See also specific types acts of divine worship other than sacraments, 1400 altars reserved for, 1239
free entry for, 1220
shrines, at, 1234
Divinus perfectionis Magister, 1403

Division of juridic persons, 122
Divorce
Eastern church, in, 1237-1238; 1360
Greco-Roman culture and, 1235; 1359 indissolubility of marriage bond, See Marriage Jesus' explicit condemnation of, 1235; 1359 patristic era, condemnation in, 1359-1340 Doctrinal requirements
core doctrines and beliefs, 750
delicts, 1371
penalties for violations, 1371
penalty for failure to hold required beliefs, 20; 1371 Documents and documentation
archives, 489
diocesan, See Diocesan archives
parishes, 491; 535
temporal goods of Church, inventory of, 1283 baptismal registers, 877 confirmation registers, 895
consecrated life, institutes of Apostolic See documents regarding institute, promotion of knowledge and observance of, 592
prayer books, traditions, customs, and statutes, 587
death register, 1182
diocesan archives, See Diocesan archives ecclesiastical offices, election to, 173 eucharistic canons, sources for, 1097 expert witnesses, reports of, See Witnesses and witness testimony, subhead reports by experts falsification of, 1391
marriage, See Marriage
marriage nullity, 1123; 1685
Mass offerings, documentation of, 954; 958
notaries, functions and duties of, 484 oral contentious process, documentation of, 1664
ordination
proof of, 1053
required for, See Ordination parochial registers, 535
pious foundations, 1306; 1307
proofs, as, See Proofs public documents, falsification of, 1391
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions, 1706
registers, See Registers religious novitiate, documentation required for admission to, 645 restitutio in integrum, documents requiring, 1645
secret marriages, 1133
trial documentation
expert witnesses, reports of, See Witnesses and witness testimony, subhead reports by experts
marriage nullity, 1685
oral contentious process, 1664
oral discussion, 1605
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions, 1706
witnesses and witness testimony, 1567; 1568 vacant diocesan sees ban on removal of documents of diocesan curia of, 428 witness testimony, documentation of, 1567; 1568 Dolus or intent
imputability, determining, 1321
Domicile, See Residence and domicile Doubts of law or fact, 14
executive power, 144
revocation of law, doubtful, 21
Dress requirements
clerics, 284
deacons, not applicable to, 288
Eucharist, vestments worn in celebration of, 929
religious, 284; 668
Drug abuse or drunkenness diminishing imputability, 1324
exempting from imputability, 1323
not mitigating imputability, 1325
Due diligence visitations by diocesan bishops, 398 Due process
protection of rights, 221; 231; 1818-1819; 1837
Duns Scotus, 1247
Duties and rights, See Rights and obligations of Christian faithful

Easter
blessing of baptismal font pastors' duties regarding, 530
preference for use of water blessed at Easter vigil in baptisms, 853 celebration of baptism during Easter vigil, 856
date of, 577
eucharistic celebrations during triduum, 920
Lent, 1250
reception of Eucharist during season of, 920 Eastern Churches, See Churches sui juris
Eastern code, 1; 27-41
AAS (Acta Apostolica Sedis), publication of laws in, 8
anointing of the sick, 37; 998; 1180-1181
apostolic life, societies of, 731; 893 appeal or recourse against Apostolic See, no counterpart to delict of, 1372 archiepiscopal churches, 33 assemblies of hierarchs, 34
associations, 401
attempts to a pending suit, 1700, n.142 autonomy, degrees of, 36
baptism, 36; 1033-1034
bishops, 34; 511
books and written publications, 977
cardinals, 350; 464
catechesis, 36; 777; 933
celibacy requirements, 277 censures and expiatory penalties, no sharp distinction between, 1553 chrismation, 36-37; 1070
churches sui iuris, 32
clerics, 34
coercion and force used in exercising teaching function of Church, prohibition on, 748
confirmation, 1067; 1070
Congregation for the Eastern Churches, 26; 483
consecrated life, institutes of, 742 contentious trials, 1655-1656
contents, 30-31
custom, 25; 87
deacons, formation of, 236
delicts, 41
diocesan curias, 622
diocesan synods, 611
dismissal from religious institute, juridic effect of, 701
disputed forum, 1416
divine worship other than sacraments, 1400
doctrinal violations, 1371
ecclesiastical magisterium, 36
ecclesiastical offices, 196
ecclesiastical universities and faculties, 818; 973 ecclesiology, 241
ecumenical involvement, 39-40; 755
eparchal assemblies, 611
eparchal consultors, college of, 652 eparchal finance officer, 646
eparchies, 34
equality of all peoples, 208
Eucharist, 37; 1095
evangelization, 35-36
exarchies, 34
finance council and finance officer, 646 freedom of inquiry and expression of opinion regarding academic disciplines, 218
funerals, 1424
general norm for penalties not found in, 1399
general norms, 48
groupings of particular churches, 438; 567 hierarchs, assemblies of, 34
historical background, 27-28
incidental cases ("attempts to a pending suit"), 1700, n.142 individual delicts, number of, 1574
indulgences, granting, 995
initiatory sacraments, 842
Instruction for Applying the Liturgical Prescriptions of the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches, 26
interpretation of law, 20
judicial procedure, 1614
penal procedures, emphasis on, 1342

Pius XII, promulgated by, 1754
special processes, 1760
latae sententiae, omission of, 221
lay people, 35; 759
liturgy, celebration of, 838; 998-999
marriage, See Marriage
media communications, 977
membership in forbidden societies, 1374
metropolitan churches, 33
metropolitans, 437
minor seminaries, 234
missionary activities, 784; 787; 938 mixed marriages, dispensations from canonical form, 1127 non-Catholics, baptized; reception of, 39 number of churches under, 32
oaths, 1416
ordination, 37; 1008; 1041
ordination, nullity of, 1799-1800
"other churches" category, 32-33
parishes, 675-676
parochial vicars, 548; 725
particular churches, 503; 504
patriarchal churches, 32
patriarchs, 438
penal law compared to Latin code, 1340; 1548
penal process, 1809; 1810
penalties, 41
penance, 37; 961; 964; 1138
People of God, 241
pious causes, gifts given to Church for, 1299
preaching
content of, 768
priests and deacons, 757; 764 preliminary canons, 31
presbyteral councils, 652
presumed death of spouse, 1798
primates, 438
procedural law, 40-41
profession of faith and oath of fidelity, 20; 833 promulgation of revised code, 30 protosyncellus, 628
ratio peccati, 1401
religious, 35
revision of, 28-30
rights and obligations of Christian faithful, 31-32 rites, canons addressing, 32 sacramental sharing, 844
sacraments, 36-39
sacred places and times, 1424; 1442 schools, catholicity of, 803
secular institutes, 878-879
separation of spouses, 1790 spiritual formation of clerics, 246 structure, 30-31
suspension, different rules for, 1333
syncellus, 628
teaching function of Church, 911
temporal goods of Church, 40 purposes of Church ownership, 1254
taxation, 1263
theology, instruction in, 252 title of, 31
traditions of, 32
tribunals, 1439
universities and colleges, Catholic, 808
Vatican Council I, 27
vicars forane, 729-730
vicars general and episcopal vicars, 628 vocations, fostering, 233 voluntary exclaustration of religious, 686
vows, 1416
western countries, Eastern Catholic churches in, 32-33 Ecclesia Dei
unlawful conferral of episcopal ordination by Archbishop Lefebvre, 205 Ecclesia in Africa, 782; 938 Ecclesiae pastorum books, publication of, 825-832 Ecclesiae sanctae
coadjutor and auxiliary bishops, 417; 540
conferences of bishops, 22
continuing education of clergy, 279
ecclesiastical regions, provinces united into, 433
groupings of particular churches, 567
parishes, 516
particular churches, 503
pastoral councils of particular churches, 667 pastors, age restrictions for, 538
personal prelatures, 294; 297; 394-395
presbyteral councils, 652
retirement of bishops, 401
temporary service of clerics, 271
universal Church, instruction in solicitude for, 257
vacant diocesan sees, 416
Ecclesiastical benefits excommunication's effect on eligibility to receive, 1331 expiatory penalties affecting enjoyment of, 1336 married clerics and religious barred from, 1394
suspensions, 1333
Ecclesiastical discipline
diocesan bishops' role in fostering, 392
Ecclesiastical documents, See Documents and documentation Ecclesiastical elections, See Elections Ecclesiastical functions abortion, consequences of participation in, 1398
abuse of, 1389
bishops, See Bishops
bribery of church officials, 1386
clerics, See Clerics
delicts in exercise of, 1378-1379 ecclesiastic office defined as function or munus, 145 free exercise, penalties for interference with, 1375
illegitimate exercise of, 1384
lay people, performed by, 230 liturgy, celebration of, See Liturgy, celebration of married clerics and religious barred from, 1394
negligent exercise of, 1389
penal process, restrictions on accused in, 1722 religious' free exercise of ecclesiastical function, interference with, 1375 retention after deprivation or cessation, 1381 sacramental, See Sacraments usurpation of office, 1381
Ecclesiastical funerals, See Funerals
Ecclesiastical goods, See Temporal goods of Church Ecclesiastical governance, 47; 183-184, See also Authority
1917 Code, 129; 130
1983 Code, 129
apostolic life, societies of, 734 associations, 780, See also Associations, subhead competent ecclesiastical authority bribery of church officials, 1386 cardinals exempt from power of diocesan bishops, 357 clerics, offices requiring ecclesiastical governance restricted to, 274
consecrated life, institutes of, See Consecrated life, institutes of
delegated power, 131
ecclesiastical offices distinguished from, 199-200
executive power, See Executive power habitual faculties, 132
validity of acts placed by delegate, 133
diocesan bishops, 134; 183-184; 391
diocesan curias, 469
diocesan synods, 466
divisions of power, 135
ecclesiastical functions, See Ecclesiastical functions eligibility of persons to exercise, 129 excommunication's effects on participation in, 1331
executive power, See Executive power expiatory penalties affecting participation in, 1336 external forum, 130
free exercise of ecclesiastical function, interference with, 1375
full communion, submission to ecclesiastical governance as bond indicating, 205 habitual faculties, 132
internal forum, 130
judicial powers
defined, 135

diocesan bishops, 518
Roman Curia, 480
jurisdiction and, 183
lay people, 129
legislative powers, See Legislative powers
loss of clerical state, effects of, 292
married clerics and religious barred from, 1394
munus triplex theory, 183
ordinaries, 134
ordinary power of, 131; 138
ordination as prerequisite for, 129 papal legates' exemption from governance of local ordinary, 366 parishes, interim governance of vacant, 541 pastors' ministry of, 529
patriarchs and primates as titles, meaning and function of, 438
religious, 780
moderators, See Religious, subhead moderators superiors, See Religious, subhead superiors
secular institutes, 717
validity of acts placed by delegate, 133
Vatican Council II, 183-184
Ecclesiastical judgments, See Judicial procedure Ecclesiastical jurisdiction, See Jurisdiction
Ecclesiastical laws, 7-22; 55-56
Ecclesiastical magisterium academic freedom and submission to, 218
Eastern code, 36
Ecclesiastical offices, 145; 195-196
1917 Code, 195
1983 Code, 196
acquisition of office, 178
alteration of, 148
alternative candidates, 161
authority
competency or incompetency, 148 election, confirmation of, 179 erection of offices, 198-199 expiration of authority conferring office, 184 installation of candidates, 163 postulation, confirmation of, 182 provision or conferral of offices, 147 removal from ecclesiastical offices, 192; 193 supplying for another, no authority conferred by, 155 care of souls, offices requiring, 150; 207 deferral, avoidance of, 151
ordination required for, 151
clerical monopoly on, 195; 274 clerical state, removal by law on loss of, 194 communion with Church qualification for office, as, 149 removal from office by law on loss of, 194 competent authority, 148 compromise, elections by, 174; 175
confirmation
election, 179
postulation, 182
constitution of, 145
death candidate, presentation of alternative candidate following death of, 161 loss of office by, 184
deferral, avoidance of, 151
defined, 145
delegation of power, distinguished from, 199-200
diocesan bishops, 157; 199
dispensation by postulation, See subhead postulation divine or ecclesiastical ordinance, constituted by, 145
Eastern code, 196
elections, 147; 164; 212
absentee votes, 167 announcement of results, 176; 177 compromise, by, 174; 175
conduct of vote, 173
confirmation, 179
convening electors, 165-167
more than one title, persons with rights to vote under, 168 notice of convocation, 166; 167 number of votes exceeding number of electors, 173 one vote per person rule, 168 overlooked voters, 166 person elected, notification of, 177 postulation, See subhead postulation renunciation of office by person elected, 177 rescindment, 166
right to vote, 167
tellers, 173
time limits on, 165
transcription of acts, 173 validity of election, 166; 169-171 validity of vote, 171-173
emeritus titles, 185
free conferral, 147; 157 function or munus, defined as, 145
historical background, 195
illegitimately possessed offices vacant by law, 154 impediment to office, postulation despite, See subhead postulation incompatible offices, 152 installation, 163
juridic effects
promise of office, no juridic effect to, 153
supplying for another, no authority conferred by, 155
lay people's right to hold, 228; 274 limitations and restrictions on conferral of, 206-207 loss of, See Loss of ecclesiastical office
loss of clerical state, effects of, 292 more than one office held by same person at same time, 152 negligence, supplying for another in cases of, 155 nonvacant offices, conferral of, 153
number of persons presented, 160
ordination required for, 151; 195
penal process, restrictions on accused in, 1722 positions considered to be, 200 postulation, See Postulation
prescription, exemption from, 199
presentation, 210-211
alternative candidates, 161
death of candidate, presentation of alternative candidate following, 161
defined, 147
number of persons presented, 160
renunciation by candidate, presentation of alternative candidate following, 161 right of, 158
self-presentation, 160
time limits on, 162
unsuitable candidates
alternative candidates, presentation of, 161
two unsuitable presentations, 162 willingness of person presented, 159
privation, See Privation promise of office, effect of, 153 provision or conferral of
authority, 147
expiration of authority conferring office, 184
expiration of office, conferral prior to, 153
free conferral, 147; 157 limitations and restrictions on, 206-207 method of making, 147
nonvacant offices, conferral of, 153
presentation, See subhead presentation validity of office, required for, 146 written requirement, 156
qualifications
requirements regarding, 149 unsuitability of candidate, presentation of alternative candidate following, 161
religious appointment of religious to ecclesiastical office, 682 removal of religious from ecclesiastical office, 682 removal from office, See Removal from ecclesiastical office renunciation of office
elected person, by, 177
presentation of alternative candidate following, 161 time to decline office, 159
resignation, See Resignation
rights and obligations, 145
self-presentation, 160
significance of, 200-201

simony invalidating, 149 spiritual purpose of, 145 spiritual qualities required for, 149 stability of, 145 supplying for another, 155
suppression of, 148; 184
time and timing
elections, 165
loss of office due to lapse of time period, 184; 186
postulation, 182
presentation, 162
renunciation of office, 159
transfers, See Transfer of office unsuitable candidates
alternative candidates, presentation of, 161
two unsuitable presentations, 162
vacant, See Vacant ecclesiastical offices
validity
election to office, 166; 169-171
illegitimately possessed offices vacant by law, 154 provision or conferral of office required for, 146 qualifications for office and, 149 simony invalidating provision of office, 149 vacant offices, conferral of, 153; 154 vote in election, 171; 172
Vatican Council II, 195
willingness of person presented, 159
written requirement, See Written requirement Ecclesiastical provinces, 567-568
1983 Code, 566
Apostolic See and, 431
authority, 432
authority in, 432
boundaries coinciding with territory of nation, norms for councils of provinces with, 439 college of bishops, role of, 431 Congregation for Bishops, role of, 431 councils, See Provincial councils establishment, alteration, or suppression of, 431 exempt dioceses now to be attached to, 431
juridic personality, 432
metropolitans, 432
provincial councils, 439; 440 purpose and structure of, 431 regions, united into, 433 territory of nation, norms for councils of provinces with boundaries coinciding with, 439
Ecclesiastical regions, 567-568
1983 Code, 566
advantages to establishing, 433
Apostolic See, 433
bishops, meetings of, 434
conferences of bishops, 433
juridic personality, 433
provinces united into, 433
Ecclesiastical universities and faculties, 14-16; 815; 972-973 applicability of Catholic university canons to, 818 approval of statutes and plans, 816
authority
approval of statutes and plans, 816
conferral of academic degrees with canonical effects, 817
establishment of institutions, 816
bishops
establishment of higher institutions of the religious sciences, 821
students, responsibility to supply, 819 conferences of bishops, establishment by, 821 conferral of academic degrees with canonical effects, 817
defined, 815
documents issued on, 972-973
Eastern code, 818; 973
establishment of, 816; 820; 821
lay people's right to take classes at, 229
loss of clerical state, effects of, 292 mutual assistance and cooperation between faculties, 820 papal establishment and approval of, 816; 817
profession of faith, persons obliged to make, 833
seminaries, See Seminaries statutes and plans, approval of, 816 students, responsibility of bishops and religious institutes to supply, 819
teachers
loss of clerical state, effects of, 292
mutual assistance and cooperation between, 820
profession of faith, persons obliged to make, 833
Vatican Council II, 972-973
Ecclesiology, 241-245, See also People of God baptism as sign of People of God, 204; 205; 243 bonds indicating full communion, 205 catechumens, place of, 206
collegiality between bishops and pope, 423 common priesthood of faithful and ministerial priesthood, interrelationship of, 207 communion (communio), as, 204; 242-245, See also Communion (communio) consecrated life, ecclesial dimension of institutes of, 574
Eastern code, 241
ecclesiastical governance, submission to, 205
full communion, what constitutes, 205 hierarchical structure, 207
juridical relationship of bishops to pope, 423 Lumen gentium, influence of, 242
major divisions of People of God, 207 particular councils, significance of, 578-579 profession of faith, 205
sacraments, 205
Echevarria, Lamberto de, 1836
Economic issues and obligations, See Financial issues and obligations Economic support, See Financial support Ecumenical councils, See also specific councils
1917 Code, 336; 337
1983 Code, provisions of, 426 administrative acts, no appeal of, 1732
Apostolic See
role and powers of, 338
vacancy during council, 340
automatic interruption by vacancy in Apostolic See, 340 binding force of decrees, 341
college of bishops
exercise of power in council, 337 expression of collegiality between pope and bishops, council as, 426 participants at council, 339 collegiality between pope and bishops, expressing, 426
convocation of, 338
decrees, binding force of, 341 dissolution of, 338; 340
formula of promulgation for acts of, 341
historical background, 337
importance of, 427-428
number of, 337
participants, 339
participation of faithful in, 212
powers of, 427-428
retired diocesan bishops taking part in, 402 subject matter of, 338
suspension of, 338; 340
Ecumenical Directory
conditional conferral of nonrepeatable sacraments due to doubt as to reception or validity of reception, 845 eucharistic and ecclesial communion, link between, 204; 244 Ecumenical involvement, 16
1983 Code, 16
biblical translations, 825
diocesan bishops, 383
Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism, issuance of, 16; 755
Eastern code, 39-40; 755
episcopal involvement, duty of, 755
Eucharist, 908
formation of clerics, 256
papal involvement, duty of, 755
penance, 1167
Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue, 488
Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, 16; 487; 755
prohibited participation in sacred rites, 1365
sacramental sharing, 844; 1023-1024
Vatican Council II, importance in, 16

Education, 14-16; 953
1917 Code, 14
bishops
responsibilities of, 794
schools, responsibility to establish, 802
catechesis generally, See Catechesis catechists, initial and continuing education of, 780 Church, rights and obligations of, 794 civil authority, right of parents to assistance from, 793
clerics
continuing education of, 279
formation of, See Formation
seminaries, See Seminaries
Congregation for Catholic Education, 485-486; 785; 796; 812; 962 formation of clerics (Ratio fundamentalis institutionis sacerdotalis), 232-238 continuing, See Continuing education divine word, as means of ministry of, 761
ecclesiastical universities and faculties, See Ecclesiastical universities and faculties formation of clerics, See Formation freedom of inquiry and expression of opinion regarding academic disciplines, 218 goals of, 795
historical background to canons on, 14-16 minor children, rights of, 217; 226; 793 minor seminaries, role of, 234 non-Catholic education of minors, parents or parental surrogates allowing, 1366 ordination, candidates for, 1032
parents
non-Catholic education or baptism of minors, allowing, 1366
rights and obligations of, 226; 793
schools and, See Schools pastoral responsibilities, 794 priesthood
formation of, See Formation responsibilities regarding education of faithful, 794
rights and obligations of Christian faithful Christian/Catholic education, right of all faithful to, 217 clerics, continuing education of, 279 ecclesiastical universities and faculties, right of lay people to take classes at, 229
formation of clerics, See Formation knowledge, right of lay people to acquire, 229 parental duties and obligations toward minor children, 226; 793 service to Church, formation for, 231
schools, See Schools
seminaries, See Seminaries service to Church, formation for, 231
teachers, See Teachers
universities and colleges
Catholic universities, See Universities and colleges, Catholic
chaplains, 568
ecclesiastical universities and faculties, See Ecclesiastical universities and faculties Effective date of laws, 8
Elections
ecclesiastical office, to, See Ecclesiastical offices
free exercise of ecclesiastical function, interference with, 1375 pope, election of, 332
age restrictions on voting cardinals, 354 number of cardinals that may vote in, 350
responsibility for, 349
tribunals, 1411
Elvira
particular council held at, influence of, 577 Emergencies
dispensations, 87
exercise of orders in, 1048 religious expelled from house in emergency situations, 703 Emeritus diocesan bishops, See Retirement
Emeritus titles
ecclesiastical offices, 185
Employment by church remuneration for, See Remuneration social justice in, S1286
Enchiridion indulgentiarum, 997; 1172
Enclosure, 606; 667
Engagement to marry, 1062
English common law
interpretation of law, 16
ownership of temporal goods, 1256
presumption of innocence compared to Roman law, 1321
Enrollment of clerics, See Incardination of clerics
Eparchal assemblies, 611
Eparchal consultors, college of, 652
Eparchal finance officer, 646
Eparchies
Eastern code, 34
Ephesus, ecumenical council of, 337
missionary activities, 782
Episcopal college, See College of bishops Episcopal conferences, See Conferences of bishops Episcopal councils, 473
Episcopal ministry, See Bishops Episcopal vicars, See Vicars general and episcopal vicars Episcopate, See Bishops
Equality of all peoples, 208; 255
Equitable principles, 18
Eremitical life
consecrated life, institutes of, 603
defined, 603
People of God, as part of, 207
Error or mistake
confessions, 1538
delicts committed in error equivalent to ignorance, 1323; 1324
executive power, 144
juridic acts, 126
law, regarding, 15
marriage, See Marriage
rescripts, 66
resignation due to, 188
singular administrative acts, remedy for errors in execution of, 45 theological writings, regulations for review of errors in, 1364 Essential beliefs
diocesan bishops' duty to protect unity and integrity of faith, 750
penalty for failure to hold required beliefs, 20; 1371
requirements regarding, 750
Establishment of law, 7
Ethiopian metropolitan church Alexandrian rite, observing, 1
Eastern code, following, 33
metropolitan structure of, 437
Eucharist, 897; 1095
1917 Code, 911; 944; 1097
acolytes
exposition of reserved sacrament, minister of, 943
extraordinary ministers, as, 910
administration, licit, 844
age restrictions on reception of, 913; 1068 aged, infirm, or disabled priests, assistance for, 930 alcoholic priests, 924 altar used in liturgical celebration of, 931 anticipated Mass for Sunday and holy days of obligation, 931
application of Mass, See Application of Mass baptized persons' right to reception of, 912
bination, 905
bishops as ordinary ministers, 910
both kinds, Communion under, 924 bread alone, Communion under, 924 bread used celiac disease, use of gluten-free wafers for persons with, 924 unleavened bread requirement, 926 wheaten bread requirement, 924 canon law, as source of, 5-6 catechesis in preparation for receiving, 913; 914
celebret, 903
celiac disease, use of gluten-free wafers for persons with, 924 children receiving, 913; 914; 1068 Christ's presence in, 899 churches sui iuris, concelebration among priests of, 902 Churches sui iuris, participation in Eucharist of, 923 clerics' duty to celebrate, 276 communal celebration preferred to individual or quasi-private celebrations, 276 concelebration of, 902

  Mass offerings, 951
confirmation
  change in order of reception in relationship to, 1068
  close link to, 1068-1069
danger of death
  children, 913
  personal retention or carrying about of reserved hosts, 935
  Viaticum for, See Viaticum
deacons
  aged, elderly, or disabled priests, assistants to, 930
  exposition of reserved sacrament, minister of, 943
  ordinary ministers, as, 910
defined, 897
diocesan bishops
  eucharistic presiders, as, 389
  exposition of reserved sacrament, prescripts as to ministers of, 943
  processions, regulations as to, 944 documentary sources for canons, 1097
Easter season, reception of Eucharist during, 920
Easter triduum, during, 920
Eastern code, 37; 1095
ecclesial and eucharistic communion, link between, 244 ecumenical involvement, 908 exposition of reserved sacrament, See Reservation of Eucharist fasting prior to reception of, 919 female servers, 906
form of celebration of, 1097 altar used in, 931
  anticipated Mass for Sunday and holy days of obligation, 931
  bination, 905
  bread used, See subhead bread used celebret (letter of introduction), 903
  concelebration, 902
  Easter triduum, 931 ecumenical services, 908 frequency of celebration by individual priests, 904; 905 functions restricted to priest, 907
  languages used, 928
  Latin, use of, 928
  Mass intentions applicable to any person living or dead, 901 matter and form, 899; 924 ministers, See subhead ministers of more than once a day, 905 offerings for, See Mass offerings
  one matter only, consecration of, 927 participation in, See subhead participation in and reception of permission of unknown priest to celebrate, 903
  place of celebration, 931; 932 prayers during, See subhead prayers during public, not private, nature of, 906 sacred place, held in, 931 seated performance of liturgy due to age or infirmity of celebrant, 929
  servers, 906
  spiritual fruits, accessibility of, 899 time of celebration, 931
  trination, 905
  vestments, 929
  water used, 924
  wine used, 924
frequency celebration by individual priests, 904; 905 more than once a day, celebration of, 905 reception of, 898
General Instruction of the Roman Missal, 902; 907; 909; 1097; 1122 initiation, sacrament of, 842; 1066; 1068-1069
intinction, reception by, 924
lamp to shine before reserved host, 940
languages used, 928
Latin, use of, 928
lay persons
  aged, elderly, or disabled priests, assistants to, 930
  extraordinary ministers, as, 910 participation in and reception of Eucharist, See subhead participation in and reception of letter of introduction, priest permitted to celebrate Mass on presentation of, 903 licit administration, 844
marriage
  Eucharist as part of celebration of, 1119
  Eucharist received prior to, 1065
matter and form
  bread used, See subhead bread used Christ's presence in Eucharist, 899; 924; 927 elements of Eucharist, 924
  one matter only, consecration of, 927
  water used, 924
  wine used, 924
mentally disabled persons receiving, 914
ministers of acolytes as extraordinary ministers, 910
  aged, infirm, or disabled priests, assistance for, 930
  bishops as ordinary ministers, 910
  concelebration, 902
  deacons as ordinary ministers, 910 exposition of reserved sacrament, 943
  extraordinary ministers, 910
  lay persons as extraordinary ministers, 910
  Mass intentions applicable to any person living or dead, 901
  ordinary ministers, 910
  priests as licit ministers, 900; 910; 1097 Viaticum, ministers of, 911
most important sacrament, defined as, 897 non-believers and non-Catholics, application of Mass intentions to, 901 non-Catholic churches, use of, 933
non-Catholic ministers, reception by Catholics of sacraments from, 844
non-Catholics receiving sacraments from Catholic ministers, 844
offerings for, See Mass offerings
once a year, obligation to receive, 920
one kind, Communion under, 924
one matter only, consecration of, 927
ordination to be celebrated with Mass, 1010 parents, duties of, 914 participation in and reception of, 1107 baptized persons' right to reception of, 912
  both kinds, Communion under, 924
  bread alone, Communion under, 924
  children's reception of, 913; 914
  Churches sui iuris, Eucharist in, 923
  Easter season, reception of Eucharist during, 920 fast prior to taking Communion, 919
  intinction, reception by, 924 mentally disabled persons, 914
  more than once in a day, 917
  once a year, obligation to receive, 920
  one kind, Communion under, 924
  outside Mass, 918
  penance, See subhead penance presence and participation of Christian faithful, importance of, 906 public sinners, prohibition of Eucharist to, 915
  Viaticum, 921; 922
  wine alone, Communion under, 924 pastoral responsibilities regarding, 528; 530; 898; 914
penal process, restrictions on accused in, 1722 penalties for violations of consecrated species, 1367
penance
  first Communion, prior to, 914
  public sinners, prohibition of Eucharist to, 915 serious sins, obligation to confess before taking Communion, 916
permission of unknown priest to celebrate, 903
perpetual adoration, 942
place of celebration of, 931; 932
place of reservation of, 936 prayers during eucharistic prayer
    non-Catholics not mentioned during, 901
    priest, functions restricted to, 907
  functions restricted to priest, 907 personal prayer of priest, 909 presence and participation of Christian faithful, 906

priests
aged, infirm, or disabled priests, assistance for, 930 alcoholics, 924
exposition of reserved sacrament, minister of, 943 functions restricted to, 907 ministers of Eucharist, as, 900; 910; 1097 personal prayers of, 909
processions, 944
public, not private, nature of, 906
public sinners, prohibition of Eucharist to, 915
quantity of reserved hosts, 939 reason, ability to use, 914 reception of, See subhead participation in and reception of
religious obligations of, 663 reservation in houses of, 936
renewal of reserved hosts, 939
reservation of, See Reservation of Eucharist rights and obligations regarding, 898 baptized persons' right to take Communion, 912 children, duty to prepare, 914
Easter season, reception of Eucharist during, 920
once a year, obligation to receive, 920
reservation of Eucharist, 934 sacred place used for celebration of, 931 sacred times requiring participation in, 1244; 1442 seated performance of liturgy due to age or infirmity of celebrant, 929
secular institutes, 719 secure place, removal of reserved sacrament to, 938 seminaries, regular celebration in, 246
servers, 906
sick, Viaticum for, See Viaticum simulation of, 1378
sin and sinners
public sinners, participation in and reception of Eucharist by, 915 serious sins, obligation to confess before taking Communion, 916 storage place of reserved hosts, 938
sui juris church members receiving sacraments from Catholic ministers, 844 tabernacles for reserved hosts, 938
theology of, 897; 899
time of celebration of liturgy, 931
Trent, Council of, 1097
trination, 905
unity of all Christian faithful in, 899 Vatican Council II as source for canons, 1097 veneration of, See Veneration vessel used for reservation of, 939 vestments worn in celebration of, 929
Viaticum, See Viaticum
water used, 924
wine alone, Communion under, 924
wine used, 924
women servers, 906
Eucharistic prayer
non-Catholics not mentioned during, 901
priest, functions restricted to, 907
Eucharisticum mysterium, 902; 904; 1122-1123
Eudists, 892
St. John Eudes, Congregation of Jesus and Mary founded by, 892
Eugene IV (Pope), 1445 Eusebius
judicial procedure described by, 1610 Evangeli nuntiandi
missionary activities, role of pope and bishops in, 782
outreach efforts, 771
religious, catechesis by, 778
right and obligation of all Christian faithful to proclaim gospel, 211 Evangelical counsels (chastity, poverty, and obedience)
apostolic life, societies of
assumption of, 731
temporal goods, administration of, 741
chastity
clerics, See Continence and celibacy of religious and clerics
consecrated life, institutes of, 599
marriage impediment, perpetual vows of chastity as, 1088
religious, See Continence and celibacy of religious and clerics consecrated life, as part of, See Consecrated life, institutes of obedience, See Obedience poverty, vow of, See Poverty, vow of
religious, See Religious second baptism, profession of counsels as type of, 743
secular institutes
incorporation into institute, 723
statutes required to address, 712
temporal goods, administration of, 718
Evangelization
apostolate, right to exercise, 216
communion (communio) ecclesiology, 211
Eastern code, 35-36
formation of clerics, 257
lay people, 225
missionary activities, See Missionary activities
preaching, See Preaching
rights and obligations of Christian faithful, 211
Evangelization in the Modern World, 933 Evening prior to feast day obligations satisfied on, 1248 Evidence, See Proofs
Ex corde Ecclesiae, 14-16 promulgation of, 14; 961-962 universities and colleges, Catholic, See Universities and colleges, Catholic Exarchies
Eastern code, 34
Excardination of clerics
confessional faculty, loss of, 975
procedures for excardination, 267; 269; 270
religious institute, departure from, 693
Exceptions from law strict interpretation of, 18 Excommunication
abortion, 1398
accomplice, absolution of, 1378
apostasy, 1364
appeal or recourse against Apostolic See, 1372 censure, as type of, 1530
consecrated species, violations of, 1367
defined, 1331
ecclesiastical benefits, eligibility to receive, 1331
effects of, 1331
ferendae sententiae, 1331
governance of Church, participation in, 1331
heresy, 1364
latae sententiae, declared or nondeclared, 1331 laws of Church, still subject to, 1331 liturgical effects of, 1331 membership in Church, retention of, 1331
membership in forbidden societies, 1374 nature of delict and degree of separation from communion, 1331 physical attacks on pope, 1370
remission of penalties, 1357
restraint in threatening, 1319
sacraments, access to and reception of, 1331; 1357
schism, 1364
seal of confession, violation of, 1388
simulation of sacraments, 1378
Executive power, 135
competency, 139
continuity of, 46
delegated executive power, 137
cessation of, 142
interpretation of, 138
more than one delegated person, 140
successive delegation, 141
diocesan bishops, 134; 518
error or doubt, 144
general decrees, not sufficient to issue, 30
general executory decrees, power to issue, 31 higher and lower authorities, 139 interpretation of ordinary and delegated executive power, 138
jurisdiction, 136; 144
lower and higher authorities, 139 more than one authority's competency to act, 139
more than one delegated person, 140

ordinary executive power
cessation of, 143
interpretation of, 138
suspension of, 143
scope of, 136
singular administrative acts authority to issue, 35
continuation of executive power, 46 successive delegation, 141 suspension of ordinary executive power, 143
territorial restrictions, 136
travelers, over, 136
Executory decrees, general, See General executory decrees Executory norms, 48
Exiles
chaplains for persons deprived of ordinary pastoral care, 568 separation of non-baptized partners due to persecution or captivity, 1149 Exorcism, 1172
defined, 1172
revision of rite of, 1400
specific permission to perform, 1172
Expenses, judicial, See Judicial expenses
Experts
church buildings, construction of, 1216
lay people functioning as, 228 penal process, consultations for decree of ordinary regarding, 1718
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions, 1701; 1705
witnesses and witness testimony, See Witnesses and witness testimony
Expiatory penalties, 1530 censures, distinguished from, 1549
cessation of, 1566-1567
criticism of, 1553
dismissal from clerical state, 1336
duration of, 1336; 1566-1567
extraordinary circumstances for which no explicit canon exists, 1399
focus of, 1553-1554
latae sententiae, 1336
limitations on, 1338
perpetual, restraint in threatening, 1319
purpose of, 1312
remission, basis for, 1312
remission of, 1566-1567 residence and domicile, restricting, 1337 societal damage, aimed at remedying, 1553-1554
solicitation of sexual sins in confession, 1387 territorial restrictions, involving, 1337 transfer to another office, 1336
types of, 1336
Explanatory interpretation of law, 16
Explanatory Note (Lumen gentium), 330; 337; 423 Express revocation of law, 20
Extensive interpretation of law, 16; 36
External forum
convalidation of marriage
defects of consent, provable/public and unproven/occult, 1159
impediments public/provable or unprovable/occult, 1158
ecclesiastical governance, 130
marriage, impediments to, 1074 penalties restricted to, 1531
penances, See Penal penances precepts imposed in, 1319 remission of penalties in, 1361 rescripts, proof of, 74
tribunals of Roman Curia addressing matters of, 486 Extinction of juridic persons, 123
Extinctive prescription, 230
Extrajudicial confessions, 1537
Extraordinary consistories, 353
Extraordinary forum, See Forum Extraordinary ministries
lay people, 230
Extreme unction, See Anointing of the sick

Fabric of St. Peter's Basilica, 489
Facultative dismissal
religious institute or society, from, 696
Facultative penalties, 1315
abuse of Church or religion, 1369
abusive exercise of authority or ecclesiastical function, 1389
alienation of church property, unlawful, 1377
bribery of church officials, 1386
commercial activities, prohibited, 1392 dismissal from clerical state as, 1343
disobedience, 1372
doctrinal violations, 1371
documents, falsification of, 1391
extraordinary circumstances for which no explicit canon exists, 1399
free exercise of ecclesiastical function, interference with, 1375
illegitimate exercise of ministry, 1384
membership in forbidden societies, 1374
negligent exercise of authority or ecclesiastical function, 1389 options of judge in dealing with, 1343
penal obligations, violations of, 1393
perjury, 1368
profanation of sacred objects, 1376
residence and domicile, violation of obligations regarding, 1396
restraint in threatening, 1319
sacred objects, profanation of, 1376
seal of confession, violation of, 1388
simulation of sacraments, 1378; 1379
usurpation of ecclesiastical office, 1381
Faith marriage, privilege of faith concerning doubts about, 1150; 1372-1373
The Faithful, See People of God Falsehood
documents, falsification of, 1391
marriage, fraud or deception in contracting, 1098
perjury before ecclesiastical authority, 1368 reputation of cleric damaged by calumnious denunciations involving delicts other than sexual solicitation, 1390 reparation, need for, 1390
solicitation of sexual sins in confession, accusation of, 982; 1387; 1390 rescripts, validity of, 63
restitutio in integrum, 1645
solicitation of sexual sins in confession, false denunciators of, 982; 1387; 1390 Family life absence from religious house to care for relatives, 665
Pontifical Council for the Family, 487 rights and obligations of lay people regarding, 226
Fasting, See Sacred times
Fatherhood
presumptions regarding, 1138
Favor of law
faith possessing favor in cases of doubt about marriage, 1150 marriage itself possessing, 1060
Favors, See Rescripts Fear
coercion resulting from, See Coercion complaint of nullity against the sentence based on, 1620
confessions resulting from, 1538
imputability and
diminishment of imputability, 1324
exemptions, 1323
juridic acts, deficient, 125
marital consent due to, 1103
oaths taken out of, 1200
resignation due to, 188
vows made out of, 1191
Feast days, See Sacred times Fees
judicial, 1649
prescription of, 1264
Ferendae sententiae
abortion, 1398
abusive exercise of authority or ecclesiastical function, 1389
alienation of church property, unlawful, 1377
apostasy, 1364
appeal or recourse against Apostolic See, 1372
beliefs and core doctrines, failure to hold to, 20; 1371
bribery of church officials, 1386
changes to law and imposition of, 1313
collaboration or conspiracy, 1329
commercial activities, prohibited, 1392
consecrated species, violations of, 1367

continence and celibacy of clerics and religious, violations of, 1394; 1395
defined, 1531
discretionary, See Facultative penalties
disobedience, 1372; 1373
doctrinal violations, 1371
documents, falsification of, 1391
excommunication, 1331
extraordinary circumstances for which no explicit canon exists, 1399
facultative, See Facultative penalties formal procedure required for, 1533 formal warning required for, 1347; 1549
free exercise of ecclesiastical function, interference with, 1375
heresy, 1364
illegitimate exercise of ministry, 1384
indeterminate, See Facultative penalties last resort, as, 1341
married clerics and religious, 1394
Mass offerings, trafficking in, 1385
membership in forbidden societies, 1374
multiple delicts, 1346
negligent exercise of authority or ecclesiastical function, 1389 normative, as, 1314
obligatory, See Obligatory penalties
penal obligations, violations of, 1393
perjury before ecclesiastical authority, 1368
physical violence
any person, against, 1397 clerics or religious, against, 1370
preceptive, See Obligatory penalties
profanation of sacred objects, 1376 reasons for emphasis on, 1533
remission of penalties
law, penalties established by, 1355
obligatory penalties, 1356 reputation of cleric, false denunciations damaging, 1390 residence and domicile, violation of obligations regarding, 1396 rule, regarded as, 1531
sacred objects, profanation of, 1376
sacred rites, prohibited participation in, 1365
schism, 1364
seal of confession, violation of, 1388
sexual sins by clerics and religious, 1394; 1395
simony, sacraments received through, 1380
simulation of sacraments, 1379
solicitation of sexual sins in confession, 1387
suspensions, 1333
usurpation of ecclesiastical office, 1381 Fetuses abortion, See Abortion
baptism of aborted fetuses, 871
feticide, 1398
Fidei donum apostolates, 782
Fidelity, oath of anti-modernist oath, replacement of, 19
bishops, 279
persons obliged to take, 19-22; 833
Finance council and finance officer, 645-646
administration of temporal goods, 1278; 1280 appointment of council, 492 appointment of finance officer, 494 Book V and Book I, applicability of, 493; 646 college of consultors and appointment of finance officer, 494 diocesan administrator required to be separate from finance officer, 423
diocesan bishops
finance officer, appointment of, 494
president of council, 492
relatives of, 492
diocese required to have, 492
Eastern code, 646
eparchal finance officer and finance council under Eastern code, 646 establishment of council, 492 function of council, 493 membership in council, 492 parochial finance council, 537
president of council, 492
religious orders, 636
Financial aid
missionary activities, 791
obligation of Christian faithful to support Church, 222
seminaries, 263; 264
Financial issues and obligations
Apostolic See
council of cardinals to advise pope of organizational and economic problems, 481 Prefecture for Economic Affairs of the Holy See, 489 clerics obtaining permission to undertake financial obligations, 285 deacons' exemption from requiring permission to undertake obligations, 288
Prefecture for Economic Affairs of the Holy See, 489 religious obtaining permission to undertake obligations, 672 Financial remuneration, See Remuneration
Financial support
Apostolic See, diocesan support for, 1271
Church's right to support of Christian faithful, 222; 1260-1262
clerics, for, 281
coadjutor and auxiliary bishops, retired, 411 diocesan bishops, retired, 402 incardination of clerics and availability of support, 269 institutes for support, 1274; 1275 penalties or dismissal, in cases of, 1350
personal prelatures, 295
removal from ecclesiastical office, following, 195 responsibility of, 281 marriage of persons with support obligations, 1071
missionary activities
bishops
mission territories, support for persons coming from, 792 support of missionary activities by, 782; 791 diocesan support for, 791
religious, for erection of houses dependent upon availability of, 610 retired religious bishops, 707
rights and obligations of institute regarding, 670
removal from ecclesiastical office, following, 195
secular institutes, members working for, 718
Firma in traditione
Mass offerings, 1130
First Vatican Council, See Vatican Council I Fixed altars, 1235
Florence, ecumenical council of, 337 Force, prohibition on use of complaint of nullity against the sentence based on, 1620
confessions resulting from, 1538
juridic acts, deficient, 125
marital consent due to force, 1103
novitiate of religious order, impediment to admission to, 643
oaths, 1200
teaching function of Church, 748
Foreign language instruction
formation of clerics, 249
Form and matter, See Matter and form, Scholastic doctrine of Form for Quinquennial Report, 399
Form of celebration of sacraments, See specific sacraments Formation
apostolic life, members of societies of, 735 baptism, for, 851; 865
clerics, 232
academic instruction, 248; 254
admission to seminaries, requirements for, 241 catechetics, instruction in, 256
celibacy, instruction regarding, 247 Church's duty and exclusive right of, 232 continuing education of clergy as ongoing formation, 279 deacons, permanent, 236 diocesan seminaries, 237 duties and difficulties of priesthood, information regarding, 247
ecumenical involvement, 256
evangelization, 257
exclusive right of, 232
field education programs, 258
foreign language instruction, 249 homiletic skills, instruction in, 256

integration of academic work and spirituality, 254 interdiocesan seminaries, 237
language instruction, 249
Latin, 249
major seminaries, 235; 237
mandate to teach theology, 253
mature vocations, 233
methods of instruction, 254
minor seminaries, 234
missionary activities, 256; 257
national programs for, 242 non-believers and baptized non-Catholics, instruction in relationships with, 256 ordination, formation for, 1027 parish administration, 256 pastoral instruction, 255
permanent deacons, 236
personal prelatures, 295
philosophical instruction, 251
practical experience, programs providing, 258 sacraments, instruction in celebration of, 256 sacred ministry, instruction pertaining to exercise of, 256
seminaries, See Seminaries
social justice, 256
spiritual formation, 244; 245
teaching methods, 254
theological instruction and study, 252; 253
time requirements, 250
universal Church, instruction in solicitude for, 257
vocations, See Vocations
confirmation, for, 889; 890
novitiate, See Novitiate
religious, 879
novitiate, See Novitiate
post-novitiate or continuing formation, 659-661; 826 secular institute members continuing formation, 724
initial formation, 722 Formational ministries
catechesis, See Catechesis education, See Education missionary activity, See Missionary activity Forum
choice of, 1407
competency or incompetency extraordinary or singular forum, incompetency of lower courts over cases involving, 1406
ordinary forum requirements, 1407 contract, tribunal of, 1411 disputed, 1416
disputed object, of, 1410 domicile or quasi-domicile, tribunal of, 1408 election of tribunal, 1411 external, See External forum extraordinary or singular forum immunity of pontiff, 1404
incompetence of lower courts over cases involving, 1406 reservation of issues to Roman Rota, 1405
review of confirmations by pontiff, 1405 right of pontiff to judge cases, 1405
immunity of pontiff, 1404
internal, See Internal forum judge's competency in ordinary forum, what constitutes, 1407 marriage nullity cases, forum of proof for, 1673 ordinary forum, 1407-1415
petitioner, 1407; 1409 proofs, forum of; marriage nullity cases, 1673 quasi-contract, tribunal of, 1411
respondent, 1407; 1409
separation of spouses, 1692
singular forum, See subhead extraordinary or singular forum transients, 1409
unlocatables, 1409
Foundations, pious, See Pious foundations
Fourth Lateran Council
consanguinity as marriage impediment, 1078; 1091 preaching role of religious, 758
France
Eucharist, confirmation delayed until after reception of, 1068
presbyteral confirming, 1067
Fraternal life, See Common life, practice of Fraud, See Falsehood
Free exercise of ecclesiastical function penalties for interference with, 1375
Freedom of inquiry and expression of opinion opinions, right of Christian faithful to express, 212; 218
theologians, 218
Freedom of religious coercion in choosing state in life, freedom from, 219 interference with free exercise of ecclesiastical function, 1375 sacrament of penance and direction of conscience, freedom of members regarding, 630 Freedom to be ordained candidates' freedom to take, request, or refuse orders, 1026 declaration of freedom by candidate, 1036
perceived lack of, 1026
Freedom to marry, See Marriage French Revolution radical sanation of invalid marriages, 1387 Fridays
days of penance and fasting, as, 1250
Frings, J. (Archbishop), 11
Fulfilled in Your Hearing: The Homily in the Sunday Assembly, 767
Full communion
baptism
conferred by baptism, 96
what constitutes full communion, 205
confirmation as admission of Catholic or non-Catholic baptized adults into, 883 Eastern code on baptized non-Catholics, 39 ecclesiological bonds indicating full communion, 205
excommunication, See Excommunication heresy, apostasy, and schism, 205 profession of faith as bond indicating, 205 sacraments administered to Christians not in full communion with Catholic Church, 844 sacraments as bond of, 205 submission to ecclesiastical governance as bond indicating, 205
what constitutes, 205
Fundamental Law of the Church liturgical ministries and offices, 835
sacraments, validity of, 841
Fund-raising, 1262
conference of bishops, norms issued by, 1262
duty of faithful to give support to Church in response to, 1262
Funerals, 1176; 1407-1408
blessing of graves, 1240
burials, See Burials
catechumens, 1183
celebration of, 1408-1409
cemeteries, See Cemeteries cremation, 1176; 1184
death register, recording parishioners' deaths in, 1182 deprivation of church funeral and funeral Mass, 1184; 1185 diocesan bishops' funerals, 1178
Eastern code, 1424
eligibility for church funeral, 1411 heretics, apostates, and schismatics, 1184 non-baptized infants, 1183 non-Catholics granted a church funeral, 1183 notorious rejecters of Catholic faith, 1184 offerings for, 1181
parish church of deceased, preferably held in, 1177 pastor's special duty regarding performance of, 530
place of, 1177
public scandal, 1184
rectors of non-parochial churches, 558
registers, parochial, 535
religious, of, 1179
requirements regarding, 1176 revision of rite for, 1400
theology of, 1176

Galileo Galilei, 752
Gaudium et spes
adapting preaching to congregation, 769
basic equality of all peoples, 255

consummation of marriage, 1364
content of preaching, 768
decrees and constitutions, teaching by, 754
liturgy, celebration of, 1000
marriage, 1055; 1151; 1239
poor, obligation to assist, 222 rights, controls on exercise of, 223 sacred disciplines, what constitutes, 218
social justice, obligation of faithful to support, 222 vocations, right to pursue, 219
Gemelli, Agostino
secular institutes, 710
Gender, See Sex and gender General Catechetical Directory, 775; 933 General confession and absolution act of contrition, 962
danger of death, 961 diocesan bishop's determination of need for, 961 individual confession following, 962; 963 number of penitents too many for available confessors, 961 prohibition without specific need, 961 proper disposition of persons making, 962
reasons for, 961
rite for several penitents with, 961; 1140-1141 General decrees, 29; 97
authority to issue, 30
defined, 29
executive power, 30; 31
executory decrees, See General executory decrees laws, identification with, 29
General Directory for Catechesis, 933 General executory decrees, 31
authority to issue, 31
defined, 31
laws, relationship to, 33 persons bound by, 32
revocation, 33
General Instruction of the Roman Missal
eucharistic canons, 902; 907; 909; 1097; 1122
General norms, 1 et seq.; 47-48
General session
synod of bishops assembled in, 345; 346
Germanic cultures
marital practices, 1236; 1326; 1360 Germany
presbyteral confirming, 1067
Gifts duty of tribunal judges and ministers not to accept, 1456 Gluten allergies celiac disease, use of gluten-free eucharistic wafers for persons with, 924 Gnosticism
marriage, 1234-1235
Godparents
baptism, See Baptism, subhead sponsors (godparents) confirmation, See Confirmation, subhead sponsors marriage impediments, 1295-1296
Gonzalez del Valle, J. M., 826
Good faith, 198
Goods of Church, See Temporal goods of Church Goods, sacred or ecclesiastical, See Temporal goods of Church Governance, power of, See Ecclesiastical governance Grace, state of
indulgences, 996
Gratia, See Rescripts
Gratian, John, 126; 1095; 1236; 1361 Gravissimum educationis catechesis as pastoral responsibility, 773 education canons derived from, 793-821 goals expressed in, 14
minor seminaries, 234
right to education, 217
Greco-Roman culture
marriage, 1234-1236; 1326-1327
Greek Catholic church
Byzantine rite, observing, 1
Eastern code, under "other churches" category of, 32-33
Gregorian Reform
dispensations, 127
Gregory I (Gregory the Great, Pope) cardinal accepted as technical canonical term by reign of, 464 confirmation, letter on, 1067
Gregory IX (Pope)
Decretals of, 1611-1612
Gregory XIII (Pope)
polygamy, 1370
Gregory XV (Pope)
Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, founding of, 892
Grocholewski, Zenon (Archbishop), 1528; 1818 Guardians or curators minors, See Parents and parental surrogates trials, petitioners and respondents at
appointment of, 1479
citation in contentious trial communicated to, 1508
insanity, incapacity, or incompetency, 1478
minor children, 1478
suspension of contentious trial due to change in status of guardian or curator, 1519 Gubbio, Bishop of Innocent I's letter on confirmation to, 1067 Gutiérrez, J., 578

Habits
religious, 668
Hamilton, Alexander, 1818
Handicapped, See Disabled persons Harmony
clerics as fosterers of, 287
penal law required to avoid disruption of, 1530
Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace, 487 Hatred of Church
comments exciting, penalties for, 1369 opposition to church authority for reasons of, 1373
Health
clerics in poor health, 281 diocesan bishops with ill health, 401 disabled persons, See Disabled persons insanity, incapacity, or incompetency, See Insanity, incapacity, or incompetency Pontifical Council for Pastoral Assistance to Health Care Workers, 487-488
religious novitiate, as factor in admission to, 642 separation from institute, as reason for, 689
retirement, See Retirement Hearings
administrative procedure, appeal or recourse from, 1837 complaint of nullity against the sentence, 1624 marriage nullity procedure, ordering new hearing for appeal or recourse from, 1682 oral contentious process, See Oral contentious process witnesses and witness testimony, rehearings for, 1570
Hearsay
witnesses and witness testimony, 1572
Henry VIII (King of England), 1387
Heresy, apostasy, and schism
Catholic Church, ascribed only to persons baptized into, 751 context for, 751
defined, 751
full communion, bonds indicating, 205 funerals, deprivation of, 1184
ordination, irregularities for reception of, 1041
penalty for, 1364
Heretical views
imputability, 1330
Hermits
consecrated life, institutes of, 603
defined, 603
People of God, as part of, 207
Hierarchic recourse, 1737; 1826
defined, 1826
discretionary authority of hierarchic superior, 1739
suspension of decree via, 1737 time period for proposing, 1737
Hierarchical constitution of Church, 423-429
Apostolic See, See Apostolic See centralized function of papacy, 425-426 college of bishops, See College of bishops collegiality of pope and bishops, 330; 333; 334; 423-429 ecumenical councils, See Ecumenical councils immediacy of papal power, 428

juridical relationship between pope and bishops, 330; 333; 334; 423-429
metropolitans, See Metropolitans particular churches, See Particular churches personal prelatures not part of, 394-395
Peter-apostles/pope-bishops analogy, 330; 424 primacy of papacy, 331; 425-426; 429 synod of bishops, See Synods of bishops unifying function of papacy, 425-426
Hierarchs, assemblies of
Eastern code, 34
Hierarchy of truths, 205
Higher education, institutes of Catholic universities, See Universities and colleges, Catholic ecclesiastical universities and faculties, See Ecclesiastical universities and faculties Hippolytus
Apostolic Tradition on sacrament of confirmation, 1066 Historical background, See under specific topics Holidays
feast days and holy days, See Sacred times
trials, 1467
Holy days of obligation, 1246
Holy Office, See Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (CDF) Holy oils, See Oils
Holy orders, See Orders, sacrament of Holy See, See Apostolic See Homicide, 1397
feticide, 1398
marriage, homicide of spouse as impediment to, 1090 ordination, irregularities for reception of, 1041
Homily
formation of clerics, 256
preaching of, 767
Hostiensis, Henry de Susa (Cardinal), 1818 Hours, See Liturgy of the hours Huizing, Peter, 5
Human life, integrity, and freedom
delicts and penalties, 1397; 1398
Hungarian church
Byzantine rite, observing, 1
Eastern code, under "other churches" category of, 32-33

ICEL (International Commission on English in the Liturgy)
divine worship other than sacraments, 1400
If, unless, or provided that (si, nisi, or dummodo)
singular administrative acts, 39
Ignorance of law, 15
imputability of, See Imputability
juridic acts, 126
Illegitimacy, See Legitimacy or illegitimacy of children Illness
clerics, support for, 281
vicars forane, duties regarding, 555
Immediacy of power
Apostolic See, 428
diocesan bishops, 381
Immensa aeterni Dei
Roman Curia, Sixtus V's systematization of, 476 Immigrants
instruction of pastoral care of, 451 Immunity
pontiff, 1404
Impeded Apostolic See, 335
Impeded diocesan sees, 546
Apostolic See, notification of, 412; 413; 415 cessation of impediment, 412
coadjutor and auxiliary bishops, 413
college of consultors, role of, 413
defined, 412
diocesan synods, effect on, 468
interim leader
college of consultors, chosen by, 413 line of succession for, 413 list of candidates for, 413 powers, rights, and obligations of, 414 status of, 414
letter, ability of bishop to communicate with diocese by, 412 metropolitan list of candidates for interim leader, communication of, 413
penalties leading to impediment, recourse to Apostolic See in cases of, 415 parochial appointments during impediment, 525 penalties incurred by diocesan bishop, impediment as result of, 414 priests as interim leaders of, 413 reasons for impediment, 412 suffragan's duty to inform Apostolic See in cases of penalties leading to impediment, 415 vicars general and episcopal vicars as interim leaders of, 413 Impeded vicars general and episcopal vicars temporary replacement of, 477
Impediments to marriage, 1057
adoptive relationship, 1094
affinity, 1092
age restrictions, 1083
authority to establish, 1075
certificate of valid and licit celebration, 1066
chastity, perpetual vows of, 1088
civil law, impediments to marriage under, 1071 classification of, 1273
conjugicide, 1090
consanguinity, 1078; 1091
convalidation in cases of, See Convalidation of marriage crime as, 1090
criminal actions
homicide of spouse, 1090
kidnapping, 1089
custom, effect of, 1076
death, danger of, 1068
diriment impediments, 1073; 1083-1094; 1156; 1272; 1378
disparity of worship between partners, 1086; 1129
dispensations from, See Marriage, subhead dispensations
Eastern code, 1272
historical background, 1272-1273
homicide of spouse, 1090
impedient impediments, 1073
impotence, 1084; 1301
investigation of freedom to marry, 1067 notification of results as to investigation of, 1070 obligation to reveal, 1069 occult, 1074; 1082; 1158
ordination as, 1087
particular marriage, prohibition of, 1077
previous marriage obligations arising from, 1071
valid prior marriage as impediment to further marriage, 1085 public impediments, 1074; 1158 public propriety, considerations of, 1093 right to marry in absence of, 1058 spiritual relationships, persons with, 1295-1296
Impediments to ordination, See Ordination, subhead irregularities and impediments Imposed penalties, See Ferendae sententiae Impotence
marital impediment, as, 1084; 1301 Imputability, 1311; 1321
abortion, 1398
age as factor in
sixteen years, minors at or over, 1324
sixteen years, minors under, 1323
aggravating factors
indeterminate circumstances, restraint to be exercised in, 1349
infra-universal law, 1327
penal remedies and penances used to deal with, 1556
universal law, 1326
alienation of church property, unlawful, 1377
attempted delicts, 1328; 1330
authority, abuse of, 1326
collaboration or conspiracy, 1329
continuing violation following declaration of penalty, 1326
declarations of mind or intent, 1330
defined, 1321

deliberate violations, 1321 diminishing factors, 1324
penal remedies and penances used to deal with, 1556 waiver of penalty in cases of, 1345 discretion of judge as to diminishment of, 1324 error equivalent to ignorance, 1323; 1324 exemptions from
infra-universal law, 1327
universal law, 1323
extraordinary circumstances for which no explicit canon exists, 1399
fear, actions due to
diminishment of imputability, 1324
exemptions, 1323
foreseeable events, failure to avoid, 1326
heretical views, 1330
ignorance, commission of delict in alienation of church property, unlawful, 1377 diminishment of imputability due to, 1324 exemption for, 1323
extraordinary circumstances for which no explicit canon exists, 1399 non-mitigating circumstances, 1325
inadvertence, commission of delict by, 1323
indeterminate circumstances, restraint to be exercised in, 1349
infra-universal law, 1327
insanity or incompetency, 1322; 1323
intent or dolus, 1321 malice, by reason of, 1321 marital nullity, similarity to, 1322 married clerics and religious, partners of, 1394 minors
over sixteen years of age, 1324
under sixteen years of age, 1323
mitigating factors
infra-universal law, 1327
universal law, 1324
necessity or grave inconvenience, actions due to diminishment of imputability, 1324
exemptions, 1323
negligence or culpa, 1321
non-mitigating factors, 1325 omission, violation by, 1321 passion, crimes of, See Passion, crimes of penal remedies and penances used to deal with aggravated or diminished imputability, 1556 physical force or coercion, delict due to, 1323 presumption of imputability in cases of external violation, 1321
profanation of sacred objects, 1376
provocation, extreme, 1324 reason, persons lacking use of culpable disturbance of use of, 1324 imperfect use of reason, 1324
insanity or incompetency, 1322
non-mitigating factors, 1325
passion, crimes of, See Passion, crimes of temporary loss of reason, 1323
sacred objects, profanation of, 1376
self-defense, actions in, See Self-defense sexual sins of clerics and religious, 1395
substance abuse and, See Substance abuse unforeseeable occurrences, 1323
universal law
aggravating factors, 1326
exemptions from, 1323
infra-universal law, 1327
mitigating factors, 1324
what constitutes, 1321
"In favor of the faith" marriage dissolutions, 1150; 1372-1373
In partibus infidelium
bishops, 376
In solidum parishes entrusted to several priests in solidum, See Pastors Incapacity, See Insanity, incapacity, or incompetency
Incardination of clerics, 329-330
1917 Code, 269; 329
apostolic life, societies of, 736; 738 authority to grant incardination or excardination, 272 automatic, 268
defined, 329
denial of, 270
diaconate, original incardination through reception of, 266 documentation requirements, 267; 269
excardination
confessional faculty, loss of, 975
procedures for excardination, 267; 269; 270
religious institute, departure from, 693
historical background, 329
just cause requirement, 270 necessity of incardination, 265 necessity or usefulness as reason for allowing incardination, 269 presbyteral councils of particular churches, membership of, 498 probationary period prior to, 269
reasons for, 265; 269; 270
religious, 266; 693
remuneration and, 281
requirements regarding, 265; 270
secular institutes, clerical members of, 715
secular institutes or societies of apostolic life, 266
suitability required for, 269 support, availability of, 269 temporary service, for, 271 testimony of intent to serve, 269 transfer, following automatic incardination following, 268
excardination, 267; 269; 270
requirements for allowing incardination, 269 unattached clerics, problems related to, 265
Vatican Council II, 329
Incarnational principle, 140
Incidental cases, 1587
absent petitioners, 1594; 1595 absent respondents, See Respondents
admissibility, 1589
appeal of interlocutory sentences without force of definitive sentence, 1629 appeal rights, incidental question regarding, 1621 correction of decree or interlocutory sentence regarding, 1591 correction of sentence, 1616
defined, 1587
definitive force of interlocutory sentences, 1618 Eastern code, 1700, n.142 expenses occasioned by absent respondents or petitioners, 1595
oral contentious process, use of, 1590
oral proposal of, 1588 ordinary contentious process, use of, 1590 pronouncement and sentencing, 1607; 1613; 1618
proposal of, 1588
rejection of, 1589
rendering of accounts prior to execution of sentence, 1652 resolution before or after principal case, 1589 revocation of decree or interlocutory sentence regarding, 1591 time period on decision regarding, 1589 written proposal of, 1588
Incompetency or competency, See Competency or incompetency Inculturation
missionary activities, 787
Incurred penalties, See Latae sententiae
Independent norms, 48
Indeterminate penalties, See Facultative penalties
Index of prohibited books
Vatican Council II's abandonment of, 977 Indiscriminate sacramental sharing (communicatio in sacris)
penalty for, 1365
Indulgences, 992; 1172-1174
1917 Code, 1172
Apostolic Penitentiary's judgment on concession and use of, 1173
Apostolic See, 995
authority to grant, 995
baptism, 996
books and written publications on, 997 dead, application to, 994
defined, 992
Eastern code on granting of, 995
Enchiridion indulgentiarum, 997; 1172 gaining, 994; 996

grace, state of, 996
intentions regarding, 996
local and real indulgences, suppression of, 1172 objects, indulgences attached to, 1172 partial indulgences
defined, 992
new measure of, 1172
places, indulgences attached to, 1172 plenary indulgences
defined, 992
limitation of, reasons for, 1172 toties quoties plenary indulgences, suppression of, 1172-1173 prayers, attached to, 997 real and local indulgences, suppression of, 1172 self, application to, 994 simplification of canons on, 1172-1173 special laws on, 997
theology of, 992
toties quoties plenary indulgences, suppression of, 1172-1173
Vatican Council II, 1172
Indulgentiarum doctrina, 1172
Indults, 35; 93
Infallibility, 21-22
bishops in ecumenical council, 749 manifest evidence of, need for, 749 narrow circumscription of, 749 papal, 749
Infants
baptism of, See Baptism
funerals in church for non-baptized infants, 1183
seven years of age, defined as children younger than, 97
Infra-universal authority, See Local ordinaries
Infra-universal law
imputability, 1327
Ingravescentem aetatem
age restrictions for cardinals, 354
Initiation, sacraments of, 842; 851; 866, See also Baptism; Confirmation; Eucharist interrelationship between initiatory sacraments, 1066; 1068-1069
Injunctions, 1496; 1498
Innocent I (Pope)
confirmation, letter on, 1067
Innocent III (Pope), 1401
confirmation, 880
marriage, consent to, 1095
Insanity, incapacity, or incompetency binding force of ecclesiastical laws and, 11
clerics, support for, 281
impeded diocesan sees, 412
imputability, lack of, 1322; 1323 juridic personality and, 99 marriage, incapacity to consent to, 1095
non sui compos, 99
ordination, irregularities for reception of, 1041; 1044
papal, 332
religious, 689
removal of pastors, 1741
trials
plantiffs and defendants, 1478 tribunals, trials, and judges, competency or incompetency of, See Trials, subhead competency or incompetency vows, capacity to make, 1191
witnesses and witness testimony, 1550
Inspections by judges at trial, 1582; 1583
Installed ministries
lay people, 230
Institute for Missionary Catechesis
Pontifical University Urbaniana, Rome, 785
Institutes consecrated life, of, See Consecrated life, institutes of
religious, See Religious secular, See Secular institutes Instruction on the Ecclesial Vocation of the Theologian, 205
Instructions, 34; 97
Instructors, See Teachers Intent or dolus
imputability, determining, 1321
Intention, application of Mass for, See Application of Mass Inter mirifica
media communications, 822
Inter vivos gifts to Church, 1299
Interdict
appeal or recourse against Roman Pontiff, 1372 disobedience, incitement or provocation of, 1373
effects of, 1332
false denunciators of solicitation of sexual sins in confession, 1390
membership in forbidden societies, 1374
personal and local, 1332
remission of penalties, 1357
sacraments, reception of, 1357
simony, sacraments received through, 1380
simulation of sacraments, 1378
Interlocutory issues, See Incidental cases
Internal forum
Apostolic Penitentiary addressing matters of, 486
convalidation of marriage
defects of consent, provable/public and unproven/occult, 1159
impediments public/provable or unprovable/occult, 1158
ecclesiastical governance, 130
remission of penalties, 1357; 1566-1567
rescripts, use of, 74
International Commission on English in the Liturgy (ICEL)
De benedictionibus, adaptation of, 1400
International relations, 3, See also Civil authorities International shrines, 1231
International Theological Commission marriage as sacrament, 1248-1249 Internet, See Media communications Interpretation
canon law, 16
administrative interpretation, 16
Anglo-American law, 16
broad interpretation, 18
clerics' rights and obligations to be interpreted in light of Vatican Council II, 344 Commission for the Authentic Interpretation of the Code, 830
custom, 27
declarative interpretations, 16
Eastern code, 20
equity, 18
evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty, and obedience, authority of Church to interpret and direct practice of, 576
exceptions, 18
explanatory interpretations, 16 extensive interpretations, 16; 36 general principles, equitable application of, 18 judicial interpretation, 16
lacunae, laws containing, 18
legislative power, as, 16
penal law, 18; 1313
penalties, 18
Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts (PCILT), 16; 402; 488 restrictive interpretations, 16
Roman Curia, jurisprudence and practice of, 18 rules for, 17; 20
similar matters, consideration of laws issued in, 18
strict interpretation, 18
dispensations, 92
executive power, ordinary and delegated, 138
judicial, 16
privileges, 77
singular administrative acts, 36
strict interpretation
canon law, 18
dispensations, 92
oaths, 1204
Interpreters
knowledge of sins confessed, use of, 983; 984 marital consent through, 1106
trials, 1471
use of, in confession, 990
Interreligious dialogue, See Ecumenical involvement Intervention by third parties in trials, 1705 interested third parties, 1596
necessary third parties, 1597
petition or libellus, 1596

stage or grade of trial at which intervention is admitted, 1596 Intinction reception of Eucharist by, 924
Invalidating laws, 10; 14; 15
Inventories
temporal goods of Church, 1283 Investigations
freedom to marry, 1067
Pauline privilege, See Pauline privilege, subhead interrogation of unbaptized spouse penal process, See Penal process, subhead preliminary investigation visits by judges at trial, 1582; 1583
Irregularities and impediments to ordination, See Ordination, subhead irregularities and impediments Irrevocable (perpetual) penalties
indeterminate circumstances, restraint to be exercised in, 1349 judicial procedure used only for, 1532
restraint in threatening, 1319
Italian School theory of canon law, 4
Italo-Albanian church
Byzantine rite, observing, 1
Eastern code, under "other churches" category of, 32-33
Ius, 47-48

Janson, Forbin (Bishop), 791
Jaricot, Pauline, 791
Jerome (Saint), 1360
John Paul II (Pope)
1983 Code, promulgation of, 11; 12
ad limina visits, 400
Ad tuendam fidem, issuance of, 20; 1371
associations, criteria of ecclesiality to be found in, 400 canon law, reasons for existence of, 209 canonization, apostolic constitution on, 1403 cardinals, tendency to seek counsel of, 464 clerical and religious dress, 284
clerics' rights and obligations to be interpreted in light of Vatican Council II, 344 Collaboration of the Non-ordained approved in forma specifica by, 17
conferences of bishops, 22 Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples, reorganization of, 782
consecrated life, institutes of, 742-743 cooperation between churches, 782 definitive teachings, canon on, 750
Eastern code, comments on, 27
ecumenism, references to, 16
encyclical letters, influence of, 25
Ex corde Ecclesiae, promulgation of, 14; 807; 961 exemption of acts from publication, 1709
formation of clerics, 232; 233
hierarchical authority as service, 212
lay people, role of, 291
marriage, 1248
ability to fulfill obligations of, 1095 treatment of marriage cases, 1761 military ordinariate, 368
missionary activities, comments on, 781 munera or threefold functions of Jesus, participation of all People of God in, 207; 208; 254 ordaining bishop, intention of, 1024 parishes, importance of, 673
particular churches, 501 remuneration of clerics, 281
rights and duties, interrelationship of, 1820
Roman Curia
changes to, 477
reform of, 12
Sapientia christiana, promulgation of, 812; 972 schools, support for, 800
secular institutes, 713; 878
sexual abuse of minors, 1840
temporary service of clerics, 271
The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church, praise for, 25 translation of theological insights into canonical norms as task of canon law, 184 unlawful conferral of episcopal ordination by Archbishop Lefebvre, 205
John XXIII (Pope)
cardinals
bishops, required to be, 351; 466 creation of, 351
maximum number of, 350
catechumenate, 788
Eastern code, reference to, 28
Vatican Council II
opening words of, 26
positive nature of, 12
Johnson, John, 1744
Joinder of the issue, 1513
challenges to, 1513; 1514 changing, 1513; 1514
defined, 1513
marriage nullity cases, 1677
notification of, 1513
oral contentious process, 1661
possession of property, effect on, 1515 proof-gathering prior to, prohibition of, 1529 proofs, commencement of time period for gathering, 1516
purpose of, 1513
Judaism
marriage and, 1234-1236 Judge instructors (auditors)
tribunals, 1428
witnesses, questioning, 1561
Judges, 1623
abuse of office, penalties for, 1457 advocates and procurators, expulsion of, 1487 amendment of sentence by, 1626 assistants or assessors for single judges, 1424 clerics as diocesan judges, 1421 college, plural judges acting as, 1425; 1426
competency or incompetency, See Trials complaint of nullity against the sentence, hearing, 1624 decisions, See Trials, subhead pronouncement and sentencing
diocesan bishops
execution of sentence by, 1653
exercising power through judges, 391
judges, as, 1419
diocesan judges, 1421; 1422
expert witnesses, 1575; 1577
gifts, duty not to accept, 1456 inspections by, 1582; 1583
judicial vicars, See Judicial vicars lay persons as diocesan judges, 1421
marriage nullity cases
documentary process, 1782
duties regarding, 1676; 1677
moral certitude in pronouncement and sentencing, 1608; 1783-1784 oath, duty to take, 1454
oaths excused by, 1532 objections against acceptance of, 1450
acts placed by judge prior to, validity of, 1451 decisions regarding, 1451 grounds for lodging, 1449
officialis, See Judicial vicars
penal process
decree of ordinary, consultation regarding, 1718
preliminary investigator not allowed to be judge in subsequent judicial process, 1717
penalties for abuse of office, 1457
plural judges acting as a college, 1425; 1426
Pontiff as supreme judge, 1442
pronouncements, See Trials, subhead pronouncement and sentencing questioning of parties by, 1530
regional, 1423
religious tribunals, 1427; 1651
restitutio in integrum issues, adjudication of, 1646 retraction of sentence by, 1626 rights and duties, See Tribunals, subhead rights and duties of judges and ministers of Roman tribunal, effect of petitioning, 1417 same case, duty to avoid serving in another instance on, 1447 secrecy, duty to maintain, 1455
sentencing by, See Trials, subhead pronouncement and sentencing settlement, duty to urge, 1446
single judges, 1424
oral contentious process before, 1657
pronouncement and sentencing by, 1610 territory, outside, 1469

time limits of trial defined by, 1466
time of appointment, 1422
visits by, 1582; 1583
withdrawal, 1448
Judgments at trial, See Trials, subhead pronouncement and sentencing Judicial confessions, See Confessions Judicial decrees, 1617; 1618
Judicial expenses
abated trials, 1523
absent petitioners or respondents, occasioned by, 1595
appeal or recourse, 1649
damages, 1649
deposits, 1649
fees, setting, 1649
judicial, 1464
legal aid, provision of, 1649 parties required to pay, 1649 renounced trials, 1525
witnesses, 1571; 1580
Judicial interpretation, 16
Judicial powers
defined, 135
diocesan bishops, 518
Roman Curia, 480
Judicial procedure, 1609-1614
1917 Code, 1612-1613; 1754
1983 Code, 1612
alternative dispute resolution, 1713-1716
Apostolic See, role of, See Forum, subhead extraordinary or singular forum appeals courts, 1640 arbitration, use of, 1713-1716 biblical precedent, 1609 civil law, deference to, 1803 Constantine, in time of, 1611
contentious trials, See Trials Decretals of Gregory IX, 1611-1612 definitions pertinent to, 1613
dismissal from clerical state, 1317
dispute resolution, alternative means of, 1713-1716 documentary process for declaring nullity of marriage, 1782-1783 Eastern code, See Eastern code Eusebius, described by, 1610 extraordinary procedures, 1498
Gregory IX, Decretals of, 1611-1612 hearings, See Hearings
historical background, 1609-1612; 1803-1804
incidental cases, See Incidental cases
injunctions, 1496; 1498
interlocutory issues, See Incidental cases irrevocable penalties, 1532
marriage nullity, See Marriage nullity notaries taking part in, 1437 oral contentious process, See Oral contentious process
pastors
removal of, See Removal of pastors transfer of, See Transfer of pastors penal process, See Penal process penal trials, See Penal trials penalties, imposing, 1314; 1342; 1532
presumed death of spouse, 1707; 1798 presumptions, See Presumptions promoters of justice, See Promoters of justice
proofs, See Proofs
separation of spouses, See Separation of spouses sequestration, See Sequestration
special processes, 1760
spouse, presumed death of, 1707; 1798 Tertullian's Apology and Didascalia, described in, 1609-1610 theology and, 1803-1804
trials, See Trials
Vatican City State, Code of Civil Procedure for, 1754 Judicial vicars, 1420
adjutants, 1420
appointment, 1420
collegiate tribunals, 1425; 1426
diocesan bishops appointment of vicars by, 1420 exercising power through, 391 marriage nullity cases, approval of tribunal for, 1673 priestly status, 1420
time of appointment, 1422
vacant diocesan sees, 1420
Julius III (Pope), 1387
Juridic acts, 177-178
1917 Code, 124; 177
1983 Code, 124; 177
coercion, 125
collegial juridic acts, 127; 180 consent or counsel regarding, 127 damage inflicted by, repair of, 128 deficient acts, 179
erroneous, 126
fear, placed out of, 125 force, placed out of, 125
ignorance of law, 126
presumptions, 124
resignation as, 187
types of, 177
validity, 124
Juridic effects
baptism, 96; 849
confirmation, 894
diocesan curias, documents of, 473
ecclesiastical offices
promise of office, no juridic effect to, 153
supplying for another, no authority conferred by, 155
marriage, 1057
religious raised to episcopate, 705
residence and domicile, 107
secular institutes
perpetual versus definitive incorporation, 723
separation from institute, 728
Juridic elements
consecrated life, statutes of institutes of, 587
religious, 607
Juridic personality, 113; 154
acquired rights and privileges, 4 aggregates of persons or things, as, 115
apostolic life, societies of, 741; 893
apostolic works of public juridic persons, 172-173
associations
lay associations, 420-421
private associations, See subhead private associations
public associations, 313; 420-421
U.S. church-related institutions, 172-176 authority to create, 114
baptism and conferring of juridic personality, 96; 849
standing to bring an action at trial, 1476
cemeteries, 1241
cleric's loss of juridical status, 382 college of cardinals as, 352
collegiality between bishops and pope, 330; 333; 334; 423-429
conferences of bishops, 449
consolidation of juridic persons, 121
creation of, 114
custom, community introducing, 25
de facto Catholic institutions, 174-176 debts and obligations as to temporal goods, responsibility for, 639
defined, 113
diocesan bishop as juridic representative of diocese, 393
division of juridic persons, 122
ecclesiastical provinces, 432
ecclesiastical regions, 433
extinction of juridic persons, 123
lay associations, 420-421
majority, persons reaching age of, 98
minor children, 97
parishes, 374; 515
particular churches, 373
perpetuity by nature, 120
private associations, 174
lack of juridic personality, 299; 310; 325 obtaining a juridic personality, 322
temporal goods, administration of, 325
private juridic persons, See Private juridic persons public associations, 313; 420-421
public juridic persons, See Public juridic persons religious institutes, provinces, houses, 634 schools' juridic relationship to competent ecclesiastical authority, 803
secular institutes, 718
seminaries as, 238
standing to bring an action at trial, 1476
statutes, 117
statutes and, 94

temporal goods of Church, See Temporal goods of Church temporary residents, 100
termination of, 120
theology of, 154
trials, 1400; 1476; 1480
universitates personarum, 115; 158
universitates rerum, 115; 158
U.S. church-related institutions, canonical status of, 172-176
Juridic powers
conferences of bishops, 455
Juridic representation
pastor as juridic representative of parish, 532; 543
several priests in solidum, parishes entrusted to, 543
Juridical status of Eastern and Latin churches, 32
Jurisdiction
Apostolic See, powers of, 331
cardinals and college of cardinals, 357 clerics, reserved to, 274
diocesan bishops, 183-184
ecclesiastical governance and, 183
executive power, 136; 144
judges outside own territory, 1469
lay participation in ecclesiastical governance, 274
lay people's ability to exercise, 228
marriage, 1238; 1247
ordination, 1017
seminaries exempt from parochial authority, 262
Jurisprudence, 18
Justinian (Emperor), 230; 1095

Kidnapping
marriage, for purposes of, 1089
Krizevci church
Eastern code, under "other churches" category of, 33

Labor organizations
clerics' membership in, 278; 285; 287
deacons' membership in, 278; 288 religious' membership in, 672
Lactantius
forced conversions, comments on, 787
Lacunae, laws containing, 18
Laghi, Pio (Cardinal), 962
Laicization, See also Loss of clerical state rescript of Apostolic See, loss of clerical state via, 290 Laity, See Lay people Lamentabili
decrees and constitutions, teaching by, 754
Lamps
reserved Eucharist, lamp burned before, 940
Language instruction
formation of clerics, 249
Languages
Eucharist, celebration of, 928
Lara, Castillo (Archbishop), 517
Latae sententiae
abortion, 1398
accomplice, absolution of, 1378
apostasy, 1364
canon penitentiary, 508
changes to law and imposition of, 1313 chaplains' ability to absolve, 566
collaboration or conspiracy, 1329
commission of delict, imposed by, 1314; 1533 consecrated species, violations of, 1367
declared
excommunication, 1331
last resort, as, 1341
remission of penalties
confessor's power to remit, 1357
law, penalties established by, 1355
obligatory penalties, 1356
diminishment of imputability, 1324
Eastern code omission of, 221
excommunication, 1331
expiatory penalties, 1336
express statement of, 1314 ferendae sententiae, delicts not punishable effectively by, 1318
heresy, 1364
limitations on, 1531
married clerics and religious, 1394
mitigating factors, 1324
multiple delicts, 1346
obligatory or determinate nature of, 1315
occult delicts, 1314
ordinations, illicit, 1383 physical violence against pope, bishops, clerics, or religious, 1370 rareness of, 1531; 1533
remission of penalties
confessor's power to remit, 1357
declared latae sententiae
confessor's power to remit, 1357
law, penalties established by, 1355
obligatory penalties, 1356
law, penalties established by, 1355
obligatory penalties, 1356
reservation of power to remit to Apostolic See, 1354
undeclared latae sententiae
confessors, power of, 1357
law, penalties established by, 1355
obligatory penalties, 1356
reservation of power to remit to Apostolic See, 1354
restraint in threatening and imposing, 1311; 1318; 1319
schism, 1364
seal of confession, violation of, 1388
seriousness of, 1531; 1533
simulation of sacraments, 1378
solicitation of sexual sins in confession, false denunciators of, 1387; 1390 suspensions, 1333; 1334; 1335; 1338; 1352
undeclared
abortion, 1398
excommunications involving, 1331
remission of penalties
confessors, power of, 1357
law, penalties established by, 1355
obligatory penalties, 1356
reputation, preservation of, 220; 1335; 1338; 1352 suspension of penalty or prohibition, 1335; 1338; 1352 warning provided by law itself, 1347; 1549
Lateran Councils
Fourth Lateran Council
consanguinity as marriage impediment, 1078; 1091
preaching role of religious, 758
Second Lateran Council, marriage and sacred orders discussed at, 1087
Latin Eucharist, celebration of, 928
formation of clerics, 249
Latin church
code applicable only to, 1 Law
canon law, See Canon law civil law, See Civil authority concept of, 47-48
liturgical law, See Liturgical law natural law exempt from prescription, 199 universal law, See Universal law Law, Bernard (Cardinal), 291
Lay people
1917 Code, treatment by, 291
1983 Code, expanded treatment by, 291 absence of ministers, exercise of ministry by lay people in cases of, 230
acolytes, as, 230
associations, See Associations
auditors (judge instructors) of tribunals, 1428 blessings, ministering, 1403
chaplains of lay religious institutes, 567
civil liberties, possession of, 227 clerics' duty to acknowledge and promote mission of, 275 Collaboration of the Non-ordained, 17-19; 292
consecrated life, institutes of, See Consecrated life, institutes of defenders of the bond, 1435
defined, 225
diocesan judges, as, 1421
diocesan synods, as members of, 463
divine word, role in ministry of, 759
Eastern code, 35; 759
ecclesiastical governance and, 129; 274
ecclesiastical offices, right to hold, 228; 274 ecclesiastical universities and faculties, right to take classes at, 229
Eucharist, See Eucharist evangelization, right of, 225 experts and advisors, as, 228

extraordinary ministries, 230
family life, rights and obligations of lay people regarding, 226 installed ministries, 230 jurisdiction, ability to exercise, 228
lectors, as, 230
liturgical function of, 835
liturgical functions performed by, 230; 274
marriage
delegated as authorized witness to, 1112
judges of marital cases, as, 274
minor children, See Minor children
missionary activities, 784 obligations and rights of, See Rights and obligations of Christian faithful opinions, right of and forums for Christian faithful to express, 212 parents, See Parents and parental surrogates
particular councils, participants in, 443
pastoral care of parish, role in, 517
pastoral councils, members of, 512
pastors
duties of pastor regarding lay people, 529 exercise of pastoral role by, 517 suitability of pastors, solicitation of views on, 524
People of God, as, 207
personal prelatures, involvement in, 296 preaching by, 274; 766
promoters of justice, 1435 religious institutes, See Religious rights and obligations of, See Rights and obligations of Christian faithful
secular institutes
apostolate, 713
lay status not affected by consecration into, 711 service to Church, formation and remuneration for, 230; 231 social order, duty to perfect, 225
theologians, as, 228
Vatican Council II Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity, 17; 812
Leasing
temporal goods of Church, 1297; 1298
Lectors
deacons required to receive ministry of, 1035
lay people as, 230
LEF (Lex Ecclesiae Fundamentalis), 426
Lefebvre, Marcel (Archbishop), 204; 1382
Legal custom, 23; 86-87
Legal positivism
canon law theory, 4
Legality
concept of, 47-48
Legates, papal, See Papal legates Leges inhabilitantes, 10
Leges irritantes, 10
Legislative powers, 135
conferences of bishops, 455
defined, 135
diocesan bishops, 518
diocesan synods, 466
interpretation of law, 16
penal law, establishment of, 1315
Roman Curia, 480
Legitimacy or illegitimacy of children baptismal recording of parental names for infants born to unwed mothers, 877 canonical effects of, 1140 fatherhood, presumptions regarding, 1138 marriage, effects of, 1137
pregnancy out of wedlock, marriage due to, 1320
presumptions, 1138
rescript, legitimation by, 1139
Leibrecht, John J. (Bishop), 961
Lent, 1250
Leo IV (Emperor)
marriage celebrations, uniformity of, 1326
Leo XIII (Pope)
bishops in partibus infidelium changed to titular bishops, 376 books, prohibition and censure of, 828 invalidity of Anglican ordinations, 22
marriage, 1238
missionary territories, relationship between religious and diocesan bishops in, 790
Lex, 47-48
Lex Ecclesiae Fundamentalis (LEF), 426 Liability, See Imputability
Libellus, See Petition or libellus
Liberative prescription, 230 Liège, Alger of
dispensations, 126
Liguori, Alphonsus (Saint), 1247; 1305; 1343
Lipscomb, Oscar (Archbishop), 212
Litis finitae, 1462
Liturgical books, 2; 1002-1003 authority to prepare and publish, 838 conferences of bishops, authority of, 838
consecrated life, institutes of, 587
divine worship other than sacraments, 1400 enumeration of, 1002-1003
marriage, 1119
publication of, 826
revisions of, 1400
translations, 838
use in celebration of sacraments, 846 vernacular versions, 838
Liturgical law, 2; 997-1005 code of canon law, relationship to, 1003-1004
nature of, 1000-1002
observance in celebration of sacraments, 846 Liturgical norms, 2
Liturgical rites, See Rites
Liturgy, celebration of, 834; 997-1005
1917 Code, 999
absence of ministers, exercise of ministry by lay people in cases of, 230
anointing of the sick, 999-1002; 1182 Apostolic See, authority of, 838
authority over, 838
baptism, 850-860; 1037
bishops as liturgical ministers, 835 common celebration, entailing, 837
common priesthood of Christian faithful, 836 confirmation, See Confirmation, subhead form of celebration of deacons as liturgical ministers, 835 definition of liturgy, 834
diocesan administrators, 429
diocesan bishops, 388; 838
direction of, 838
Eastern code, 838; 998-999
Eucharist, See Eucharist faith, enlightenment and arousal of, 836 formation of clerics as to, 256
free entry for, 1220
funeral Mass, denial of, 1185 lay people, liturgical function of, 835 marriage, 1119; 1120; 1325, See also Marriage, subhead form of celebration of
metropolitans, 436
ministries and offices, liturgical, 835
Office for the Liturgical Celebrations of the Supreme Pontiff, 489 offices and ministries, liturgical, 835 oratories, in, 1225 ordination, See Ordination, subhead form of celebration of pallium, use of, 437
papal legates, 366
parents, liturgical function of, 835 participation as norm of common priesthood of Christian faithful, 836
ministries and offices, liturgical, 835
public, not private, nature of liturgical actions, 837 pastors' parochial role, See Pastors penance, See Penance, subhead form of celebration of priests as liturgical ministers, 835; 836 private chapels, in, 1228
public, not private, nature of liturgical actions, 837
rectors of non-parochial churches, 559; 561; 562
sacred times requiring participation in, 1244; 1442 sequence of canons regarding, 999-1000 unity, sacrament of, 837
Vatican Council II, 999-1000
vicars forane, 555
Liturgy of the hours, 1173; 1406 celebrants of, 1174
clerics required to observe, 276; 1174 deacons' duty to recite, 276 reformed version of, 276 religious, obligations of, 663
revision of, 1400
secular institutes, 719

seminaries, regular celebration in, 246
theology of, 1173
time of celebration of, 1175
Local and real indulgences
suppression of, 1172
Local ordinaries
books and written publications, pre-publication review and judgment of, 824 confessors by office, local ordinaries as, 968 consecrated life, exemption from governance of local ordinary of institutes of, 591
delicts and penalties, 1315; 1532
dismissal from clerical state, inability to legislate, 1317
latae sententiae, restraint in threatening and imposing, 1318 precepts, imposition of, 1319 religious, authority over, 1320 restraint in legislation of, 1317 uniformity in city or region, 1316
diocesan bishops, See Diocesan bishops dismissal from clerical state, inability to legislate, 1317
latae sententiae, restraint in threatening and imposing, 1318
marriage
permission of local ordinary, situations requiring, 1071
preparation for, local ordinary's obligation to provide, 1064
obedience and reverence to pope and local ordinary, cleric's duty of, 273 papal legates' exemption from governance of, 366
parishes
role in, 719, Appendix II vacancy in, communication to local ordinary of, 541 personal prelatures, relationship with, 297 private associations subject to, 325 religious, power to impose penalties on, 1320
temporal goods of Church administration of goods, 1276
executor of pious wills, 1301 modification of pious wills, 1310
Location, See Place or location
Lombard, Peter, 1236; 1360; 1361
Loss of clerical state, 382-383
1917 Code, 382
1983 Code, 382
celibacy, dispensation from, 290; 291
deacons, laicization of, 290 dismissal, See Dismissal from clerical state ecclesiastical governance and office, loss of, 292 ecclesiastical office, resulting in removal from, 194
effects of, 292
forty, priests under the age of, 290 invalidity of ordination, declaration of, 290 juridical versus sacramental status, loss of, 382 laicization (rescript of Apostolic See for grave cause), 290
married clerics and religious celebration of marriage following, manner of, 292
knowledge of condition, restricting, 292 rescript (laicization), loss of clerical state via, 290 methods of, 290
penalty, as, 290
priests, laicization of, 290 removal from ecclesiastical office by law on, 194
rescript of Apostolic See loss of state via petition for (laicization), 290
return to clerical state via, 293 return to clerical state following, 293 sacraments, forbidden to exercise, 292 teaching function, loss of, 292 Loss of ecclesiastical office, 184; 220 age restrictions, due to, 184; 185; 186 authority conferring office, no effect of expiration of, 184 death, by, 184
emeritus titles, 185
notice of loss, 184
privation, See Privation
removal from office, See Removal from ecclesiastical office
resignation, See Resignation time period, lapse of, 184; 186
transfer, by, 184
written requirements, 186
Love
marriage and, 1252-1253 Lumen gentium
baptism, 849
belief, requirements regarding, 750
bishops, 375
catechumens, place of, 206
centralized function of papacy, 425-426
college of bishops, 336; 337
collegiality between bishops and pope, 330; 423; 426-427; 428 common priesthood of faithful and ministerial priesthood, interrelationship of, 207 communio, organic reality of, 333 consecrated life through profession of evangelical counsels, persons living, 207
decrees and constitutions, teaching by, 754
diaconate, restoration of, 236
diocesan bishops
powers of, 381
presbyters, relationship with, 384
sanctifiers, as, 387
dispensations, 127-128
ecclesiastical governance, 183-184
ecclesiastical governance, who may participate in, 274 ecclesiastical powers, source of, 431 ecclesiology of, 204; 242 ecumenical councils, papal control of, 338
ecumenical involvement, 383
equality of all peoples, 208
exercise of papal primacy, 333
Explanatory Note, 330; 337; 423
formation of clerics, 232
full communion, what constitutes, 205
heresy, apostasy, and schism, 750
holy life, obligation of Christian faithful to lead, 210
infallibility, 749
juridical relationship of bishops to pope, 330; 423; 426-427; 428 jurisdictional powers of papacy, 331 liturgical ministries and offices, 835
liturgy, celebration of, 1000
missionary activities, role of pope and bishops in, 782
obedience as obligation of Christian faithful, 212
opinions, right of Christian faithful to express, 212
ordination, 1193
outreach efforts, importance of, 771
parishes, 515; 673
particular churches, 368; 503
pastoral ministry, duty of clerics to fulfill, 276
People of God, 204; 242
personal prelatures not part of hierarchical constitution, 394 Peter-apostles/pope-bishops analogy, 330
preaching
ministerial priority, as, 762 presbyters and deacons, role of, 757
religious, role of, 758
public or political office, clerics prohibited from, 285
secular institutes, 710; 713
sinners in Church, recognition of presence of, 257
teaching function of Church, 747 unifying function of papacy, 425-426

Magisterium
academic freedom and submission to, 218
Eastern code, 36
Maida, Adam (Cardinal), 1835
Major seminaries, 235; 237
personal prelatures, 295
Major superiors
religious, See Religious Majority, age of, 97; 98
Malabar archiepiscopal church Chaldean rite, observing, 1
Eastern code, following, 33
metropolitan structure of, 437
Malankar metropolitan church Antiochene rite, following, 1
Eastern code, following, 33
metropolitan structure of, 437

Malice
imputability by reason of, 1321
juridic acts, repair of damage inflicted by, 128
marriage, fraud or deception in contracting, 1098 oaths extorted via, 1200; 1204
resignation due to, 188
vows made out of, 1191
Mandate to teach theology, 15-16; 229; 253; 812
Manichaeism
marriage, 1235; 1237
Manna, Fr. Paulo, 791
Marian devotions, 1186
clerics' duty to engage in, 276
religious, obligations of, 663
seminaries, 246
Marillac, Louise de (Saint)
Daughters of Charity founded by, 892
Maronite patriarchate
Antiochene rite, observing, 1
Eastern code, 32
Marriage, 1055; 1234-1240
1917 Code
age restrictions, 1083
consanguinity, 1091
conscience, marriage of, 1352
consent, 1239
custom, barring introduction of impediments through, 1076 definition of marriage, lack of, 1055 dispensations during danger of death, 1079 ends of marriage, 1238; 1243-1244; 1315 fear, force, or coercion, 1103 letter, contract of marriage by, 1104 matrimonium in fieri and matrimonium in facto esse, 1240-1241
mixed marriages, 1124; 1125; 1343
place of celebration, 1115
preparation for marriage, lack of emphasis on, 1261 presumption that intent to marry prevails over personal errors, 1099
secret marriages, 1130; 1352
spiritual relationships, persons with, 1295-1296
1983 Code, 1102; 1245; 1315; 1327 abduction for purposes of, 1089 adoptive relationship as impediment, 1094
adultery
separation of spouses, as grounds for, 1152
affinities resulting from, 109 affinity as impediment, 1092
age restrictions, 1083; 1095
Apostolic See, 1075; 1078
assistance at celebration of, See subhead authorized witness Augustine of Hippo (Saint) on, 1235-1236; 1237; 1360; 1361
authority
Church's supreme authority over sacrament of marriage, 1059; 1075
dispensations, 1078
mixed marriages, permission required for, 1124
particular marriage, prohibition of, 1077
situations requiring permission of local ordinary, 1071
authorized witness, 1108
death, danger of, 1116
delegation, authorization by, 1111; 1112
freedom to marry, 1113; 1114
inability to be present or to be approached, 1116 lay persons as, 1112
office, authorization by, 1109 personal ordinaries and pastors, 1110 requirements for, 1113
responsibilities of, 1114
secret marriages, 1131
special duty of pastor regarding performance of marriage, 530
territorial restrictions, 1109
banns, publication of, 1067
baptized persons
disparity of worship as impediment to marriage, 1086 documentation of marriage in baptismal registers of spouses, 1122 doubts about baptism, 1374 doubts regarding baptismal status, 1086
form of celebration of marriage, 1117 marriages between, 1055; 1057; 1247-1249 nullity of marriage between, 1671
Pauline privilege, dissolution of marriage to non-baptized person prior to baptism by, See Pauline privilege spiritual relationships, persons with, 1295-1296 Biblical teachings as to, 1234; 1237 bond of marriage dissolution, See subhead dissolution of marriage bond
nature of, 1055; 1134
separation of spouses with bond remaining, 1151-1155 unity and indissolubility of, 1056 bride, celebration in church of, 1115; 1127
captivity or persecution, separation of non-baptized partners due to, 1149
catechesis for, 1063; 1125
celebrants, See subhead authorized witness censures, persons under, 1071 ceremonial form of, 1057
certificate of valid and licit celebration, 1066
chastity, perpetual vows of, 1088 children and, See Minor children, subhead marriage and churches sui iuris, between members of, 1057; 1127
civil authority
acceptance by Church of, 1059
civil effects of marriage, 1057; 1059; 1672; 1692 Council of Trent and attempts of secular authorities to claim jurisdiction during, 1238; 1247 impediments to marriage under, 1071 nullity cases, civil obligations of parties in, 1689 clandestine marriages, 1237; 1326; 1327; 1352 coercion, entered into due to, 1103 cohabitation not constituting, 1057
collateral consanguinity, 1078; 1091
common life, duty to preserve, 1151
common-law marriage
invalidity of, 1057
secret marriage to legitimate, 1130; 1352 concupiscence, as antidote to, 1236; 1238; 1243-1246 conditional consent, 1102; 1317-1318
conferences of bishops
age restrictions, 1083
investigation of freedom to marry, norms for, 1067 liturgical rites used, 1120
mixed marriages, 1126
confirmation prior to, 1065 conjugal love and community, emphasis on, 1238-1240; 1243-1246
conjugicide, 1090
consanguinity, 1078; 1091
conscience, marriage of, 1352
consent required for, 1057; 1296-1297 abduction as impediment to marriage, 1089 ability to fulfill obligations of marriage, 1095
coercion, 1103
conditional consent, 1102; 1317-1318 continuation of consent, presumptions regarding, 1107 contractual concept, coinciding with, 1296 convalidation in cases of insufficiency, See Convalidation of marriage discretion, presence or lack of, 1095
Eastern code, 1296
ends of marriage, reservations regarding, 1101 error or mistake, See subhead error or mistake
fear, 1103
force, 1103
fraud or deception, 1098 future conditions, marriage subject to, 1102
historical background, 1236-1237; 1296-1297; 1325-1326
ignorance of nature of marriage, 1096
incapacity to give consent, 1095 internal compulsion, freedom from, 1095 interpreter, through, 1106

maturity, lack of, 1095
nullity of marriage, knowledge or opinion regarding, 1100 past conditions, 1102 presence of contracting parties at exchange of consent, 1104 present conditions, 1102
presumptions regarding, 1101; 1107 proxy, marriage by, 1104 radical sanation of invalid marriage due to defects of consent, 1162
reason, use of, 1095
simulated consent, 1101 words or signs, by, 1104 consummation of, See Consummation of marriage continuation of consent, presumptions regarding, 1107 contract, viewed as, 1055; 1237; 1238; 1241-1242; 1247; 1296 convalidation, See Convalidation of marriage covenant, viewed as, 1055 cultural influences on, 1234-1236
custom
common-law marriage, invalidity of, 1057
impediments, 1076
mixed marriage, 1343
deacons as ministers of marriage, 1108; 1111; 1246 deacons entering into marriage, See Deacons death, See Death
defectors from Catholic Church by formal act, 1117
defenders of the bond, 1432
defined, 1055
diaconate, marital status and age of candidates for, 1031
direct affinity, 1092
direct consanguinity, 1078; 1091
diriment impediments, 1073; 1083-1094; 1156; 1272; 1378
disparity of worship between partners, 1086; 1129
dispensations, See Dispensations dissolution of marriage bond, 1359 death, dissolution by, 1141
divorce, See Divorce doubts about dissolution, resolving, 1374
historical background, 1359-1363
"in favor of the faith" dissolutions, 1150; 1372-1373 indissolubility, See subhead indissolubility Middle Ages, during, 1360-1361 non-sacramental marriages dissolved in favor of the faith, 1150; 1372-1373 nullity, See Marriage nullity patristic era, during, 1359-1360
Pauline privilege, See Pauline privilege persecution or captivity, separation of non-baptized partners due to, 1149 ratum et consummatum, indissolubility of marriages that are, 1061; 1141
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions, See Ratum et non consummatum dissolutions separation of spouses, See Separation of spouses
divorce, See Divorce
documentation of, 1121
baptismal registers of spouses, in, 1122; 1123
convalidations, 1123
dispensations, 1081; 1082; 1121
dissolutions other than death, 1123 extraordinary form, marriage celebrated according to, 1121
nullity, 1123; 1685
registers, See subhead registers
secret marriages, 1133
doubts as to validity of, 1060; 1150 duplicate ceremonies, prohibition on, 1127
Eastern code, 37-39
baptized non-Catholics, forms of marriage recognized for, 1057
consent, 1296
dispensations, 1127
extraordinary form, use of, 1116
form of celebration of marriage, 1108; 1326; 1327
impediments, 1272
minister of sacrament, 1246 mixed marriages, dispensations from canonical form for, 1127 permission of local ordinary required, 1071
place of celebration, 1115
spiritual relationships, persons with, 1295-1296
Eastern rite and Latin rite marriages, 1057; 1127
effects of marriage, 1356 bond of marriage, nature of, 1055; 1134 civil effects, 1672
juridic effects, 1057
legitimacy or illegitimacy of children, See Legitimacy or illegitimacy of children mutual obligations arising from marriage, 1135 parental duties arising from marriage, 1136 ends of, 1101; 1238-1240; 1243-1246 engagement, 1062
Enlightenment, Age of, 1238
error or mistake
determining error, 1099
fraud or deception, 1098 identity of person, 1097
law, error of, 1099
presumption that intent to marry prevails over personal or private errors, 1099 quality of person, 1097; 1098
Eucharist
as part of celebration of marriage, 1119 received prior to marriage, 1065
extraordinary form, use of, 1116
faith, privilege of, 1150; 1372-1373
favor of law
faith possessing, 1150
marriage itself possessing, 1060 fear, entered into due to, 1103 force, entered into due to, 1103
form of celebration of, 1108
1983 Code, 1327
assistance at, See subhead authorized witness authorized witness, See subhead authorized witness baptized persons, 1117
bride, celebration in church of, 1115; 1127
canonical form, 1325 conferences of bishops, rites set by, 1120 convalidation of marriage due to defects of canonical form, 1160; 1163; 1378 defectors from Catholic Church by formal act, 1117
duplicate ceremonies, prohibition on, 1127
Eastern code, 1108; 1326; 1327
Eucharist, 1119
extraordinary form, use of, 1116
function and purpose, 1327
historical background, 1325-1327 liturgical form, 1119; 1120; 1325
mixed marriages, 1117; 1127; 1250
non-Catholics, marriages involving, 1117
place of celebration, 1115; 1118; 1127
public character of marriage, ensuring, 1326; 1327 radical sanation of invalid marriage due to defects of forms, 1163
theology of, 1325; 1327
validity, 1108
witnesses generally, 1108, See also subhead authorized witness fraud or deception, 1098
freedom to marry
authorized witness, 1113; 1114
banns, publication of, 1067
certificate of valid and licit celebration, 1066 consent, See subhead consent required for fear, force, or coercion, 1103
investigation of, 1067
notification of results as to investigation of, 1070 previous marital obligations, 1071
secret marriages, 1131
future conditions, marriage subject to, 1102 Germanic cultures and, 1236; 1326; 1360 Gnosticism and, 1234-1235
godparents and, 1295-1296
good of spouses as purpose of, 1243-1246 Greco-Roman culture, 1234-1236; 1326-1327

historical background, 1234-1239
consent required for marriage, 1236-1237; 1325-1326
convalidation of marriage
radical sanations, 1387-1388
simple convalidation, 1380-1381
dissolution of marriage bond, 1359-1363
form of celebration of marriage, 1325-1327
Middle Ages, See subhead Middle Ages
mixed marriages, 1342-1343 homicide of spouse as impediment, 1090
ignorance of nature of marriage, 1096
immediate preparation, 1063 impediments to, See Impediments to marriage
impotence, 1084; 1301
"in favor of the faith" dissolutions, 1150; 1372-1373 indissolubility
death, dissolution by, 1141
dissolutions, See subhead dissolution of marriage bond essential property of marriage, as, 1056 historical development of concept of, 1359-1362
ratum et consummatum, indissolubility of marriages that are, 1061; 1141 interpreter, consent rendered through, 1106 invalidity, See subhead validity Jewish belief and culture, 1234-1236 juridic effects of, 1057
jurisdiction, 1238; 1247 kidnapping for purposes of, 1089
lay people
delegated as authorized witness to marriage, 1112
judges of marital cases, as, 274
legitimacy or illegitimacy of children, See Legitimacy or illegitimacy of children liturgical books, 1119
local ordinaries
permission of local ordinary, situations requiring, 1071
preparation for, local ordinary's obligation to provide, 1064 love, nature of, 1252-1253 malice, fraud or deception for purposes of, 1098 matrimonium in facto esse, 1055 matrimonium in fieri, 1055
maturity, lack of, 1095
Middle Ages, 1055
consummation, view of, 1236-1237
convalidation of marriage
radical sanations, 1387
simple convalidation, 1380
dissolution of marriage bond during, 1360-1361 sacramental quality of marriage first explicitly expressed, 1237
ministers of, 1246
minor children and, See Minor children mixed marriages between non-believers/non-baptized or non-Catholics and Catholics, See Mixed marriages morganatic marriage, 1130
nature of, 1055
non-baptized persons, between authority of Church over marriage, 1059 captivity or persecution, separation due to, 1149
convalidation of marriage, 1379
divorce and remarriage of non-believers, historical views on, 1361
historical background, 1124; 1342-1343 Pauline privilege, dissolution by, See Pauline privilege polygamy, 1148; 1361; 1370
sacramental nature of marriage, 1247-1248
non-believers/non-baptized or non-Catholics and Catholics, between, See Mixed marriages notorious rejecters of Catholic faith, 1071; 1117 novitiate of religious order, impediment to admission to, 643
nullity, See Marriage nullity
ordination, See Ordination
parental duties arising from, 1136 parishes, celebration in, 1115; 1118
particular marriage, prohibition of, 1077
partnership or consortium of whole of life, 1055 pastoral care of, 1063; 1261
pastors
authorized witness, as, See subhead authorized witness role in celebration of, 1108; 1109; 1246 special duty as to marriage, 530 Pauline privilege, See Pauline privilege penance prior to, 1065 permission
mixed marriages, 1124
situations requiring permission of local ordinary, 1071
persecution or captivity, separation of non-baptized partners due to, 1149 personalist view of, 1238-1240
Petrine privilege, See "In favor of the faith" marriage dissolutions place of celebration, 1115; 1118; 1127 polygamy, situations involving, 1148; 1361; 1370 post-marital pastoral care, 1063
Post-Tridentine period, 1238 pregnancy out of wedlock, due to, 1320 preparation for, 1063; 1261 local ordinary's obligation to provide, 1064 remote, proximate, and immediate, 1063 sacraments received prior to marriage, 1065 spiritual preparation, 1065 presence of contracting parties, See subhead proxy, by presumptions
consent, 1101; 1107
consummation, 1061
continuation of consent, 1101; 1107
faith, privilege of, 1150; 1372-1373
favor of law, 1060
ignorance of nature of marriage not presumed after puberty, 1096 intent to marry prevailing over personal errors, 1099 previous marital bonds obligations due to, persons with, 1071
valid prior marriage as impediment to further marriage, 1085 priests, role of, See subhead authorized witness primary versus secondary ends of, 1238-1240; 1243-1246 promise to marry, 1062
Protestants and Protestantism, 1057; 1237; 1326; 1342; 1387 proximate preparation, 1063
proxy, by, 1105
consent issues, 1104
permission of local ordinary, situations requiring, 1071 validity, conditions for, 1105
public character of marriage, ensuring, 1326; 1327 public propriety as impediment, 1093 putative, 1061
quality of person married, error concerning, 1097; 1098 quasi-domicile, 1115; 1340
radical sanations, See Radical sanation of invalid marriage ratum et consummatum, indissolubility of marriages that are, 1061; 1141
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions, See Ratum et non consummatum dissolutions rectors of non-parochial churches, 558
registers, 1121
baptismal registers of spouses, marriage to be noted in, 1122; 1123
convalidations, 1123
dispensations, recording, 1081; 1121
dissolutions other than death, 1123
nullity, 1123; 1685
parochial registers, 535
secret marriages, 1133
relationships or affinities
impediments to marriage, 1092 resulting from marriage, 109 residence and domicile of marriage partners, 104; 1115; 1340 rights and obligations regarding, See Rights and obligations of Christian faithful sacramental quality of, 1055; 1246-1249 contract versus sacrament, 1238

Middle Ages, explicit expression in, 1237 non-believers, 1247-1248
non-sacramental marriages dissolved in favor of the faith, 1150; 1372-1373 Protestant challenges to, 1237 St. Augustine, as proposed by, 1236 sacraments preceding, 1065 secondary versus primary ends of, 1238-1240; 1243-1246 secret, See Secret marriages
secular institutes
associates, married persons as, 725 impediment to admission, marriage as, 721 seminaries not exempt from parochial authority over, 262
separation of spouses, See Separation of spouses sex of persons engaging in, 1057
sexual disorders, 1095 sexual relations, 1084; 1236; 1238-1240; 1243-1246 sexual sins within, 1236 spiritual relationships, persons with, 1295-1296
sterility or sterilization, 1084
support obligations, persons with, 1071
theology of, 1234-1240; 1246-1247; 1325; 1327; 1364
transients, 1071; 1115
Trent, Council of, 1237-1238; 1246; 1247; 1326-1327 unity as essential property of, 1056
validity
authorized witness, See subhead authorized witness certificate of valid and licit celebration, 1066
common-law marriage, 1057
consummation, See Consummation of marriage convalidation for purposes of, See Convalidation of marriage dissolution, doubts about validity of marriage subject to, 1374-1375 doubts as to, 1060; 1150
error or mistake, See subhead error or mistake favor of law, marriage possessing, 1060
form of celebration of marriage, 1108
fraud or deception, 1098
freedom to marry, See subhead freedom to marry impediments to, See Impediments to marriage nullity of marriage, knowledge or opinion regarding, 1100
proxy marriages, 1105
putative marriages, 1061
radical sanations, See Radical sanation of invalid marriage Vatican Council II, 1055; 1063; 1234; 1239-1240
vinculum, 1085
virginity preferred to, 1236 vocation, as, 1063
whole of life, partnership or consortium of, 1055
witnesses
authorized witness, See subhead authorized witness nullity of marriage
credibility, witnesses to, 1679
experts, 1680
right to be present at examinations, 1678
secret marriages, 1131
witnesses of celebration generally, 1108 young persons, 1071; 1072; 1083; 1095
Marriage nullity, 1760-1761 advocates and procurators, rights of, 1678
appeal or recourse
competency of appellate courts acting "as if in first instance," 1673 confirmation of prior sentence by, 1682
conforming judgments, effect of, 1684
documentary process, 1687; 1688
mandatory review of first affirmative decisions, 1682 new ground of nullity introduced at stage of, 1683 new hearing, ordering, 1682 baptized persons, cases involving, 1671
citations, 1677
civil and moral obligations of parties, 1689 civil effects of marriage, competency regarding, 1672
competency or incompetency appellate courts acting "as if in first instance," 1673
civil effects of marriage, 1672 identification of competent ecclesiastical court, 1673 prorogation by Apostolic Signatura, 1673
concordant or conforming judgments, 1684
conforming judgments, effect of, 1684
contentious process, problems with, 1761 death of one or both spouses
pending case, during, 1675
petition for nullity subsequent to, 1675
defenders of the bond, 1432; 1678
documentary process, 1686; 1780
appeal or recourse, 1687; 1688
conditions required for use of, 1686 decision, 1783-1784
formalities omitted, 1686; 1782-1783 judicial procedure used in, 1782-1783 moral certitude requirements, 1783-1784
proofs, 1686; 1781
second instance process, 1688 situations allowing use of, 1686
documentation of, 1123; 1685
human presumptions, 1586
instruction of the case, 1677
joinder of the issue, 1677
judges
documentary process, 1686; 1781
duties of, 1676; 1677
judicial declarations of parties, 1671 judicial vicar of respondent, approval of tribunal by, 1673 knowledge or opinion of partners regarding nullity, effect on consent, 1100 monitum or warning attached to sentence, 1779 moral and civil obligations of parties, 1689 moral certitude requirements in documentary process, 1783-1784
new marriage, right to contract, 1684
non-consummation, evidence of, 1681 objections, lodging, 1677
oral contentious process, 1690
ordinary contentious process, subject to, 1691
parties
challenges to marriage, parties qualified to make, 1674
moral and civil obligations of, 1689 presence at examinations, 1678
petition or libellus
abeyance, holding in, 1676
acceptance of, 1677
death of one or both spouses, 1675
presumptions, human, 1586
promoters of justice challenges to marriages by, 1674
inspection of judicial acts, 1678
presence at examinations, 1678
pronouncement and sentencing, 1681-1685
proofs
appeals stage, new ground of nullity introduced at, 1683
credibility, witnesses to, 1679
documentary process, 1686; 1781 rights associated with, 1678
publication of the acts
exemption of acts from publication, 1709-1710 right of defense and right to review acts prior to publication, 1710-1711 ratum et non consummatum dissolution, transfer to, 1681 ratum et non consummatum petition introduced as well as, 1700 reconciliation, duty of judge to urge, 1676 reform suggestions, 1761
res iudicata, 1643
rights and obligations
challenges to marriage, parties qualified to make, 1674
Church's right to judge cases of, 1671
inspection of judicial acts, 1678
moral and civil obligations of parties, 1689
new marriage, right to contract, 1684
presence at examinations, 1678 sacramental registers, documentation in, 1685 spouse's right to challenge marriage, 1674

tribunals, 1673
vetitum or prohibition attached to sentence, 1684
witnesses and witness testimony credibility, witnesses to, 1679
experts, 1680
right to be present at examinations, 1678
Married clerics and religious celibacy, dispensations from, 291
deacons, See Deacons
dismissal from clerical state, 1394
ipso facto dismissal from religious institute, 694
loss of clerical state
celebration of marriage following, manner of, 292
knowledge of condition, restricting, 292 rescript (laicization), loss of clerical state via, 290
ordination, See Ordination partners of, 1394
penalties for, 1394
Protestant clergymen admitted to Catholic ordination, 277; 291 removal from ecclesiastical offices, 194 suspension of censure or prohibition, 1335
Mary, veneration of, See Marian devotions Mary I (Queen of England), 1165
Maryknoll Foreign Mission Society, 784; 892 Masons
clerics' membership in, 278
membership in forbidden societies, 1374
Mass
application of, See Application of Mass celebration of eucharistic celebration, See Eucharist liturgy, celebration of, See Liturgy, celebration of offerings for, See Mass offerings pious wills, amendment of Mass obligations in, 1308; 1309; 1521 Mass media, See Media communications
Mass offerings, 945; 1129-1131
1917 Code, 1130
amount of, 948; 950; 952
any person living or dead, made for, 1130 appearance of trafficking or trading in, 947
application of Mass, See Application of Mass collective intentions, 948
computing number of Masses applied for offering, 950
concelebration, 951
documentation of, 954; 958
excess offerings transferred to another place, 954; 955
historical background, 1129
intentions of donor regarding, 950 loss of, Mass to be applied despite, 949
number of applications per day per priest, 951 offerings per day that priest may keep, 951 offerings that priest may accept, 953
one offering for one Mass regardless of size of offering, 948
prescription, exemption from, 199
religious, 952
theology of, 1129-1130
time period for satisfaction of, 953; 954 trafficking or trading in, 947; 1385 transfer of excess offerings to another place, 954; 955 unsatisfied obligations, handing over of, 956 unspecified number of Masses, given for, 950 vigilance and oversight regarding, 956; 957 year, satisfaction of accepted offerings within, 953; 956 Matrimonia mixta
marriages between Catholics and non-Catholics, 1124; 1127; 1343 Matrimonio vinculo
presumed death of spouse, 1798
Matrimonium conscientae (marriage of conscience), 1352 Matter and form, Scholastic doctrine of, 1018-1019
baptism, 850
confirmation, 880
Eucharist, See Eucharist
Matters reserved to Apostolic See, 135-136 Mature vocations, 233
Maturity
marriage, consent to, 1095
novitiate, as factor in admission to, 642; 643
ordination, candidates for, 1031
secular institutes, required for admission to, 721
Media communications, 977 abuse of Church or religion via, 1369
Apostolic See
pastoral vigilance, need for, 823
scriptures, approval of publication of, 825
bishops
diocesan bishops, 386
norms for participation of religious and clerics in, establishment of, 831 pastoral use of media by, 822
pastoral vigilance, need for, 823
scriptures, approval of publication of, 825 books and written publications, See Books and written publications confessions, recording or publication of, 1388
diocesan bishops, 386
Eastern code, 977
instructions issued after Vatican Council II, 772 norms for participation of religious and clerics in, 831 pastoral use of, 822
Pontifical Commission for Social Communications, 772; 822
preaching, 772
religious, 666
seal of confession, violation of, 1388
Mediation
alternative dispute resolution, as means of, 1733
Mediator Dei
definition of liturgy, 834
Medicinal penalties, See Censures
Meetings
conferences of bishops, 453
ecclesiastical regions, meetings of bishops within, 434 right to hold, 215; 278
Roman Curia, meetings of cardinal heads of dicasteries of, 480-481 rules of order governing, 95
Melkite patriarchate
Byzantine rite, observing, 1
Eastern code, 32
Membership in Church
excommunication's effects on, 1331 Mendicants
alms, begging for, 1265
Mental illness or incapacity, See Insanity, incapacity, or incompetency Mentally disabled persons catechetical needs of, 777
Eucharist, participation in, 914
incapacity of, See Insanity, incapacity, or incompetency schools for special needs, 802
witnesses and witness testimony, 1550
Metanoia
penance, sacrament of, 1168 Metropolitan churches
Eastern code, 33
historical background, 572
Metropolitan tribunals, 1438
Metropolitans, 572
1917 Code, 566; 572
1983 Code, 566
Apostolic See, special powers endowed by, 436 archbishops compared to, 435
authority of, 436
cathedral, notification of diocesan bishop regarding performance of sacred functions in, 436
defined, 435
diocesan administrator for vacant diocesan see, delegation of, 421; 425; 436 diocesan synod declarations and decrees, communication of, 467
Eastern code, 437
ecclesiastical provinces, authority in, 432 episcopal see, office joined with, 435
historical background, 572
impeded diocesan sees
list of candidates for interim leader, communication of, 413
penalties leading to impediment, recourse to Apostolic See in cases of, 415

liturgy, celebration of, 436
pallium, See Pallium particular councils, role in, 442
powers of, 436
residential archbishop, defined as, 435
rights and obligations, 436
sacred functions, performance of, 436 special powers endowed by Apostolic See, 436 suffragan dioceses, powers in, 436 vacancy of see, provincial councils not to be convoked during, 440
visitations, 436

Mexico
Eucharist, lay persons as extraordinary ministers of, 910

Migrants
chaplains for persons deprived of ordinary pastoral care, 568

Milan, Ambrosian rite of, 1

Military service
candidates for ordination, 289
chaplains, 518; 569
clerics, 289
ordinariate, 368
religious, 672

Mill Hill, Missionary Society of St. Joseph of, 784; 892

Ministers
anointing of the sick, 1003
personal performance of anointing by, 1000
priests, 1003
baptism, See Baptism
blessings, 1169; 1207
confirmation, See Confirmation
dedications, 1169; 1206
Eucharist, See Eucharist
exorcism, 1172
marriage, 1246
sacramentals, 1168

Ministry, ecclesiastical, See Ecclesiastical functions

Ministry of divine word, See Divine word, ministry of

Minor children abandoned children, domicile of, 101
abstinence and fasting, 1252 adopted, See Adopted children age of minority and majority, 97
anointing of the sick, 1005
baptism, See Baptism, subhead children catechetical needs, 777
clerics' association with, 277
confirmation, See also Confirmation age at which confirmation is received, 891; 1067-1068; 1069 children as confirmands, 889
parents and pastors, responsibilities of, 890 education, right to, 217; 226; 793
Eucharist, reception of, 913; 914; 1068
illegitimacy, See Legitimacy or illegitimacy of children
imputability
over sixteen years of age, 1324
under sixteen years of age, 1323
infants
baptism of, See Baptism
funerals in church for non-baptized infants, 1183
seven years of age, defined as children younger than, 97
juridic personality, 97
legitimacy or illegitimacy, See Legitimacy or illegitimacy of children
marriage and
age restrictions, 97; 1083; 1095
discretion, presence or lack of, 1095
legitimacy or illegitimacy, See Legitimacy or illegitimacy of children
mixed marriages, 1125
parental duties arising from marriage, 1136 permission of minor children to marry, 1071 primary end as procreation and education of children, 1101; 1238-1240; 1243-1246 remote preparation for, 1063 separation of spouses, care and education following, 1154
support obligations, persons with, 1071
non-Catholic education or baptism, parents or parental surrogates allowing, 1366
parents, See Parents and parental surrogates
penance, See Penance
quasi-domicile, 105
residence and domicile, 101; 105
restitutio in integrum, 1646
seven years of age, significance of, 11
sexual abuse of, See Sexual abuse of minors
transients, 105
trials, 1478; 1646
witnesses, as, 1550

Minor seminaries, 234
personal prelatures, 295

Missio canonica (canonical mission)
universities and colleges, Catholic, 812

Mission churches, canonical status of, 516

Missionaries of Africa (White Fathers), 892

Missionary activities, 938
all faithful, responsibility of, 781
annual day for missions in each diocese, 791
apostolic life, societies of, 892-893 baptism, instruction of persons seeking, 787
bishops
diocesan bishops in mission territories, 790 erection of dioceses and provinces, 786 mission territories, support for persons coming from, 792
missionaries, as, 784
role of, 782
support of missionary activities by, 782; 791
catechesis
baptism, instruction of persons seeking, 787
catechists as missionaries, 785
catechumenate, 788
neophytes, 789
precatechumenate, 787; 788
catechists as missionaries, 785 catechumenate, instruction of, 788
coercion, prohibition on use of, 748
commissio, 786; 790
Congregations associated with, 783
deacons, 784
definition of missionary, 784
diocesan support for, 791
dioceses and provinces, erection of, 786 documents issued on, 791; 938
Eastern code, 784; 787; 938
fidei donum apostolates, 782
financial aid, 791
force, prohibition on use of, 748
formation of clerics, 256; 257
inculturation, importance of, 787
initiation of, 786
lay missionaries, 784 missionaries, 784
natives and non-natives, engagement of, 784
neophytes, 789
non-believers, dialogue with, 787
outreach efforts, 787
pontifical missionary works, promotion of, 791
pope, role of, 782
precatechumenate, 788
priesthood
individual priest designated to promote missions in each diocese, 791 missionaries, priests as, 784
religious diocesan bishops in missionary territories, relationship to, 790
missionaries, as, 784
missionary duties of, 783
secular institutes or societies of apostolic life, 784 territories designated as mission territories assignment of, 786
diocesan bishops of, 790 establishment and modification of ecclesiastical territories in, 371 support for persons coming from, 792
vacant diocesan sees, 420
Thérèse of Lisieux as patron saint of missions, 783 twinning projects, 782
types of, 786
Vatican Council II, 938
catechumenate, 788

diocesan support for missions, 791 inculturation, call for, 787
mission territories, support for persons coming from, 792
neophytes, 789
pope and bishops, role of, 782
religious as missionaries, 783 vocations, diocesan support for, 791
young churches, 786
Missionary Society of St. Columban, 784; 893
Missionary Society of St. Joseph of Mill Hill, 784; 892 Mistake, See Error or mistake
Mixed marriages, 1124; 1341-1343
1917 Code, 1124; 1125; 1343
authority of Church over marriage, 1059
catechesis, 1125
children, declarations and promises regarding, 1125 churches sui iuris, marriage between members of, 1057; 1127 conditions for granting permission, 1125
conferences of bishops, 1126
convalidation of marriage, 1379
custom, 1343
declarations and promises made by Catholic party in, 1125
defined, 1341-1342
disparity of worship, 1086; 1129
dispensations canonical form, from, 1127 historical requirement for, 1124
divorce and remarriage of non-believers, historical views on, 1361
duplicate ceremonies, prohibition on, 1127
Eastern code dispensations from canonical form, 1127
Eastern rite and Latin rite marriages, 1057; 1127 express permission required for, 1124 force and fear, involving, 1322
form of celebration of marriage, 1117; 1127; 1250
historical background, 1124; 1342-1343 just and reasonable cause for, 1125 non-Catholic party's awareness of Catholic party's declarations and promises, 1125 non-sacramental marriages dissolved "in favor of the faith," 1150; 1372-1373 pastoral care and concerns regarding, 1124; 1128
Pauline privilege, 1147
permission required for, 1124
place of celebration of, 1118
sacramental nature of marriage, 1247-1248
Mixed vows, 1192
Moderators
apostolic life, societies of, 738
associations, See Associations
diocesan curias, 473
religious, See Religious
secular institutes, See Secular institutes
several priests in solidum, parishes entrusted to, 543; 544
Modestinus, 1243
Monitum
marriage nullity sentences, attached to, 1779 Monks, See Religious Montesquieu, 135
Moral certitude
marriage nullity, documentary process for, 1783-1784
presumed death of spouse, 1707
pronouncement and sentencing at trial, 1608; 1783-1784 Moral order
duty and right of Church to preach gospel regarding, 747 Moral persons, 113
Morals, attacks on
penalties for, 1369
Morganatic marriage
secret marriage not type of, 1130
Mörsdorf, Klaus
Munich School of canon law theory, 4-5
Mortgages
temporal goods of Church, 1295
Mortis causa dispositions, 1299
Movable altars, 1235
Movement, See headings at Transfer Multiple penalties
discretion in imposing, 1346
remission, 1349
Munera
threefold functions of Jesus, participation of all People of God in, 207; 208; 254 Munich School of canon law theory, 4-5
ecclesiastical governance, eligibility of persons to exercise, 129
Munus triplex theory
ecclesiastical governance, 183
Murder, See Homicide
Mutilation and self-mutilation
ordination, irregularities for reception of, 1041
Mutuae relationes
preaching role of religious, 758
Mysterium fidei
eucharistic canons, 904

Names
"Catholic," use of, See "Catholic" in name or title, permission to use church building, 1218
National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB) administration of temporal goods, 1277
censors of books, 830
continuing education of clergy, survey of dioceses requiring, 279 deacons, transfer of, 271
divine worship other than sacraments, 1400 dress requirements for clerics, 284 employment practices, due process system for complaints regarding, 231 Eucharist, lay persons as extraordinary ministers of, 910 fund-raising norms, 1262
higher education canons, 961-962 leasing of temporal goods, 1297
legislation enacted by, 603-607 mixed marriages, dispensation from canonical form for, 1127 pastoral councils of particular churches, studies of, 671 Program for Priestly Formation, 232-261
protection of rights, 221
retirement of priests, 538
National Pastoral Life Center
Called to be Catholic: Church in a Time of Peril, 212
National shrines, 1231
Navarra School theory of canon law, 4
Naz, R., 126
NCCB, See National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB) Ne temere
form of celebration of marriage, 1326-1327 Negligence or culpa
contentious trials abated or preempted due to, 1389 ecclesiastical offices, supplying for, 155 exercise of authority or ecclesiastical function, 1389
imputability, determining, 1321
juridic acts, repair of damage inflicted by, 128
Neophytes
missionary activities involving instruction of, 789
ordination, 1042
residence and domicile, 101
The Netherlands
marriages in, historical dispensations for, 1342-1343 Nicea, ecumenical council of, 337; 439
Nicholas II (Pope)
cardinals, college of, 465 Nomads
chaplains for persons deprived of ordinary pastoral care, 568 Non sui compos
infancy, due to, 97
mental incapacity, due to, 99
Non-believers/non-baptized application of Mass intentions to, 901 formation of clerics relating to, 256 funerals for non-baptized infants of baptized parents, 1183 marriage involving non-believers/non-baptized or non-Catholics and Catholics, between, See Mixed marriages non-believers/non-baptized persons, between, See Marriage, subhead non-baptized persons

missionary activities, 787
Pontifical Council for Dialogue with Non-Believers, 488 preaching efforts, 771
Non-Catholic ecclesial communities, members of application of Mass intentions to, 901
baptism
sponsors (godparents), as, 874
status of baptism of non-Catholics, 869 confirmation of those baptized into, 883 Eastern code on baptized non-Catholics coming into full communion, 39 formation of clerics relating to, 256 funerals in church for, 1183 marriage involving, See Mixed marriages minors, parents or parental surrogates allowing non-Catholic baptism or education of, 1366 sacraments administered to Christians not in full communion with Catholic Church, 844 sacraments received by Catholics from non-Catholic ministers, 844
trial, standing to bring an action at, 1476 Nondefinitive teachings
examples of definitive and nondefinitive doctrines, 21-22 pope and bishops, nondefinitive and uninfallible nature of most teachings of, 749; 752
significance of, 752
Non-parochial churches, 516
chaplains, 570
mission churches, 516
rectors of, See Rectors Non-public delicts, See Occult delicts Normae pastorales
penance, 961; 963
Notaries
appointment of, 483
chancellors and vice-chancellors regarded as notaries by virtue of office, 482 functions and duties of, 484 judicial procedure and, 1437
oral contentious process, 1664 priest, sometimes required to be, 483 proofs, document copies authenticated for use as, 1544
qualifications of, 483
removal from office, 484
witnesses and witness testimony, See Witnesses and witness testimony Notitiae, 8
Notorious rejecters of Catholic faith
funerals, 1184
heresy, apostasy, and schism, See Heresy, apostasy, and schism
marriage, 1071; 1117
Novit, 1401
Novitiate
absence from, 649
admission to consecrated or apostolic life, membership in other institute or society of, 643; 645
debtors, 644
documentation required for, 645
impediments to, 643 major superiors, right of admission belonging to, 641
secular clerics, 644; 645
suitability of candidates, determining, 642 age as factor in admission to, 642; 643 anticipation of first profession, 649 baptism required for admission to, 645 character as factor in admission to, 642 churches sui juris, members of, 645 coercion, entry or reception under circumstances of, 643 confessors of novices, 985 confirmation required for admission to, 645 consecrated or apostolic life, membership in other institute or society of, 643; 645 debtors, admission of, 644 departure from, 653
director of novices, 650; 651; 985 documentation required for admission, 645
end of, 653
formation of novices absence from novitiate, 649
anticipation of first profession, 649
director of novices, 650; 651 end of formation period, 653 length of novitiate, 648; 649
novitiate houses, 647
personnel responsible for, 650; 651 process of, 652
purpose of novitiate, 646 free status, evidence of, 645 freedom to leave, 653 health as factor in admission to, 642 houses for, 647
impediments to admission, 643 length of, 648; 649
major superiors
director of novices, 650; 651
right of admission belonging to, 641 marriage as impediment to admission, 643 maturity as factor in admission to, 642; 643
purpose of, 646
qualifications of candidates, 642 readmission without burden of repeating, 690
residence and domicile requirements, 647
secular clerics, admission of, 644; 645 suitability of candidates, determining, 642
termination of, 653
Nulla poena sine lege or nulla poena sine culpa legality, principle of, 1399
Nullity
administrative recourse, 1739 complaint of nullity against the sentence, See Complaint of nullity against the sentence defenders of the bond in cases involving, 1432 marriage, See Marriage nullity
oaths, 1200
oral contentious process, illegitimate use of, 1656; 1669 vows made out of fear or malice, 1191
Nuncios, 363
Nuns, See Religious Nuns, monasteries of aggregation with institutes of men, 614 autonomous monasteries, See Sui iuris monasteries autonomy, 614; 615
cloistered orders, 606; 667
confessors, 630
enclosure, 606; 667
erection of, 609
exclaustration, grant of indult of, 686
papal cloister, 606; 667
sui iuris monasteries, See Sui iuris monasteries suppression of autonomous house of, 616
Nuptials, See Marriage

Oaths, 1199; 1420, See also Vows cessation of obligation under, 1202
commutation of, 1203
defined, 1199
dispensations from, 129; 1203
Eastern code, 1416
fear, taken out of, 1200
fidelity, oath of anti-modernist oath, replacement of, 19
bishops, 279
persons obliged to take, 19-22; 833
force, extorted via, 1200 malice, extorted via, 1200; 1204
nullity, 1200
obligations incurred by, 1200
office, oaths of administrators of temporal goods of Church, 1283
diocesan curias, 471
promissory oaths, 1201
proxy, by, 1199
strict interpretation, 1204
suspensions, 1203
trial, at judges' oaths, 1454
publication of the acts, oath not to misuse information contained in, 1711 truthful testimony, oath to provide, 1532; 1562
vows differentiated from, 1416 Obedience
clerics, as obligation of, 273
consecrated life, institutes of, 601
disobedience
commission of, 1372

inciting or provoking, 1373
recourse against the pope, censure for, 1372 obligation of Christian faithful, as, 212
prescription, exemption from, 199
Obligations and rights, See Rights and obligations of Christian faithful
Obligatory penalties, 1315
abuse of Church or religion, 1369
abusive exercise of authority or ecclesiastical function, 1389
alienation of church property, unlawful, 1377
appeal or recourse against Apostolic See, 1372
bribery of church officials, 1386
commercial activities, prohibited, 1392
continence of clerics and religious, violations of, 1395 discretion of judge in handling, 1344
disobedience
committing, 1372
inciting or provoking, 1373
doctrinal violations, 1371
documents, falsification of, 1391
illegitimate exercise of ministry, 1384
Mass offerings, trafficking in, 1385
membership in forbidden societies, 1374
negligent exercise of authority or ecclesiastical function, 1389
penal obligations, violations of, 1393
perjury, 1368
profanation of sacred objects, 1376
remission of, 1356
residence and domicile, violation of obligations regarding, 1396
sacred objects, profanation of, 1376
seal of confession, violation of, 1388
sexual sins of clerics and religious, 1395
simony, sacraments received through, 1380
simulation of sacraments, 1379
solicitation of sexual sins in confession, 1387
usurpation of ecclesiastical office, 1381
Obreption
rescripts, 63
Obrogation
administrative recourse, 1739
Obscene or sacrilegious purposes consecrated species, violation of, 1367
Occult delicts
defined, 1340
latae sententiae imposed on, 1314
public penances not to be imposed for, 1340
Offenses, See Delicts Offerings, 1508-1509
alms
begging for, 1265
canonical chapters and parishes, 510
collections in churches and oratories, 1266
freedom of Christian faithful to give goods for benefit of Church, 1261; 1299 funerals, for, 1181
inter vivos gifts, 1299
Mass offerings, See Mass offerings mortis causa dispositions, 1299
parochial vicars, 551
pastors, 531
pious causes, gifts given for, 1299
pious foundations, See Pious foundations pious trusts, 1302
pious wills, See Pious wills
prescription of, 1264
refusal of, 1267
sacraments, administration of, 848
unsolicited, 1267
use of offerings given for a specific purpose, 1267 votive offerings at shrines, 1234
Office, ecclesiastical, See Ecclesiastical offices
Office for the Liturgical Celebrations of the Supreme Pontiff, 489
Office for the Pastoral Care of Migrants and Refugees (PCMR) temporary service of clerics, 271
Office, oaths of
administrators of temporal goods of Church, 1283
diocesan curias, 471
Offices of Roman Curia, 489 Officialis, See Judicial vicars Oils
anointing of the sick, blessing of oil used in, 999 confirmation, See Confirmation, subhead chrism reserved Eucharist, oil used in lamp burned before, 940
sacraments, used in administration of, 847
Olier, Jean-Jacques
Company of Priests of S. Sulpice, founder of, 892 Olive oil
reserved Eucharist, oil used in lamp burned before, 940
sacraments, used in administration of, 847
Onclin, William (Monsignor), 517
Online outreach, See Media communications Opinions
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions preparation of opinion or votum, 1704
transfer of marriage nullity cases, 1681 right of Christian faithful to express, 212; 218 theologians' right to express, 218 Optatam totius formation of clerics and rules for seminaries, 232-256
ordination, 1193
Oral contentious process, 1656; 1754
appeal or recourse, 1669
citations, 1659; 1661
complaint of nullity against the sentence governed by, 1627
conclusion of case, 1666; 1667
derogation from procedural norms, 1670 discussion of case, oral, 1666; 1667 documentation of trial, 1664 eligible cases, 1656
experts, 1661
hearing decree calling for, 1661
presence at examination of parties, witnesses, and experts, 1663 priority of questions, 1662 proofs, collection of, 1663 proofs not collected at time of original hearing, second hearing for, 1666 historical background to, 1754
incidental cases, 1590
joinder of the issue, 1661
marriage nullity, 1690
norms, derogation from, 1670
notaries, 1664
nullity complaints governed by, 1627 nullity of oral sentence, illegitimate use leading to, 1656; 1669 ordinary procedures, use of, 1670
parties at trial
presence at examination of parties, witnesses, and experts, 1663 rejoinder of petitioner to respondent's exceptions, 1660 response to petition by respondent, 1659
petition or libellus, 1658
pronouncement and sentencing, 1668
proofs
collection of, 1663
limits on new evidence, 1665
second hearing for proofs not collected at time of original hearing, 1666 publication of acts not required for, 1757 rejoinder of petitioner to respondent's exceptions, 1660
response to petition by respondent, 1659
separation of spouses, 1693
single judge, before, 1657; 1754
witnesses and witness testimony, 1661-1663
Oratories, 1433
apostolic life, societies of, 733
baptisms performed in, 857; 858 bishop's private chapels having same rights as, 1227
blessings, 1229
collections in, 1266
defined, 1223
establishment of, 1224
penance performed in, 964
permission to establish, 1224 profane use, relegation to, 1224 religious houses required to have, 608 right to hold liturgical celebrations in, 1225 Oratory of Jesus and Mary Immaculate, 892 Ordinaries, local, See Local ordinaries
Ordinary consistories, 353
Ordinary contentious process
trials, See Trials
Ordinary forum, 1407-1415

Ordination, 1008; 1193
1917 Code, 1193
absolute ordination, adoption of, 195 abundance of clerics, usefulness of individual in light of, 1025 acolyte, reception of ministry of, 1035 admission to candidacy, formal, 1034 age of candidate, 1031
apostolic administrator's power to give dimissorial letters, 1018
Apostolic See
bishops, pontifical mandate required for ordination of, 1013
dispensation from irregularities and impediments, 1047
apostolic vicars' and prefects' power to give dimissorial letters, 1018 attendance at ordination, 1011
authority
Apostolic See, See subhead Apostolic See dimissorial letters, issuance of, 1019; 1015; 1018 dispensation from irregularities and impediments, power to grant, 1047 ministers of ordination, See Bishops
baptism
notice of ordination to pastor of place of, 1054
required for ordination, 1024
bishops, of or by, See Bishops cathedral church, celebration in, 1011
celibacy, assumption of obligation of, 1037
churches sui iuris, 1015; 1021
conditional conferral due to doubt as to reception or validity of reception, 845 confirmation required for, 1033
deacons, 1009
acolyte, reception of ministry of, 1035
age of candidate, 1031
celibacy, assumption of obligation of, 1037 declaration of freedom, 1036
denial of exercise of diaconal ministry, 1038
documentation required for, 1050
educational requirements, 1032
formation, 1027
illicit ordination of, 1383
lector, reception of ministry of, 1035 marital status and age, 1031
pastoral prerequisites, 1032
petition for ordination, 1036
proper minister of ordination to, 1016 refusal of promotion to presbyterate, 1038
declaration of freedom, 1036
defenders of the bond, 1432
defined, 1008
delicts
illicit ordination of priests or deacons, 1383
irregularities and impediments to reception of, 1044
denial of exercise of diaconal ministry, 1026; 1030 denial of ordination, 1026; 1030; 1052 dimissorial letters, 1015 authenticity, ensuring, 1022 change in status or authority of person granting, 1023 competency of person issuing to perform ordination, 1015 documents and testimonials, remarks regarding, 1052 eligibility of bishops to receive, 1021 limitations placed on, 1023 power to issue, 1019; 1015; 1018
religious, for, 1019
revocation of, 1023
secular clerics, for, 1018 testimonials and documents required for, 1020 diocesan administrator's power to give dimissorial letters, 1018 diocesan bishops, by extra-territorial ordination, permission required for, 1017
proper minister, diocesan bishop as, 1016
dispensation from irregularities and impediments petition to obtain, procedure for, 1049
power to grant, 1047
document sources for, 1193
documentation of, 1053; 1054
documentation required for bishop performing ordination, responsibilities of, 1052 diaconate, candidates for, 1050 dimissorial letters, See subhead dimissorial letters dimissorial letters, testimonials and documents required for, 1020 education, proper completion of, 1050 parties responsible for providing, 1050 presbyterate, candidates for, 1050 qualifications of candidate, information regarding, 1051
Eastern code, 37; 1008; 1041
Eastern rite, subjects of, 1015; 1021 ecclesiastical governance, as prerequisite for, 129 ecclesiastical offices, required for, 151; 195 educational requirements, 1032
emergencies, exercise of orders in, 1048 exercise of orders received, impediments to abortion, participation in, 1398
diaconal ministry, refusal of promotion to presbyterate not grounds for denial of exercise of, 1038 dispensation from, 1047
emergencies, exercise of orders in, 1048
illegitimate reception of orders due to irregularity or impediment, 1044
list of, 1044
married clerics and religious, 1394
mental illness, 1044
final judgment as to suitability of candidate, 1052
form of celebration of
attendance at ordination, 1011
place or setting of ordination, 1011
requirements for licit and valid ordination, 1024
time of ordination, 1010
formal admission to candidacy, 1034 formation of clerics for, 1027, See also Formation freedom to be ordained
declaration of freedom by candidate, 1036
freedom of candidates to take, request, or refuse orders, 1026
perceived lack of, 1026
heresy, apostasy, and schism as irregularities, 1041
illegitimate reception of orders due to irregularity or impediment, 1044
insanity or incompetency, 1041; 1044
invalidity of ordination, declaration of, 290
irregularities and impediments abortion, participation in, 1041; 1398
definition and distinction of, 1040; 1041
delicts, 1044
different causes for, 1046
dispensation from, 1047
Eastern code, 1041
effect of, 1040
emergencies, exercise of orders in, 1048
exercise of offices and administrations prohibited to clerics, 1042 exercise of orders received, impediments to, See subhead exercise of orders received, impediments to heresy, apostasy, and schism, 1041
homicide, commission of, 1041 ignorance of, 1045
illegitimate reception of orders due to, 1044
insanity or incompetency, 1041 knowledge of, obligation to reveal, 1043 list of irregularities or perpetual impediments, 1041
marriage, 1394
attempted canonically prohibited marriages, 1041
currently married men, 1042
declared ecclesiastically invalid, 1042
mental illness, persons suffering from, 1041
multiplication of, 1046
mutilation and self-mutilation, 1041
neophytes, 1042
public delicts, 1041; 1048
sacraments, simulation or abuse of administration of, 1041 same cause, multiple impediments arising from, 1046 simple impediments, See subhead simple impediments

jurisdiction, 1017
lector, reception of ministry of, 1035
liceity, See subhead requirements for licit and valid ordination males, ordination restricted to, 1024 marriage, See also Married clerics and religious attempted canonically prohibited marriage, 1041
celibacy, assumption of obligation of, 1037
currently married men, 1042
declared ecclesiastically invalid, 1042
diaconate, marital status and age of candidates for, 1031
historical background, 1087
impediment to marriage, as, 1087 permission of wife for ordination to permanent diaconate, 1050 simple impediment to ordination, current marriage as, 1042 Mass, to be celebrated with, 1010
maturity of candidate, 1031
mental illness, persons suffering from, 1041; 1044 ministers of, bishops as, See Bishops, subhead ordination by multiplication of irregularities and impediments, 1046 mutilation and self-mutilation as irregularity for reception of, 1041
neophytes, 1042
nonrepeatability, 845
notice of ordination to pastor of place of baptism, 1054 nullity, See Ordination, nullity of parochial vicars, required for, 546
pastoral prerequisites, 1032
perpetual impediments, See subhead irregularities and impediments petition for ordination, 1036
place or setting of ordination, 1011
priests, 1009
age of candidate, 1031
celibacy, assumption of obligation of, 1037 deacons refusing promotion to presbyterate, 1038
declaration of freedom, 1036
documentation required for, 1050
educational requirements, 1032
formation, 1027
illicit ordinations, 1383
pastoral prerequisites, 1032
petition for ordination, 1036 religious, See subhead religious secular clerics, See subhead secular clerics probation period, 1025
proof of, 1053
public delicts, 1041; 1048 register, recording in, 1053 release from obligations of conscience-driven conviction of invalidity of orders, 1026 moral freedom, perceived lack of, 1026
religious
celibacy, assumption of obligation of, 1037
dimissorial letters for, 1019 reputation, exercise of orders to protect, 1048
requirements for licit and valid ordination abundance of clerics, usefulness of individual in light of, 1025 acolyte, reception of ministry of, 1035
age of candidate, 1031
baptism, 1024
benefit of doubt as to suitability, 1025
celibacy, assumption of obligation of, 1037
confirmation, 1033
declaration of freedom, 1036
documents required, See subhead documentation required for educational requirements, 1032
final judgment as to suitability of candidate, 1052
formal admission to candidacy, 1034
formation, 1027
freedom of candidates to take, request, or refuse orders, 1026 intention of candidate, 1026; 1029
intention of ordaining bishop, 1024
irregularities and impediments, See subhead irregularities and impediments lector, reception of ministry of, 1035
liturgical requirements, 1024
males, ordination restricted to, 1024
maturity of candidate, 1031
pastoral prerequisites, 1032
petition for ordination, 1036
probation period, 1025
reason and understanding of candidate, 1026; 1029 retreat prior to ordination, 1039 rights of fit and prepared candidates, 1026 shortage of clerics, usefulness of individual in light of, 1025 spiritual qualities of candidate, 1025; 1029; 1032
suitability of candidate, 1025; 1029
usefulness of candidate, 1025 retreat prior to, 1039
rights and obligations
celibacy, assumption of obligation of, 1037 documentation required, parties responsible for providing, 1050 fit and prepared candidates, right of ordination of, 1026; 1030 instruction of candidates as to, 1028 irregularities and impediments, obligation to reveal knowledge of, 1043 refusal of ordination, right of, 1026 release from obligations conscience-driven conviction of invalidity of orders, 1026 moral freedom, perceived lack of, 1026
sacraments, simulation or abuse of administration of, 1041
secular clerics
dimissorial letters for, 1018
proper minister of ordination to, 1016 self-mutilation as irregularity for reception of, 1041 shortage of clerics, usefulness of individual in light of, 1025 simple impediments
defined, 1040
distinguished from perpetual impediments/irregularities, 1040; 1041 exercise of ministry, to, 1044 exercise of offices and administrations prohibited to clerics, 1042
marriage, 1042
neophytes, 1042
spiritual qualities of candidate, 1025; 1029; 1032
suitability of candidate, 1025
territorial restrictions, 1017
theology of, 1008; 1193
time of ordination, 1010
types or grades of orders, 1009
unauthorized, 1383
usefulness of candidate, 1025 validity of, See subhead requirements for licit and valid ordination
Vatican Council II, 1193
vows, persons received into clerical institute via, 1034
Ordination, nullity of, 1799-1800
1917 Code, 1799
1983 Code, 1799
competency or incompetency to receive petition or libellus, 1709
concordant or conforming judgments, 1712
defenders of the bond, 1711
defenders of the bond in cases involving, 1432
Eastern code, 1799-1800
norms for judging, 1710 ordinary contentious process used for, 1710
petition or libellus
competency or incompetency to receive, 1709 prohibition of exercise of orders due to sending of, 1709 right to petition, 1708
res iudicata, 1643; 1712
right to petition for, 1708
Roman Curia, 1709
tribunals, 1709
Ordo exsequiarum
funerals, 1407
Ordo Synodi Episcoporum Celebrandae
synod of bishops, 455 et seq.

Orientale lumen, 25
Orientalium Ecclesiarum direction of celebration of liturgy, 838
  sacramental sharing, 844
L'Osservatore Romano publication of laws in, 8
Out-of-court settlements, See Settlements
Outreach efforts
  media communications, See Media communications
  missionary activities, 787
  preaching, 771
Ownership
  temporal goods of Church, See Temporal goods of Church

Pacem in Terris
  association and assembly, right of, 278 ill, elderly, or incapacitated clerics, support for, 281 Pallium
  defined, 437
  liturgical restrictions on, 437 required to request, 437 right of senior cardinal deacon to bestow, 355 territorial restrictions on, 437
  transfer to another see, new pallium needed for, 437 use of, restrictions on, 437
Papacy, See Apostolic See
Papal cloister
  enclosed or cloistered nuns, observance of papal cloister by, 606; 667 Papal delegates or vicars, bishops as theology combating, 184; 566-567
  Vatican Council II on, 183-184
  viewed as, 428
Papal legates, 490
  ad limina visits, role in, 364
  age requirements, 367
  apostolic delegates, 363
  bishops
    assistance of bishops as role of, 364
    titular bishops, as, 376
  cardinals' role as, significance of, 358; 465 Church-State relations, responsibilities regarding, 365
  conferences of bishops, 364; 450 countries with which Apostolic See maintains diplomatic relations, 363 curial reform not directly affecting, 490 duration of office of, 367 ecclesiastical governance of local ordinary, exemption from, 366 fulfillment of mandate, termination of function on, 367
  historical background, 490 informational role, 364 international diplomacy undertaken by, 365
  liturgy, celebration of, 366
  nominations of bishops, 364
  nuncios, 363
  particular occasion, appointed for (apostolic delegates), 363 pope's right to appoint and recall, 362
  pro-nuncios, 363
  purpose of, 362; 364; 490 religious and secular institutes, role in, 364 representation of Apostolic See by, 363
  resignation, 367
  responsibilities of, 364 societal and cultural duties of, 364 stable representatives of pope (nuncios and pro-nuncios), 363
  titular bishops, as, 376
  types of, 363
  vacancy of Apostolic See, 367
  Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, 362
Parents and parental surrogates, 1136 baptism, infants presented for, See Baptism catechesis, responsibility for, 774
  confirmation
    responsibilities of, 890
    sponsors, as, 893
  duties arising from marriage, 1136 education responsibilities
    non-Catholic education or baptism of minors, allowing, 1366
    rights and obligations of, 226; 793
    schools and, See Schools Eucharist, preparation of children for reception of, 914
  liturgical function of, 835
  marriage and, See Minor children, subhead marriage and non-Catholic education or baptism of minors, allowing, 1366 residence and domicile of minor children in care of, 101; 105
  schools, See Schools
  trials involving minor children, 1478
Paris Foreign Mission Society, 784; 892 Paris, School of
  marriage, 1236; 1361
Parishes, 374; 515; 673-676
  1917 Code, 515; 518; 674-675
  administrators, 539; 540
  alteration of, 515
  archives, 491; 535
  authority to erect, suppress, or alter, 515
  baptism, See Baptism
  canons, chapters of, 510
  catechetical responsibilities, 773; 776
  cathedral chapters, 510
  cemeteries, 1241
  church buildings, See Church buildings collegiate chapters, 510
  Conferences of bishops, particular law of, 717, Appendix I deacons as pastors of, 517
  defined, 515
  diocesan administrator, role of, 719, Appendix II
  diocesan bishops
    authority to erect, suppress, or alter parishes reserved to, 515
    finance councils, parochial, 537 parochial administrators, appointment of, 539 pastoral councils, parochial, 536 role of, 718, Appendix II dioceses divided into, 515 division of particular churches into, 374
  Eastern code, 675-676
  establishment or erection of, 515
  finance council, 537 formation of clerics in administration of, 256 funerals preferably held in parish church of deceased, 1177
  groupings of, 374
  juridic personality, 374,515
  juridic representation of parish by pastor, 532 lay people in pastoral role, 517 legislation on, 717, Appendix I
  local ordinaries
    role of, 719, Appendix II
    vacancy in, communication to local ordinary of, 541 marriage to be celebrated in, 1115; 1118
  mission churches, canonical status of, 516
  number of pastors per parish, 526
  one parish per pastor; one pastor per parish, 526 particular legislation on, 717, Appendix 1 pastoral councils of, 536
  pastors, See also Pastors juridic representation by, 532
    relationship to, 515
    several priests in solidum, parishes entrusted to, See Pastors personal parishes, 518
  presbyteral council opinion on erection, suppression, or alteration of parishes, diocesan bishops required to listen to, 515 parish pastoral council, opinion on establishing, 536
  quasi-parishes, 516 rectors of non-parochial churches, parochial duties undertaken by, 558; 560
  registers, 535
  schools, 803
  seal, 535
  seminaries exempt from governance by, 262
  several priests in solidum, parishes entrusted to, See Pastors shortage of priests, ways of handling, 517
  suppression of, 515
  taking possession of office by pastor, 527
  temporal goods
    finance councils, parochial, 537
    pastor responsible for administering, 532
  territoriality of, 515; 518
  theology of, 515; 673-674 vacant parishes, See Vacant parishes

Vatican Council II, 675
vicariates forane, grouped into, 374
women, pastoral role of, 517
Parochial administrators, 539; 540
Parochial domicile or quasi-domicile, 102
Parochial vicars, 545; 725
1917 Code, 547; 725
appointment of, 547
common life, 550
Eastern code, 548; 725
functions of, 545
offerings to, 551
ordination required for, 546
pastor, as substitute for, 549
removal from office, 552
residence and domicile requirements, 550
rights and obligations, 548 vacation, 550
Partial indulgences
defined, 992
new measure of, 1172
Particular churches, 368; 501-504
1917 Code, 502; 504
1967 synod of bishops, 503
1983 Code, 503
apostolic administrations as, 368 apostolic prefectures as, 368 Apostolc See and, 331
apostolic vicariates as, 368
authority
establishment of particular churches, 373 pastoral councils, 513
chancellors, See Chancellors and vice-chancellors
chaplains, See Chaplains college of consultors, See College of consultors
communion (communio), 501 Congregation for Bishops, 368; 373
Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples, 368; 373
councils
finance council, See Finance council and finance officer parish pastoral councils, 536 particular councils, See Particular councils pastoral councils, See Pastoral councils of particular churches plenary councils, See Plenary councils presbyteral councils, See Presbyteral councils of particular churches provincial councils, See Provincial councils curias, diocesan, See Diocesan curias
defined, 368
dioceses as, 368
documents relevant to, 503
Eastern code, 503; 504
episcopal vicars, See Vicars general and episcopal vicars finance council and finance officer, See Finance council and finance officer groupings of, 566-567
1917 Code, 566; 567
councils, See Particular councils documents serving as sources for canons addressing, 567
Eastern code, 438; 567
metropolitans, See Metropolitans
patriarchs and primates as titles, meaning and function of, 438
provinces, See Ecclesiastical provinces regions, See Ecclesiastical regions
historical background, 502-503 internal ordering of chancellors, See Chancellors and vice-chancellors
chaplains, See Chaplains
college of consultors, See College of consultors diocesan curias, See Diocesan curias diocesan synods, See Diocesan synods episcopal vicars, See Vicars general and episcopal vicars finance council and finance officer, See Finance council and finance officer
notaries, See Notaries parochial vicars, See Parochial vicars pastoral councils, See Pastoral councils of particular churches presbyteral councils, See Presbyteral councils of particular churches rectors of non-parish churches, See Rectors vicars forane, See Vicars forane vicars general, See Vicars general and episcopal vicars vice-chancellors, See Chancellors and vice-chancellors
juridic personality, 373
metropolitans, See Metropolitans
military ordinariate, 368
more than one particular church in same territory, 372
notaries, See Notaries parishes, division into, 374
parochial vicars, See Parochial vicars
patriarchs, 438
personal prelatures not classified as, 394 prayers and spiritual exercises specific to, 839
presbyteral councils, See Presbyteral councils of particular churches
primates, 438
provinces, See Ecclesiastical provinces
rectors of non-parish churches, See Rectors ritual or personal churches, 372 Secretariat of State, 368
synods, diocesan, See Diocesan synods territorial abbacies as, 368 territorial prelatures as, 368
territoriality of, 372
theology of, 566-567
types of, 368
vicariates forane, See Vicariates forane vicars general, See Vicars general and episcopal vicars vice-chancellors, See Chancellors and vice-chancellors Particular councils, 577-579
1917 Code, 442
1983 Code, 442; 566
attendance requirements, 444
authority of, 445
authority over, 441
cathedral chapters as participants, 443 coadjutor and auxiliary bishops as participants in, 443 conciliar decrees issued by, 446
conferences of bishops, authority of, 441 decline in use of, 578
decrees issued by, 446
diocesan bishops as participants in, 443 Easter, date of, 577
ecclesiological significance of, 578-579 guests invited to attend, 443
historical background, 577 lay people as participants, 443 metropolitans, role of, 442
participants
duties of, 444
proxies, sending, 444
types of, 443
pastoral councils generally, See Pastoral councils of particular churches pastoral councils of each particular church as participants, 443
Pio-Benedictine Code, 441
plenary councils, See Plenary councils
powers of, 445
presbyteral councils of each particular church as participants, 443 presbyters as participants, 443 president, election of, 441; 442
provincial councils, See Provincial councils
proxies, sending, 444
rectors of major seminaries as participants, 443 religious institutes, major superiors of, 443 secular institutes or societies of apostolic life, major superiors of, 443 suffragan bishops elected to preside over, 442 titular bishops as participants in, 443 value of, 578
Vatican Council II, 577-578 vicars general and episcopal vicars as participants in, 443 women, participation of, 443 Particular laws, 12; 13
cemeteries, 1243
infra-universal authority, See Local ordinaries
local ordinaries, See Local ordinaries suspension as penalty, 1333
Parties at trial
alternative dispute resolution, selection of norms for, 1714

appeal or recourse
effect of appeal, 1637
incidental appeals against other grounds, 1637
right of appeal, 1628
complaint of nullity against the sentence, eligibility to lodge, 1626 deceit or falsehood by, 1645 declarations of, 1530-1538; 1671 examination of witnesses, presence at, 1559 experts privately engaged by, 1581 judicial expenses, responsibility for, 1649
marriage nullity
challenges to marriage, parties qualified to make, 1674
moral and civil obligations of, 1689
presence at examinations, 1678
notification of witness names, 1554
oral contentious process
presence at examination of parties, witnesses, and experts, 1663 rejoinder of petitioner to respondent's exceptions, 1660
response to petition by respondent, 1659
petitioners, See Petitioners at trial publication of sentence to, 1614; 1615 questioning, 1530
questions presented by, 1533 relationship of witness to parties, establishing, 1563
respondents, See Respondents testimony of, 1530-1538; 1671 witnesses, disqualified as, 1550 Partnership
marriage viewed as, 1055 Passion, crimes of
exemption from imputability, 1323
mitigation of imputability, 1324
non-mitigating factors, 1325
Pastor aeternus
decrees and constitutions, teaching by, 754
exercise of papal primacy, 333
Pastor bonus
ad limina visits, 400
apostolic administrations, 371
Apostolic Signatura, 1445
conferences of bishops
decrees of, 455
statutes of, 451
corpus iuris canonici, as part of, 27
dispensations, 128
ecclesiastical provinces, establishment, alteration, or suppression of, 431
mission territories, 371
particular churches, 368
Quinquennial Report, 399
rescript (laicization), administrative responsibility for loss of clerical state via, 290
Roman Curia, 475
congregations, 481-486, See also specific congregations dicasteries, list and descriptions of, 480-489 general norms established for, 479-481 juridical principles regarding, 477-479
offices, 489
pontifical councils, 486-488, See also specific pontifical councils
reform of, 12-13
theological principles regarding, 477-479
tribunals, 486
Pastoral Care of Migrants and Refugees, Office for (PCMR)
temporary service of clerics, 271
Pastoral councils of particular churches, 666-668 1971 synod of bishops, 667
authority, 513
clerics as members, 512
consultative vote only, 513
convocation, 513
diocesan bishops
convocation by, 513
members, selection of, 512 parochial level, pastoral councils on, 536 publication of acts by, 513 documents discussing, 666-668
establishment of, 511
function of, 511; 667
lay people as members, 512
membership, 512
NCCB, major studies undertaken by, 671
parish pastoral councils, 536
particular councils, participants in, 443
powers of, 513
qualifications of members, 512 religious as members, 512 selection of members, 512
Vatican Council II, 666-667
vicars forane as members of, 555
Pastoral prerequisites for ordination, 1032
Pastorale munus
demarcation of competencies of pope and bishops, attempts at, 333
dispensations, 88; 127
radical sanations of invalid marriages, 1388 transactions involving temporal goods of Church, 1295
Pastores dabo vobis
formation of clerics, 232; 233 holy life, duty of clerics to lead, 276
minor seminaries, 234
Pastors, 519
absence of, 533
age restrictions, 538
anointing of the sick, responsibilities regarding, 1001 anointing of the sick, special duty of, 530 baptism, special duty of, 530 cessation of office of, 538; 544 chaplains' relationship to, 571 confessors by faculty from office, 968 confirmation duties and obligations, 530; 890 consultation regarding suitability of, 524
deacons as, 517
defined, 519
diocesan bishops
provision of office by, 523
suitability, consultation as to, 524
dispensations, authority to grant, 89
divine word, ministry of, 528
Easter blessing of baptismal font, 530 ecclesiastical governance, ministry of, 529 eucharistic responsibilities, 528; 530; 898; 914 examination, suitability determined by, 521 functions of, 519; 528-532; 543 funerals, special duty regarding, 530 governance, ministry of, 529 impeded see, appointment during, 525 juridic representation of parish by, 532; 543
lay people
duties of pastor regarding, 529 pastoral role exercised by, 517
suitability of pastors, solicitation of views on, 524
liturgy, celebration of minister of sanctification, pastor's role as, 528 minister of word, pastor's role as, 528
several priests in solidum, parishes entrusted to, 543 Sundays and holy days, special functions as to, 528 taking possession of parish, obliged to provide Mass for the people following, 534
marriage
authorized witness, pastor as, See Marriage, subhead authorized witness role in celebration of, 1108; 1109; 1246 special duty regarding, 530
number of pastors per parish, 526
offerings to, 531
one parish per pastor; one pastor per parish, 526
parishes, See also Parishes juridic representation of, 532
relationship to, 515
several priests in solidum, parishes entrusted to, See subhead several priests in solidum, parishes entrusted to parochial vicars as substitutes for, 549 pastoral governance, ministry of, 529 presbyter, required to be, 519; 521 presbyteral council's views on suitability of, 524 processions outside church, 530
qualifications of, 519; 521; 542
religious as, 520; 538
removal of, See Removal of pastors remuneration, 531
residence and domicile
pastors acquired through, 107
requirements regarding, 533

resignation, 538; 1743; 1744
retirement, 538
retreats taken by, 533
Review Panel
removal, 1742
transfer, 1750
role of, 519; 528-532; 543 sacraments, administration of, 530
sanctification, ministers of, 528 secular (clerical) institutes or societies of apostolic life as, 520; 538
several priests in solidum, parishes entrusted to, 517
appointment of, 542 cessation of office, 544
common counsel, 543 functions and roles of, 543
juridic representation, 543
liturgy, celebration of, 543
Mass for the people on taking possession of parish, 534
moderator, 543; 544
qualifications of, 542
rights and obligations of, 543 taking possession of parish, 534; 542
shortage of priests, ways of handling, 517
solemn blessings outside church, 530 stability of office, 521 suitability of, 521; 524
taking possession of office, 527; 534 temporal goods of parish, pastor responsible for administering, 532 time period, appointed for, 519; 520; 538
transfer of, See Transfer of pastors transfers, 538
vacant pastorates, See Vacant parishes vacant see, appointment during, 525 vacations, 533
validity of appointment of, 519 vicars forane consulted regarding suitability of, 524
vows, dispensation from, 1196
women, pastoral role of, 517
Patriarchal churches
Eastern code, 32
Patriarchs, 438
Paul III (Pope)
polygamy, 1370
Paul VI (Pope)
1983 Code, approval of general principles of, 12 African bishops, address to, 787
anointing of the sick, 998
cardinals, reform of, 350; 352; 465-466 collegiality between bishops and pope, explanatory note to Lumen gentium on, 423 confirmation, reform of, 880; 1068 demarcation of competencies of pope and bishops, attempts at, 333
dispensations, 127; 128
Eastern code, revision of, 28
encyclical letters, influence of, 25 Eucharist, frequent celebration of, 904 evangelization, duty of, 211
Ex corde Ecclesiae, promulgation of, 14 formula of promulgation for acts of Vatican Council II, 341
indulgences, 992; 997; 1172 instituted ministry of catechist, power to establish, 785
Mass offerings, 1130
missionary activities, 781; 791
mixed marriages, 1119; 1124; 1343 oils/chrism used in administration of sacraments, 847
personal prelatures, 394-395
public or political office, clerics prohibited from, 285
radical sanations of invalid marriages, 1388
rights and duties, interrelationship of, 1819-1820
Roman Curia, reform of, 12; 477; 1373 sacraments, matter and form of, 1019 Sapientia christiana, preparation of, 972 synod of bishops, creation of, 454-455 Paul, Vincent de (Saint)
Congregation of the Mission founded by, 892
Pauline privilege, 1143; 1361 departure of unbaptized spouse, 1143; 1146 doubts about use of, resolving, 1374 interrogation of unbaptized spouse conditions required for, 1145 negative responses to, 1146 persons conducting, 1145 questions to be asked, 1144
timing of, 1144
right of baptized party to remarry Catholics, 1146
mixed marriages, 1147
PCILT, See Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts (PCILT) PCMR (Office for the Pastoral Care of Migrants and Refugees)
temporary service of clerics, 271
Peace and harmony
clerics as fosterers of, 287
penal law required to avoid disruption of, 1530
Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace, 487 Penal actions, See Criminal actions
Penal law
1917 Code, See 1917 Code, subhead delicts and penalties 1983 Code, See 1983 Code, subhead delicts and penalties abrogation of previous law, 6
authority to establish, 1315
basic principles of, 1539-1540 changes in, 1313
conscience, freedom of, 1312; 1529
construction of, 1313
continuing need for, affirmation of, 1529 peace of community, disturbance of, 1530 Principle nine formed by 1968 Synod of Bishops, 1531
delicts, See Delicts
Eastern code compared to Latin code, 1340; 1548
interpretation of, 18; 1313
judicial procedure, See Penal process legislative authority to establish, 1315
offenses, See Delicts
penalties, See Penalties
prescription, See Prescription
privation, 196
right of Church to impose, 1311
sanctions, See Penalties statute of limitations, See Prescription
universal, 1315; 1532 Penal penances, 1312; 1340 addition to penal remedy of warning or rebuke, 1340
defined, 1340
discretion of ordinary or superior in imposing, 1348
focus of, 1556
illegitimate exercise of ministry, 1384
occult delicts, public penances not to be imposed for, 1340 sacramental confession and, 1142 Penal precepts, 1319
Penal process, 1806
absolution of accused, 1726
accused
absence of, 1724
absolution of, 1726
administrative process, informed about, 1720 advocates for, 1723
appeal or recourse by, 1727
defenses, See subhead defenses last word allowed to, 1725 pre-process phase, involvement in, 1809 renunciation of penal trial, acceptance of, 1724 restrictions placed on, 1722 self-incrimination protections, 1728 action to repair damages, 1729 deferral of, 1730
sentence, effect of, 1731
time of intervention to bring, 1729
administrative procedure, 1718; 1720; 1810
appeal or recourse, 1727
canonical interrelationships, 1806 damages, See subhead action to repair damages decree of ordinary regarding, 1718 defendant, See subhead accused defenses
administrative process, opportunity for self-defense in, 1720
advocates for accused, provision of, 1723
last word allowed to accused, 1725
Eastern code, 1809; 1810

experts consulted regarding decree of ordinary, 1718
judges
decree of ordinary, consultation regarding, 1718
preliminary investigator not allowed to be judge in subsequent judicial process, 1717
judicial procedure
appeal or recourse, 1727
decree of ordinary regarding need for, 1718
norms for, 1728
ordinary contentious process applicable to, 1728
petition or libellus, issuance of, 1721 promoters of justice, role of, 1721 trials, See Penal trials
petition or libellus, issuance of, 1721
preliminary investigation confidentiality and secrecy of acts, 1719 custody of the acts following, 1719 decree of ordinary as to results of, 1718
initiation of, 1717
judge in subsequent judicial process, investigator not allowed to be, 1717 person assigned to conduct, 1717 reputations, protection of, 1717
promoters of justice
appeal or recourse by, 1727
renunciation of trial by, 1724
role of, 1721
res iudicata, 1731
restrictions placed on accused, 1722 serious nature of, 1717; 1806 Penal remedies, 1312; 1339
discretion of ordinary or superior in imposing, 1348
focus of, 1556
penances added to, 1340
rebukes, as, 1339
warnings, as, 1339
Penal transfers
expiatory penalties involving, 1336
physical violence, acts of, 1395
Penal trials
appeal or recourse, 1727
avoidance of, 1718
defined, 1400
norms for, 1728
ordinary contentious process applicable to, 1728 promoter of justice renouncing, 1724
pronouncement and sentencing, 1726; 1731
renunciation of, 1724
Penalties, 1529
1917 Code, See 1917 Code, subhead delicts and penalties 1983 Code, See 1983 Code, subhead delicts and penalties
abortion, 1398
abuse of authority, 1389
abuse of Church or religion, 1369
administrative process for imposing, 1314; 1342; 1532 advocates and procurators at trials, See Advocates and procurators, subhead delicts and penalties aggravating factors, See Imputability alienation of church property, unlawful, 1377
apostasy, 1364
appeal or recourse, See Appeal or recourse appeals, 1353; 1532
application of, procedures and principles for, 1558 attempted delicts, 1328; 1330
authority
Church's authority, delicts against, 1370-1377
establishment and determination of penalties, 1315
power to remit penalties, See Remission of penalties, subhead power to remit automatic, See Latae sententiae baptismal sponsors not to be bound by, 874 beliefs and core doctrines, failure to hold to, 20; 1371 bishops, imposed on, 414
blasphemy, 1369
bribery of church officials, 1386
censures, See Censures cessation of penalties, 1566-1567
expiatory penalties, 1566-1567 prescription, via criminal actions, 1362
penal actions, 1363
remission, See Remission of penalties
changes to, 1313
civil authority to inflict, use of, 1529-1530 clerical refusal to obey proper authorities, 273
commercial activities, prohibited, 1392
communicatio in sacris (indiscriminate sacramental sharing), 1365
concubinage, 1395
consecrated species, violations of, 1367
consecration of bishops, unauthorized, 1382
contempt for Church, comments exciting, 1369
continence and celibacy, violations of, See Continence and celibacy of religious and clerics, subhead delicts and penalties continuing violation following declaration of, 1326
defined, 1312
determinate, See Obligatory penalties discretion of ordinary or superior in imposing, See Discretion in imposing penalties discretionary, See Facultative penalties
disobedience
commission of, 1372
incitement or provocation of, 1373
doctrinal violations, 1371
Eastern code, 41
ecclesiastical functions, exercise of, 1378-1379
effectiveness of, 1530-1531
excommunication, See Excommunication exemptions from, See Imputability expiatory, See Expiatory penalties external forum, restricted to, 1531 extraordinary circumstances for which no explicit canon exists, 1399
facultative, See Facultative penalties
falsehood, See Falsehood ferendae sententiae, See Ferendae sententiae
feticide, 1398
free exercise of ecclesiastical function, interference with, 1375
general norm for, 1399
hatred of Church, comments exciting, 1369
heresy, 1364
human life, integrity, and freedom, violations of, 1397; 1398
illegitimate exercise of ministry, 1384
impeded diocesan sees due to, 414 imposed, See Ferendae sententiae imposition of, procedures and principles for, 1558
imputability, See Imputability
indeterminate circumstances, restraint to be exercised in, 1349
indeterminate penalties, See Facultative penalties indiscriminate sacramental sharing (communicatio in sacris), 1365
individual delicts, 1574-1575 infra-universal, See Local ordinaries, subhead delicts and penalties
interdict, See Interdict
interpretation of law, 18
irrevocable (perpetual)
indeterminate circumstances, restraint to be exercised in, 1349
judicial procedure used only for, 1532
restraint in threatening, 1319
judges, abuse of office by, 1457 judicial process for imposing, 1314; 1342; 1532
last resort, as, 1341; 1532
latae sententiae, See Latae sententiae law as determinative of, 1315
legality, principle of, 1399
legislative authority to establish, 1315 liability for, See Imputability local ordinaries, See Local ordinaries, subhead delicts and penalties married clerics and religious, 1394
Mass offerings, trafficking in, 1385
medicinal, See Censures
membership in forbidden societies, 1374
minors, parents or parental surrogates allowing non-Catholic education or baptism of, 1366

mitigating factors, See Imputability morals, attacks on, 1369
multiple discretion in imposing, 1346
remission, 1349
negligent exercise of authority or ecclesiastical function, 1389
nondefinitive teachings, pertinacious rejection of, 752 normative, ferendae sententiae as, 1314
nulla poena sine lege or nulla poena sine culpa, 1399 oath of fidelity, failing to make, 833 obligations imposed by, violations of, 1393
obligatory, See Obligatory penalties ordination of priests or deacons, illicit, 1383
penances, See Penal penances perjury before ecclesiastical authority, 1368 perpetual (irrevocable)
indeterminate circumstances, restraint to be exercised in, 1349
judicial procedure used only for, 1532
restraint in threatening, 1319
physical violence, See Physical violence
preceptive, See Obligatory penalties
prescription of
criminal actions, 1362
penal actions, 1363
privation as, 196
procedure for imposing, 1342 procedures and principles for imposing, 1558
profanation of sacred objects, 1376 profession of faith, failing to make, 833 public arena, restricted to, 1531
purpose of, 1341
quasi-penal measures
discretion of ordinary or superior in imposing, 1348
penances, See Penal penances remedies, See Penal remedies recourse, See Appeal or recourse reduction in number of, 1531; 1532 religion, delicts against, 1364-1969 religious, infra-universal authority over, 1320
remedies, See Penal remedies
remission, See Remission of penalties
remission of, 1532
residence and domicile, violation of obligations regarding, 1396 restraint in use of
extraordinary circumstances for which no explicit canon exists, 1399 imposition of penalties, 1311; 1349 Latae sententiae, restraint in threatening and imposing, 1318; 1319 legislation of, 1315; 1317
rights and obligations regarding Church's right to impose penalties, 1311 protection of rights in imposing, 221
sacred objects, profanation of, 1376
sacred rites, prohibited participation in, 1365
schism, 1364
seal of confession, violation of, 1388
simony, sacraments received through, 1380
simulation of sacraments, 1378; 1379
special obligations, violations of, 1392-1396 strict interpretation of law, 18
support of cleric subject to, provision for, 1350 suspension as form of, See Suspension as penalty suspension of, See Suspension of penalties
temporal goods of Church, See Temporal goods of Church territorial scope of, 1351
theological rationale for, 1530-1531 transfer of office as, 223
trials
imposition or declaration of penalties as object of, 1400 reprehensible actions by advocates and procurators, 1488
respect and obedience, penalties for lack of, 1470
tribunal judges and ministers, abuse of office by, 1457
types of, 1312; 1530
unity of Church, delicts against, 1364-1969
universal, 1315; 1532
usurpation of ecclesiastical office, 1381
violence, See Physical violence waiver of, 1345
withdrawal from contumacy, effect of, 1347
Penance, 959; 1138-1142
1917 Code, 1139-1140; 1167
absolution
accomplice in sins against sixth commandment, 977 conditions for granting, 980 form of, 1141
general confession and absolution, See General confession and absolution individual, 960; 1140
rights and obligations, 980
solicitation of sexual sins in confession, false denunciators of, 982
accomplices
names of, confessor to refrain from asking, 979
sins against sixth commandment, absolution of accomplice in, 977; 1378
act of contrition
danger of death, in cases of, 962
general confession and absolution, 962
acts of satisfaction, See subhead penances imposed administration, licit, 844
age of penitent
confessor obliged to pay proper attention to, 978
frequency of confession after reaching age of discretion, 989
Apostolic Penitentiary, 486
general confession, instruction issued during World War II on, 961 indulgences, concession and use of, 1173 canonical (as opposed to sacramental) censures, remission of, 1142
catechesis, 962; 963
children, See subhead minor children church or oratory, use of, 964 clerics' duty to approach, 276 conferences of bishops to establish norms regarding confessionals, 964
confessionals, 964
confessors as ministers of, See Confessors confidentiality of confession, 983; 984
danger of death
absolution of accomplice in sins against sixth commandment, 977
act of contrition, 962
confessors, 976; 986
general confession and absolution in cases of, 961
rights and obligations regarding, 986
defined, 959
delicts involving, 1586 diocesan bishops' determination of need for general confession and absolution, 961 disposition of penitent, 987; 1167-1168 absolution, granting, 980 age and condition of penitent, proper attention paid to, 979 frequency of confession, 989
general confession and absolution, requirements for licit, 962 penances imposed, obligation of penitent to fulfill personally, 981 restrictions on confessors as to penitents heard, 985 sins penitent is obliged to confess, 988
Eastern code, 37; 961; 964; 1138
ecumenical involvement, 1167
Eucharist
first Communion, penance prior to, 914
public sinners, prohibition of Eucharist to, 915
serious sins, obligation to confess before taking Communion, 916
form of celebration of, 1143 conferences of bishops to establish norms regarding, 964
place of celebration of, 964
reform of, 1139; 1140-1142; 1167-1168
freedom of penitent to choose confessor, 991
frequency of confession after reaching age of discretion, 989
general confession and absolution, See General confession and absolution individual confession and absolution general confession and absolution, following, 962; 963 ordinary means of penance, 960 rite of, 1140

indulgences, See Indulgences
interpreters
knowledge of sins confessed, use of, 983; 984
use of, 990
kind of sins, confession of, 988
knowledge of sins confessed, use of, 983; 984
licit administration, 844
marriage, received prior to, 1065
metanoia, 1168
ministers of, See Confessors
minor children
age of penitent, confessor obliged to pay proper attention to, 978
catechesis, 962; 963
first Communion, prior to, 914
frequency of confession after reaching age of discretion, 989
non-Catholic ministers, reception by Catholics of sacraments from, 844
non-Catholics receiving sacraments from Catholic ministers, 844
novices and seminary students, 985
number of sins, confession of, 988
penances imposed, 981
false denunciators of solicitation in confession, 982
indulgences, See Indulgences obligation of penitent to fulfill personally, 981 place of celebration of liturgy, 964 questions asked in, 977
reform of, 1138-1142; 1167-1168
religious confessors, availability of, 630
duties regarding, 664
freedom regarding exercise of, 630
rights and obligations
absolution, right to, 980
danger of death, 986
freedom to choose confessor, 991
frequency of confession, 989 opportunity to have confession heard, 986 penances given, obligation to perform personally, 981
sins penitent is obliged to confess, 988 satisfaction, acts of, See subhead penances imposed seal, violation of, 1388
secular institutes, 719
seminaries
confessors, availability of, 240 frequent practice of penance, 246 students and novices, 985
several penitents, rites for general confession and absolution, 961; 1140-1141
individual confession and absolution, 1140
sexual sins
accomplice, absolution of, 1378
false denunciators of solicitation in confession, 982; 1387; 1390
solicitation in confession, 1387
expiatory penalties for, 1387
false denunciators of, 982; 1387; 1390
simulation of, 1378
sui juris church members receiving sacraments from Catholic ministers, 844
theology of, 959
translators
knowledge of sins confessed, use of, 983; 984
use of, 990
Vatican Council II, 1138; 1167
Penance and fasting, days of, See Sacred times Penances
judicial, See Penalties sacramental, See Penance, subhead penances imposed Pensions, See Retirement
People of God, 241-245, See also Ecclesiology apostolic life, members of societies of, 207 baptism as initiation into, 204; 205; 243 catechumens as part of, 206
clerics as, 207
common priesthood of faithful and ministerial priesthood, interrelationship of, 207 communion (communio), as, 204; 242-245 consecrated life through profession of evangelical counsels, persons living, 207 definition of the Christian faithful, 204
Eastern code, 241
equality of all peoples, 208; 255
full communion, what constitutes, 205
hermits as part of, 207 hierarchical structure of, 207
lay people as, 207
Lumen gentium, influence of, 242
major divisions of, 207
munera or threefold functions of Jesus, participation of all People of God in, 207; 208; 254 obligations of, See Rights and obligations of Christian faithful religious as, 207
rights of, See Rights and obligations of Christian faithful secular institutes, members of, 207 sinners in Church, recognition of presence of, 257 states of defined and enumerated, 207
freedom from coercion in choosing state in life, 219
Peregrinus, See Travelers
Peremptory exceptions, 1462
Perfect society ecclesiology, 1530 Perfectae caritatis authority exercised by religious superiors, 618 formation of religious, 806 general chapters of religious, 631
preaching role of religious, 758
secular institutes, 710; 713; 724
Perjury before ecclesiastical authority
penalties for, 1368
Perpetual adoration of Eucharist, 942
Perpetual (irrevocable) penalties
indeterminate circumstances, restraint to be exercised in, 1349
judicial procedure used only for, 1532
restraint in threatening, 1319
Perpetual profession of religious, See Religious Persecution or captivity separation of non-baptized partners due to, 1149
Personal parishes, 518
Personal prelatures, 394-395
Apostolic See
erected by, 294; 394-395 statutes established by, 295 associations, not classified as, 394
conferences of bishops, 294
distribution of clergy, set up for purposes of, 294 financial support of members, responsibility for, 295
formation of clerics, 295
hierarchical constitution, relationship to, 394-395
historical background, 394-395 lay people, involvement of, 296 local ordinary, relationship with, 297
major seminaries, 295
particular churches, not classified as, 394
purpose of, 294
secular presbyters and deacons, consisting of, 294
seminaries, 295
spiritual formation of members, responsibility for, 295 statutes and government of, 295
Vatican Council II, 394-395
Personal privileges, 78
Personal vows, 1192
Personalist view of marriage, 1238-1239
Personalities
baptism, conferred by, 849 juridic, See Juridic personality Peter the Apostle (Saint)
Apostolic See as continuation of office of, 331
Peter-apostles/pope-bishops analogy and hierarchical constitution of Church, 330; 424
Peter Lombard, 1236; 1360; 1361

Petition or libellus
acceptance of, 1505
administrative recourse suspension of decree effect of execution of petition, 1736 petition assumed to ask for, 1734
time period
decision on petition, 1735
submitting petition, 1734
waiver of petition, 1734
written petition requirement, 1734
appeal or recourse
administrative recourse, See subhead administrative recourse introduction of new grounds for petition at appeal stage, 1639 rejection of petition, appealing, 1505 citations, attached to, 1508 complaint of nullity against the sentence based on impropriety of, 1620 contents of, 1502; 1504 decree accepting, 1507
defined, 1503
failure of judge to respond to, 1506
fumus boni iuris, presence of, 1505
incidental cases, 1587
intervention by third parties in trials, 1596
marriage nullity
abeyance, holding in, 1676
acceptance of, 1677
death of one or both spouses, 1675
oral contentious process, 1658 oral petition, acceptance of, 1503
ordination, 1036
ordination, nullity of competency or incompetency to receive petition, 1709 prohibition of exercise of orders due to sending of petition, 1709
right to petition, 1708
penal process, 1721
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions
acceptance of, 1699
rejection of petition, appeal of, 1699
right to petition, 1697
rejection of, 1505
required presentation of, 1501 response to, 1505
restitutio in integrum, petition for, 1647; 1648 singular decrees and precepts, presumptive negative response of authority to request for, 57
time period
administrative recourse decision on petition, 1735
submitting petition, 1734 response to petition, 1505; 1506
written requirements, 1503
Petitioners at trial, 1476, See also Parties at trial absent petitioners, 1594; 1595
appeals made by respondents, benefiting from, 1637 guardians and curators, See Guardians and curators
insanity, incapacity, or incompetency, 1478
minor children, 1478
oral contentious process, 1659; 1660
presence of, 1477
Petrine office, See Apostolic See
Petrine privilege, See "In favor of the faith" marriage dissolutions Pfaff, Christoph Matthäus, 423 Philippines
plenary councils, convocation of, 578 Philo, 1235
Philosophical instruction
formation of clerics, 251
Physical persons, 96-112; 140
Physical violence
bishops, attacks on, 1370
clerics
attacks by, 1370
attacks on, 1370
contempt for Church, prompted by, 1370
dismissal from clerical state for, 1395 force, use of, See Force, prohibition on use of homicide, See Homicide kidnapping or detention, 1397 pope, attacks on, 1370 religious, attacks on, 1370
separation of spouses, as grounds for, 1153
sexual sins by clerics or religious involving, 1395 wounding or mutilation, 1397
Pilarczyk, Daniel E. (Archbishop), 961 Pilgrimages to shrines, 1230
Pilla, Anthony M. (Bishop), 962
Pio-Benedictine Code
particular councils, 441
Pious causes
gifts given for, 1299
Pious foundations, 1303
autonomous pious foundations, 1303 documentation, 1306; 1307
non-autonomous pious foundations, 1303
acceptance of, 1304
administration of, 1305
defined, 1303
obligations, composition and display of list of, 1307 orally-made, 1306
reduction of Mass obligations, 1308
written requirements, 1306
Pious trusts, 1302
Pious unions, See Associations
Pious wills
alteration or modification of terms, 1308-1310; 1521 Apostolic See's permission for modification of, 1308; 1310
executors, 1301
gifts given in, 1300; 1301
impossibility of fulfilling imposed obligations, 1310 Mass obligations, modifying, 1308; 1309; 1521 ordinaries, modification by, 1310 pious trusts as form of, 1302
reduction of Mass obligations, 1308 stipulations as to executor, 1301 transfer of Mass obligations, 1309
Pius V (Pope)
polygamy, 1370
Pius VII (Pope), 1387
Pius X (Pope)
Apostolic Signatura, restoration of, 1445 Eucharist, admission of children to, 1068 liturgical office of active participation in celebrations, 835
radical sanations of invalid marriages, 1387
Roman Curia, reform and reorganization of, 12; 477 Roman rota, reconstitution of, 1444
Pius XI (Pope)
Deus scientiarum Dominus, significance of, 14 Eastern code, development of, 27-28
marriage, 1238
missionary activities, 791
Pauline privilege, 1361
Thérèse of Lisieux declared patron saint of missions by, 783
Pius XII (Pope)
definition of liturgy, 834
Eastern code, reception of draft of, 28 forced conversions, comments on, 787
marriage, 1239
procedural law promulgated for Eastern churches, 1754 sacraments, matter and form of, 1018-1019 scientific or absolute certainty, 1084 secular institutes, documents regarding, 878 servers at Eucharist, 906 Place or location baptismal celebrations, See Baptism, subhead place of celebration of burials, 1180
cemeteries, 1240
confirmation, celebration of, 881
Eucharist
celebration of, 931; 932
reservation of, 936
funerals, 1177
indulgences attached to places, 1172 Marriage, celebration of, 1115; 1118; 1127 mixed marriages, celebration of, 1127
ordination, 1011
penance, celebration of liturgy of, 964 sacred places, See Sacred places
trials
judges outside territory, 1469
stable or established place, 1468
witnesses, place of examination of, 1558

Platonic philosophy, 1235
Pleadings, 1602
Plenary assemblies
Roman Curia, 480
Plenary councils, 439
1917 Code, 439
Apostolic See, 439
authority to convoke, 439
conference of bishops, 439
defined, 439
dispensations from laws issued by, 88
ecclesiastical provinces whose boundaries coincide with territory of nation, 439 Poland and Philippines, convoked in, 578
purpose of, 439
Plenary indulgences
defined, 992
limitation of, reasons for, 1172 totes quoties plenary indulgences, suppression of, 1172-1173 Poland
plenary councils, convocation of, 578 Pole, Reginald (Cardinal), 1387 Polish National Catholic Church in U.S. and Canada
sacramental sharing, 844
Political authorities, See Civil authority Political office
clerics prohibited from, 285; 287 deacons allowed to hold, 285; 288
religious prohibited from, 672 Political organizations
clerics' membership in, 278; 287
deacons' membership in, 288
religious' membership in, 672
Political societies, See Civil authority
Polygamy, 1148; 1361; 1370
Ponens or relators
tribunals, 1429; 1610
Pontiff, See Apostolic See Pontifical Biblical Commission
The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church, 25
Pontifical Commission for Social Communications media communications, instructions as to, 772; 822
Pontifical councils generally, 486-488, See also specific pontifical councils Pontifical Council Cor Unum, 487 Pontifical Council for Culture, 488
Pontifical Council for Dialogue with Non-Believers, 488
Pontifical Council for the Family, 487
Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts (PCILT), 16; 488 retired diocesan bishops, norms for, 402
Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue, 488
Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace, 487 Pontifical Council for the Laity, 487 clerics' role within lay associations, 275
Pontifical Council for Pastoral Assistance to Health Care Workers, 487-488
Pontifical Council for the Pastoral Care of Migrants and Itinerant People, 487
Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, 487
Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism, issuance of, 16; 755
Pontifical Council for Social Communications, 488 Pontifical Missionary Works, 791
Pontifical University Urbaniana, Rome
Institute for Missionary Catechesis, 785
Poor, obligation to assist
rights and obligations of Christian faithful, 222
sacraments, administration of, 848
Pope and papacy, See Apostolic See, and names of specific popes Populis
polygamy, 1370
Portugal
presbyteral confirming, 1067
Possession of office, taking, See Taking possession of office
Possessory actions, 1500
Postulation, 180; 218
acceptance of postulation by candidate, 183 admittance, 183
authority to confirm, 182
defined, 180; 218
formula for expression of, 181 rejection, 183
time period of submitting, 182 votes required for, 181 Potissimum instituti formation of religious, 806 Poverty, vow of
consecrated life, institutes of, 600
religious raised to episcopate, 706
simplicity of life, clerics required to pursue, 282 temporal goods of Church and, 1451
Power, David
Application of Mass, 1130
Power of governance authority, See Authority
executive power, See Executive power generally, See Ecclesiastical governance judicial powers, See Judicial powers legislative powers, See Legislative powers Pragmatic positivism
canon law theory, 4
Prayer
clerics' duty to engage in, 276 consecrated life, traditions and documents of institutes of, 587 indulgences attached to, 997
norms of Church, in keeping with, 839
religious, obligations of, 663
sanctifying function of Church carried out by, 839
secular institutes, 719
Prayer books
publication of, 826
Preaching, 747; 924
accommodation of congregation preached to, 769
bishops
homily, 767
lay people given permission to preach by, 766 norms issued by, observance of, 772
principal duty of, 762 right to preach everywhere, 763 clerics' obligation to preach, 276; 762 congregation preached to, accommodation of, 769
content of, 768
deacons
homily, 767
principal duty of, 762
rights and restrictions, 764
defined, 924
diocesan bishops, 386
duty of Church to preach gospel, 747
Eastern code, 764; 768
homily, 767
importance of, 762
lay preaching, 274; 766
means of ministry of divine word, as, 761
media communications, 772
non-believers, to, 771 norms issued by bishop, observance of, 772 outreach efforts, 771
priesthood
homily, 767
obligation to preach, 276
principal duty of, 762
rights and restrictions, 764
religious lay religious, preaching by, 766 permission to preach to, 765
restrictions on dcacons and presbyters, 764
lay preaching, 766
religious, permission to preach to, 765
rights and obligations, See Rights and obligations of Christian faithful sacred ministers, principal duty of, 762
sacred missions, 770
scripture discussion groups, 770
special forms of, 770
spiritual exercises, 770
Vatican Council II
importance of, 762
role of presbyters, deacons, and bishops in, 764
women, 766
Preceptive penalties, See Obligatory penalties Precepts, pcnal, 1319

Precepts, singular, See Singular decrees and precepts Preemption
contentious trials, See Trials, subhead abatement or preemption Prefecture for Economic Affairs of the Holy See, 489
Prefecture of the Papal Household, 489
Prelatures
1917 Code, 394
1983 Code, 394
historical background, 394
nature of, 394
nullius dioeceseos, See Territorial prelatures personal, See Personal prelatures Presbyteral councils of particular churches, 652-653
apostolic vicariates and prefectures, 495
cessation of, 501
consultative vote only, 500
convocation of, 500
defined, 495
diocesan bishop
appointment of members by, 497
assistance provided to, 495
convocation of council by, 500 no power of action without, 500 statutes, approval of, 496
Eastern code, 652
election of members, 497-499; 655
establishment of, 495
ex officio members, 497
incardinated priests, 498
membership, 497-499; 655
parish presbyteral councils opinion on erection, suppression, or alteration of parishes, diocesan bishops required to listen to, 515
parish pastoral council, opinion on establishing, 536
particular councils, participants in, 443
pastors, views on suitability of, 524
powers of, 500
purpose of, 495
religious, 498
secular priests, incardinated or resident, 498 senate of bishop, likened to, 495
statutes, 496
term of office of, 501
vacant diocesan sees, 501
Vatican Council II, 652-653
vicars forane as members of, 555
Presbyterorum ordinis
adapting preaching to congregation, 769
association and assembly, right of, 278
celibacy of priesthood, affirmation of, 277
common life of clergy, 280
continuing education of clergy, 279
diocesan bishops' relationship with presbyters, 384
eucharistic canons, 904
formation of clerics, 232
holy life, duty of clerics to lead, 275
obedience and reverence to pope and local ordinary, cleric's duty of, 273
ordination, 1193
personal prelatures not part of hierarchical constitution, 394 preaching as ministerial priority, 762
preaching role of presbyters and deacons, 757 remuneration for priests, 531
secular institutes, 713
spiritual formation, 245
universal Church, instruction in solicitude for, 257 vacations, clerics' right to, 282 voluntary poverty, clerics urged to embrace, 282 Worker Priests, reference to, 285
Presbyters, See Priesthood Prescription, 197; 230 acquisitive, 230
civil authority
civil terms for prescription, 230 reception by Church as to, 197
defined, 230
exemptions, 199
extinctive, 230
good faith requirement for validity of, 198 liberative, 230
penalties
criminal actions, 1362
penal actions, 1363
Roman law, concept derived from, 230 schools, prescripts issued for, 806 temporal goods, See Temporal goods of Church
validity, 198
Presumed death of spouse, 1707; 1798
Presumptions, 1584; 1697
defined, 1584
distinguishing legal from human presumptions, 1584
fatherhood, 1138
human presumptions
distinguished from legal presumptions, 1584
force of, 1586
imputability in cases of external violation, 1321 innocence until proven guilty, 1321
juridic acts, 124
legal presumptions distinguished from human presumptions, 1584
force of, 1585
legitimacy or illegitimacy of children, 1138
marriage, See Marriage privileges, perpetualness of, 78 proof, not requiring, 1526
singular decrees and precepts
presumptive communication of, 1584; 1697 presumptive negative response of authority as to issuance of, 57 Previous law effect of new code on, 6
Priesthood
age restrictions, 1031 alcoholic priests, celebration of Eucharist by, 924
anointing of the sick
blessing of oil by priest, 999
minister of sacrament, as, 1003
pastoral responsibilities to the sick, 1001 baptismal ministers, priests as, 861
blessings, ministers of, 1169
candidates for, See Formation cardinals, presbyteral order of, 350 catechesis, responsibilities regarding, 773; 776
common priesthood of Christian faithful, 836
common priesthood of faithful and ministerial priesthood, interrelationship of, 207 confessors, as, 965; 1151
confirmation, ministers of, See Confirmation consecrations, ministers of, 1169
dedications, ministers of, 1169
diocesan bishops' relationship with presbyters, 384
dispensations, authority to grant, 89
divine word, role of presbyters in ministry of, 757
education
formation of clerics, See Formation responsibilities regarding education of faithful, 794
Eucharist, See Eucharist
exorcism, specific permission to perform, 1172
formation of clerics, See Formation illegitimate exercise of, 1384
impeded diocesan sees, priests as interim leaders of, 413 judicial vicars, requirements for, 1420 lay ecclesial involvement in ministerial priesthood, 17-18; 292 liturgical ministers, as, 835; 836
marriage celebration, role in, 1108; 1109; 1246
married clerics and religious, See Married clerics and religious mature vocations, 233
missionary activities
individual priest designated to promote missions in each diocese, 791 priests as missionaries, 784
notaries, 483
ordination, sacrament of, See Ordination
particular councils, participants in, 443
pastors required to be presbyters, 519; 521 penance, ministry of, 965; 1151

preaching, See Preaching requirements for candidates, 241 residence and domicile requirements, See Residence of clerics shortage of priests
candidates for ordination, 1025
ways of handling, 517
vocations, See Vocations
witnesses and witness testimony, 1548; 1550
Worker Priests, 285
Primacy of papacy, 331; 333
appeal or recourse against Apostolic See denial of primacy, as, 1372
lack of, 333; 426; 1372; 1629; 1732
review of confirmations by pontiff, 1405 episcopal assistance in exercise of, 334 exercise of primacy, 333; 334
hierarchical constitution of Church, 425-426; 429
vacancy or impediment, exercise of primacy during, 335
Vatican Council I, arising out of, 333
Vatican Council II, language of, 429 Primates, 438
Primo feliciter
secular institutes, 710; 878 Prisoners
sacramental sharing, 844
seal of confession, violation of, 1388
Privacy
rights and obligations of Christian faithful, 220
Private associations of the faithful, See Associations
Private chapels, 1433
authority to grant permissions concerning, 1226; 1228
bishops, 1227
blessings, 1229
defined, 1226
permission to establish, 1226 permission to hold sacred celebrations in, 1228
Private documents
falsification of, 1391
Private juridic persons, 116
temporal goods
ownership, 1257
sacred objects, acquisition of, 1269
U.S. church-related institutions, canonical status of, 174 Private vows, 1192; 1416
Privation, 184; 196
penal law, 196
penalty, as, 196
procedures for, 196
reasons for, 196
vacant diocesan sees due to, 416 Privileges, 76; 122, See also Rights and obligations of Christian faithful abuse of power given by, 84 acquired or granted by Apostolic Sce, 4
Apostolic See
abuse of privilege power, notification of, 84
acquired or granted by, 4
authority to grant
acquired or granted by Apostolic See, 4
cessation of privilege based on judgment of competent authority, 83 expiration of authority granting privilege, 81
cessation, 79
abuse of power given by privilege, due to, 84 competent authority, judgment of, 83
expiration of authority granting privilege, 81
lack of use or contrary use not leading to, 82 legitimate prescription, via, 82 perpetualness, presumption of, 78
personal privileges, 78
real privileges, 78
renunciation of privilege, 80
time period, lapse of, 83
contrary use, 82
defined, 76
expiration of authority granting privilege, 81
interpretation of, 77
lack of use, 82
perpetualness of, 78
personal privileges, 78
real privileges, 78
renunciation, 80
rescripts containing, 75
shrines, 1233
singular administrative acts, usually granted by, 76
types of, 78
Procedural law
administrative, See Administrative procedure
Eastern code, 40-41 judicial, See Judicial procedure
pastors
removal of, See Removal of pastors transfer of, See Transfer of pastors rights, protection of, 221
Processions outside church
pastors' duties regarding, 530
Proclamatory ministries missionary activity, See Missionary activity
preaching, See Preaching profession of faith, See Profession of faith Procurators at trials, See Advocates and procurators Profanation
sacred objects, 1171; 1376
sacred places, 1210; 1211
Profane use altars in buildings relegated to, 1238 church buildings relegated to, 1221 oratories relegated to, 1224
Profession of faith, 19-22
1917 Code, 833
1967 creed, 19
1989 developments, 19-20; 833
1998 developments, 20-22
anti-modernist oath, replacement of, 19 avoidance of contrary teachings, 750 bishops required to take, 380; 833
Eastern code, 20; 833
full communion, as bond indicating, 205 historical background to canons regarding, 19-22 inseparability of core doctrines, 750 obligation to make, 833
penalty for failure to hold required beliefs, 20; 1371 procedures for making, 833 required beliefs and core doctrines, 750
Trent profession, 19
Vatican Council I profession, 19
Profession of religious, See Religious Professors, See Teachers Program for Priestly Formation, NCCB formation of clerics and rules for seminaries, 232-261
Promise to marry, 1062
Promissory notes
clerics must have permission to sign, 285
Promissory oaths, 1201
Promoters of justice
appeals, 1628; 1636
appointment of, 1430; 1435
clerics as, 1435
complaint of nullity against the sentence, eligibility to lodge, 1626 diocesan bishop, appointment by, 1431; 1435 intervention by, 1431
lay people as, 1435
marriage nullity
challenges to marriages by promoter, 1674
inspection of judicial acts, 1678
presence at examinations, 1678
need to cite, 1433
penal process
appeal or recourse, 1727
renunciation of trial, 1724 role in, 1721
qualifications, 1435
questions presented to judge by, 1533
removal of, 1436
rights, 1434
same person as promoter and defender, 1436
separation of spouses, 1696
Pronouncements at trial, See Trials, subhead pronouncement and sentencing Pro-nuncios, 363
Proofs, 1668
admissibility, 1527
appeal stage, at, 1639
conclusion of case, admission of new proofs after, 1600
documents, 1539
expert witnesses, 1575

witnesses and witness testimony, 1547
baptism, See Baptism
blessings, 1209
burden of proof, 1526
judicial confessions, effect of, 1536
who bears, 1526
concordant judgments, new and grave proofs required for appeal or recourse following, 1644
confirmation, 894; 895; 1092
convalidation of marriage
defects of consent, provable/public and unproven/occult, 1159 impediments public/provable or unprovable/occult, 1158
custom, 94
dedications, 1209
defined, 1668
delicts, commission of, 1321 documents, through
admissibility, 1539 altered documents, 1543
civil documents, 1540
conclusion of case, introduction of new documents after, 1600 copies, authentication of, 1544 danger of harm from producing, 1546 defects in, 1543
deposition of, 1544
ecclesiastical documents, 1540
experts
documentation turned over to, 1577 reports by, See Witnesses and witness testimony, subhead reports by experts order to produce, 1545; 1546 originals, importance of, 1544
private documents, 1540; 1542
public documents, 1540; 1541
restitutio in integrum, requiring, 1645 withholding, 1546
false, 1645
forum of proofs for marriage nullity cases, 1673
infallibility, need for manifest evidence of, 749 joinder of the issue, prohibition on proof-gathering prior to, 1529
judicial confessions, effect of, 1536
marriage nullity, See Marriage nullity matters not requiring, 1526 novitiate, evidence of free status prior to entering, 645
oral contentious process collection of proofs for, 1663
limits on new evidence, 1665
second hearing for proofs not collected at time of original hearing, 1666
ordination, 1053
presumptions not requiring, 1526 publication of the acts (trials), further instruction of case subsequent to, 1598
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions, 1702; 1703 religious institute, collection of proof of reasons for dismissal from, 697
removal of pastors, 1745
rescripts in external forum, 74 restitutio in integrum due to falseness of, 1645
secret marriages, 1130
supporting evidence for witness testimony, 1572; 1573
testimony, See Witnesses and witness testimony time period for gathering, commencement of, 1516 undisputed facts not requiring, 1526
witnesses, See Witnesses and witness testimony Propaganda Fide (Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples), 783; 790 Property, sacred or ecclesiastical, See Temporal goods of Church Protestants and Protestantism collegial constitution of Church, notion of, 423 heresy, apostasy, and schism no longer used in relationship to, 751
marriage, 1057; 1237; 1326; 1342; 1387 married clergymen, permitted ordination of, 277; 291
Protosyncellus
Eastern code, similar to vicar general in, 628 Provida Mater Ecclesia
associates of secular institutes, 725
judicial declarations of parties in marriage nullity cases, 1671 living situations and houses for secular institute members, 714 magna carta of secular institutes, recognized as, 878 marriage cases, treatment of, 1761 priests, secular institutes of, 713
standing to bring an action at trial, 1476
Provinces
ecclesiastical, See Ecclesiastical provinces
religious, 621
Provincial councils, 440
authority in ecclesiastical provinces, 432
authority to convoke, 440
defined, 440
dispensations from laws issued by, 88
ecclesiastical provinces
boundaries of province coinciding with territory of nation, 439 provincial councils for churches of, 440 metropolitan see, not to be convoked during vacancy of, 440
purpose of, 440
Provocation
imputability, circumstances diminishing, 1324
Provost, James H., 277
Proxy
marriages by, See Marriage oaths taken by, 1199
Psychiatric problems, See Insanity, incapacity, or incompetency Public arena of church life, See External forum Public associations, See Associations Public character of marriage form of celebration of marriage ensuring, 1326; 1327 Public delicts
abuse of Church or religion, 1369
defined, 1340
ordination, impediments to, 1041; 1048
sexual sins of clerics and religious, 1395
Public documents
falsification of, 1391
Public good alternative dispute resolution/arbitration in cases involving, 1715 exemption of acts at trial from publication, 1709
funerals, 1184
judicial confessions, probative force of, 1536
marriage impediment, public propriety as, 1093
secret marriages to avoid public scandal, 1130; 1352
separation of spouses, 1696
Public juridic persons, 116
apostolic works of, 172-173
temporal goods of Church, See Temporal goods of Church
U.S. church-related institutions, canonical status of, 173-174 Public office
clerics prohibited from, 285 deacons allowed to hold, 285; 288
religious prohibited from, 672
Public vows, 1192; 1416
Publication of acts at trial, 1598 advocates, review by, 1598 conclusion of case, introduction of new proofs following, 1600 exclusion of certain materials from, 1711 exemption from publication, 1709-1710 further instruction of case subsequent to, 1598 general rule for, 1707-1709
marriage nullity cases
exemption of acts from publication, 1709-1710 right of defense in, 1710-1711 misuse of information, ways of preventing, 1711 motivation behind, 1707
oral contentious process, formal publication not required for, 1757
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions, 1703 review of acts prior to, 1708 validity of process, 1708

witnesses and witness testimony, 1709; 1711
Publication of laws, 8
Publication of sentence at trial, 1614; 1615
Publications, See Books and written publications

Quam singulari
Eucharist, admission of children to, 1068
Quasi-contract
tribunal of, 1411
Quasi-domicile, 100
acquisition of, 102
diocesan domicile or quasi-domicile, 102
loss of, 106
marriage, 1115; 1340
minor children, 105
parochial domicile or quasi-domicile, 102 pastors and ordinaries acquired through, 107
tribunal of, 1408; 1673
Quasi-parishes, 516
Quasi-penal measures
discretion of ordinary or superior in imposing, 1348
penances, See Penal penances
remedies, See Penal remedies Quebec Missionary Society
founding of, 784
Quinquennial Report, 399
absences from diocese, reporting, 394
ad limina visit in year required to submit, 400
Quod non est in actis non est in mundo, 74; 1604

Radical sanation of invalid marriage, 1161; 1387-1388
Apostolic See, 1165
authority and competency to grant, 1165 awareness of parties, significance of, 1164 consent, defects of, 1162
defined, 1161
diocesan bishops, 1165
effect of, 1161
form, defects of, 1163
historical background, 1387-1388 simultaneous sanation of more than one marriage, 1165
Radio, See Media communications Rahner, Karl, 128; 1253 Ratio fundamentalis institutionis sacerdotalis
formation of clerics, 232-238
Ratio peccati
trials, 1401
Ratum et consummatum
indissolubility of marriages that are both ratified and consummated, 1061; 1141
Ratum et non consummatum dissolutions, 1142; 1791-1792
1917 Code, 1791-1792
1983 Code, 1791-1792
advocates not allowed in cases of, 1701
Apostolic See
acceptance of petition, consultation on, 1699
adjudication by, 1698
grant of dispensation, notification of, 1706 Pontiff's sole right to grant, 1698
rejection of petition, appeal of, 1699
supplemental instruction required by, 1705 transmission of acts to, 1705
appeal or recourse
grounds for resubmission by legal expert, 1705
rejection of petition, 1699
competency or incompetency to accept petitions for, 1699
contradiction of proofs, 1703
defenders of the bond, 1701
diocesan bishops, 1699; 1700; 1704
dispensation, referred to as, 129; 1697
documentation of, 1706
expert advisors to parties, 1701; 1705
grant of dispensation, notification of, 1706
instruction of the case, 1700; 1704 marriage nullity case transferred to, 1681 marriage nullity petition introduced as well as, 1700 petition or libellus (trials)
acceptance of, 1699
rejection of petition, appeal of, 1699
right to petition, 1697
proofs, 1702; 1703
publication of acts at trial, 1703
rejection of petition, appeal of, 1699
request to show proofs, 1703
rights
Apostolic See's sole right of adjudicating and deciding, 1698
Church's right to judge cases of, 1671
petition, right of, 1697
spousal right to petition for, 1697 supplemental instruction required by Apostolic See, 1704
tribunals, 1698; 1700
votum or opinion
preparation of, 1704
transfer of marriage nullity case, 1681
Ratzinger (Cardinal), 274
Real and local indulgences
suppression of, 1172
Real privileges, 78
Real vows, 1192
Reason, age of, 97
anointing of the sick, 1005
baptism of children who have reached catechetical age, 850; 852
binding force of ecclesiastical laws and, 11
confirmation of children, 891; 1067-1068; 1069 Eucharist, rception of, 913; 914; 1068 Reason, use of age requirements, 11; 97, See also Reason, age of binding force of ecclesiastical laws and, 11
imputability, See Imputability lack of use of reason, See Insanity, incapacity, or incompetency marriage, consent required for, 1095 vows, capacity to make, 1191
Rebukes
penal remedies as, 1339
Rebuttal at trial, 1603
Reciprocity
sacramental sharing, 844
Reconciliation
alternative dispute resolution (ADR)
administrative recourse, as form of, 1733
judicial procedure, instead of, 1713-1716
judicial procedure and, See Settlements sacrament of, See Penance Reconventio (counterclaims), 1462; 1495
Records and recordkeeping, See Documents and documentation Recourse, See Appeal or recourse Rectors
churches, of, 556
appointment of, 557
liturgy, celebration of, 559; 561; 562
parochial ceremonies assigned to, 558; 560 parochial ceremonies not to be performed by, 558 removal of rector, 563 rights, duties, and obligations, 558; 562 use of church, permission of rector required for, 561
seminaries, See Seminaries
confessors of students, 985
diocesan synods, members of, 463
duties of, 261
obedience owed to, 260
parochial authority of, 262
particular councils, participants in, 443 representation by, 238 requirement for, 239
Redemptoris missio
missionary activities, 938
Refugees
chaplains for persons deprived of ordinary pastoral care, 568 separation of non-baptized partners due to persecution or captivity, 1149 Regimini Ecclesiae universae regional judges, 1423
Roman Curia, Paul VI's reform of, 12; 477 Regional judges and tribunals, 1423; 1439
Regions, ecclesiastical, See Ecclesiastical regions Registers
baptismal, 877
confirmation, 877
death registers, 1182
marriage, See Marriage
ordination, 1053
parochial, 535
secret marriages, 1133

Regolamento Generale della Curia Romana, 476
commissions, 488
competencies of dicasteries, 479 Congregation for Bishops, 484
juridical principles, 480
papal authority over Curia, 480 Reinstatement, See Restitutio in integrum Rejecters of Catholic faith, notorious
funerals, 1184
heresy, apostasy, and schism, See Heresy, apostasy, and schism
marriage, 1071; 1117 Relationships or affinities adoption, 110
blood relationships or consanguinity, 108
marriage
impediment to, 1092 resulting from, 109
rites, 111; 112
Relators or ponens
tribunals, 1429; 1610
Relics
alienation of, 1190 altars, placed in, 1237
Religion
delicts against, 1364-1969
Religious, 607; 770
absence from religious house, 665 abuses, correcting, 683 admission to, 879, See also Novitiate
age restrictions
novitiate of religious order, admission to, 642; 643
perpetual profession, 658
alms, begging for, 1265
apostolate, See subhead mission and apostolate
apostolic life, societies of religious canons applicable to, 732
transfer to or from, 684; 730; 744
Apostolic See
dismissal, confirmation of decree of, 700 enclosed or cloistered nuns, observance of papal cloister by, 606; 667
exclaustration, grant of indult of, 686
nuns, erection of monastery of, 609
only house, suppression of, 616
pontifical right institutes, See subhead pontifical right institutes secular institute or society of apostolic life, transfer to or from, 684 association and assembly, 672
authority
autonomous house, suppression of, 616
director of novices, 650
erection of house of religious institute, 609
exclaustration, grant of indult of, 686
nuns, erection of monastery of, 609
only house, suppression of, 616
superiors
exercise of authority, 618 extent of, 622
suppression of house, 616
temporary vows, separation of members in, 688
transfer to another institute, permission for, 684 works entrusted to religious by diocesan bishops, 681; 682 autonomous houses, See Sui iuris monasteries autonomy
canons regular and monks, religious houses of, 613 diocesan bishop, rights flowing from consent of, 611
nuns, monasteries of, 614; 615 residence and domicile in diocese, prohibition of, 679
sui iuris monasteries, 615
begging for alms, 1265
bishops, becoming, See subhead episcopate, raised to books and written publications, permission regarding, 832 canons regular, autonomy of religious houses of, 613 catechesis by, 778
cemeteries, 1241
changes in motive or purpose, 612
chaplains of lay religious institutes, 567
chapters, 794
assemblies and chapters other than general chapter, 632
general chapter, 631 organs of participation or consultation other than chapters, 633 provincial, regional, or local chapters, 632 character and purposes of institute, right to lead life according to, 611
church buildings
consent to build, 1215
right of clerical institutes to have, 611 Church, mission and apostolate in name of, 675
clerical dress, 668
cloistered orders, 606; 667
commercial activities engaging in, 672
prohibited, 1392
common life, practice of, 607
communion (communio), mission and apostolate carried out in, 675 conferences of major superiors, 708; 709; 876 confession and confessors, 630; 968; 969 confirmation in religious houses or territories within diocesan boundaries, 888 constituted houses of, 608
contemplative orders, 674
continence and celibacy, See Continence and celibacy of religious and clerics continuing education, 672
continuing formation of, 659-661; 826 conversion of the soul, 664
council, 627
decision on dismissal, making, 699
departure of perpetually professed member, grant of indult of, 691 exclaustration, consent required for grant of indult of, 686 expulsion from house in emergency situations, 703
temporary vows, consent required for separation of members in, 688
defined, 607
departure from institute, See subhead separation from institute
diocesan bishops
abuses, correcting, 683
consent to erect house of religious, 609; 611
decision on dismissal, making, 699
ecclesiastical offices, 682
exclaustration, grant of indult of, 686 major superiors, cooperation with, 678
obedience owed to, 678
residence and domicile in diocese, prohibition of, 679 rights entailed by consent to erect house of religious, 611 secular clerics separating from institute, 693
suppression of house, 616
visitations of, 397 works entrusted to religious by, 681; 682
diocesan right institutes
accounting responsibilities regarding temporal goods, 637
alienation of temporal goods, 638
temporary vows, separation of members in, 688
diocesan synods, 463
dismissal, See Dismissal from religious institute
divine word, role in ministry of, 758
dress requirements, 284,668
Eastern code, 35
ecclesiastical governance, 780
moderators, See subhead moderators superiors, See subhead superiors
ecclesiastical offices
appointment to, 682
removal from, 682
ecclesiastical universities and faculties, responsibility to supply students to, 819
enclosure, 606; 667
episcopate, raised to, 874
juridic effect of, 705
poverty, effect on vow of, 706
retired religious bishops, 707
status, 705
erection of houses, 609; 772 aims of institute, usefulness to, 610
authority, 609; 772

canonical erection, 609
constituted houses, 608 financial support, availability of, 610
novitiate houses, 647
nuns, monastery of, 609
particular church, usefulness to, 610
Eucharist
requirements regarding, 663
reservation of, 936
evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty, and obedience avoidance of appearance of extreme wealth or possession of goods, 634 contributions to needs of Church and the poor, 640 diocesan bishop, obedience owed to, 678 episcopate, effect on vow of poverty of religious raised to, 706
profession of, 654
renunciation of personal property, 668
superiors, obedience owed to, 678
exclaustration of members in perpetual vows, 686; 687
expulsion from house in emergency situations, 703 external duties and offices, 671 financial obligations, obtaining permission to undertake, 672
financial support
establishment of house dependent on availability of, 610 obligation of institute regarding, 670
rights and obligations of institute regarding, 670
following of Christ as supreme rule of life, 662
formation of, 879
novitiate, See Novitiate
post-novitiate or continuing formation, 659-661; 826 freedom
coercion in choosing state in life, freedom from, 219 exercise of ecclesiastical function, interference with, 1375 sacrament of penance and direction of conscience, freedom of members regarding, 630
funerals of, 1179
habit of institute, required to wear, 668
health
novitiate, as factor in admission to, 642 separation from institute, as reason for, 689
incardination of clerics, 266; 693
judges, 1427
juridic personality, 634
juridical elements, 607
lay institutes
associations joined to religious orders, 677 chaplains of, 567
mission and apostolate of, 676 occupations or activities normally prohibited, means of approval of, 672 liturgy of the hours, required to observe, 663
local ordinary's power to impose penalties on, 1320
major superiors
absence from religious house, consent for, 665 approval or confirmation of superior's election by, 625 autonomous house moderators as, 613 conferences of, 708; 709; 876
defined, 620
dimissorial letters of ordination, power to issue, 1019 diocesan bishops, cooperation with, 678
expulsion from house in emergency situations, 703 ipso facto dismissal from religious institute, declaration of, 694
novitiate
control over right of admission to, 641
director of novices, 650; 651
proof regarding reasons for dismissal from institute, collecting, 697
transfer to another institute, permission for, 684 warnings regarding dismissal from institute, 697 Marian devotions required of, 663
married clerics and religious, See Married clerics and religious Mass offerings, 952
media communications, 666
military service, 672
mission and apostolate, 843 accommodation by necessary means, 677 apostolic spirit as very nature of religious order, 675 Church, in name of, 675 communion (communio), carried out in, 675
contemplative orders, 674
cooperation between diocesan bishops and major superiors, 678
diocesan bishop, obedience owed to, 678
lay associations joined to religious orders, 677
lay institutes, 676
secular clergy, relationship with, 680
superiors, obedience owed to, 678
Union with God, always proceeding from, 675 witness of consecrated life as primary apostolate, 673
missionary activities
diocesan bishops in missionary territories, relationship to, 790 duties as missionaries, 783 religious as missionaries, 784
moderators
access of dismissed member to supreme moderator, 698
autonomous house moderators as major superiors, 613 chapters, See subhead chapters
council, 627
decision on dismissal, making, 699
departure of perpetually professed member, grant of indult of, 691
exclaustration, grant of indult of, 686
major superiors, See subhead major superiors readmission without burden of repeating novitiate, 690
superiors, See subhead superiors suppression of house, 616
temporary vows, separation of members in, 688 monks, autonomy of religious houses of, 613; 615
novitiate, See Novitiate nuns, monasteries of, See Nuns, monasteries of occupations or activities normally prohibited, 672
only house, suppression of, 616 oratory, constituted house required to have, 608
ordination
celibacy, assumption of obligation of, 1037
dimissorial letters for, 1019
papal legates, role of, 364
particular councils, participants in, 443
pastoral councils, members of, 512
pastors, as, 520; 538
penance
confessors, availability of, 630
duties regarding, 664
freedom regarding exercise of, 630
People of God, as, 207
perpetual profession
admission to, 657
departure from institute of members in perpetual vows, 691; 692
dispensation from, indult of departure as, 692
exclaustration of members in perpetual vows, 686; 687
readmission without burden of repeating novitiate, 690
validity of, 658
personal property of members, 668
physical attacks on, 1370
political activities or membership, 672
pontifical right institutes
departure of perpetually professed member, grant of indult of, 691
dimissorial letters of ordination, power to issue, 1019
temporary vows, consent required for separation of members in, 688

post-novitiate or continuing formation, 659-661; 826 prayer, duties regarding, 663
preaching
lay religious, preaching by, 766
permission to preach to, 765
presbyteral councils of particular churches, 498 profession, 654; 820 anticipation of first profession, 649
dispensation from, indult of departure as, 692
evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty, and obedience, 654
exclusion from further profession, 689
novitiate, end of, 653 perpetual, See subhead perpetual profession renewal of, 657
temporary, See subhead temporary profession vows made in, 607; 654
profession of faith, persons obliged to make, 833
provinces, 621
public vows, 607; 654
public witness of, 607
readmission without burden of repeating novitiate, 690
removal of pastors, 1742
renunciation of personal property, 668 residence and domicile requirements, See Residence of religious retired religious bishops, 707 retreats, duty to make, 663
rights and obligations, 828
absence from religious house, 665
association and assembly, 672
clerical canon applicable to religious, 672
cloistered orders, 606; 667
commercial activities, engaging in, 672 communion (communio), grounded in, 828 conversion of the soul, 664
dispensation from, indult of departure as, 692
dress, 668
enclosure, 606; 667
external duties and offices, 671
financial obligations, obtaining permission to undertake, 672
financial support, 670
following of Christ as supreme rule of life, 662
habit of institute, required to wear, 668
media communications, 666
occupations or activities normally prohibited, 672
penance, 664
personal property of members, 668
political activities or membership, 672 residence and domicile, See Residence of religious spiritual exercises, 663
superiors, duties and responsibilities of, 619; 626 union activities or membership, 672 violations of special obligations, 1392-1396 schools established by, 801
secular clerics
cooperation with, 680
novitiate, admission to, 644; 645
separation from institute, 693
secular institute or society of apostolic life, transfer to or from, 684; 730; 744
separation from institute, 851; 854 assistance for those leaving, 702 clerics, departure of, 693
dismissal, See Dismissal from religious institute exclusion from further profession, 689
expulsion from house in emergency situations, 703
facultative dismissal, 696
imposed exclaustration, 686
ipso facto dismissal from religious institute, declaration of, 694
mandatory dismissal, 695 novitiate, departure from, 653
perpetual vows departure of members in, 691; 692
dispensation from, 692
exclaustration of members in, 686; 687
readmission without burden of repeating novitiate, 690 reporting requirements, 704
temporary vows, separation of members in, 688; 689 transfer to another institute, See subhead transfer to another institute voluntary exclaustration, 686
special obligations, violations of, 1392-1396 spiritual exercises required of, 663
status
dispensation from vows and obligations, indult of departure as, 692 episcopate, religious raised to, 705 exclaustrated members, 687 transferring members, 685
statutes
conferences of major superiors, approval at, 709
temporal goods, administration of, 635
sui iuris monasteries, See Sui iuris monasteries superiors, 617
absence from religious house, consent for, 665 abuses, avoidance of, 626 abuses, correcting, 683
administration of temporal goods, 638
alienation of temporal goods, 638 approval or confirmation of, 625
autonomous house moderators as major superiors, 613
confession and confessors, 630; 968; 969
council, 627
debts and obligations as to temporal goods, responsibility for, 639
designation of, 625
duties and responsibilities of, 619; 626
ecclesiastical offices, 682
election of, 625
exercise of authority by, 618
expulsion from house in emergency situations, 703 extent of authority, 622 external duties and offices, approval of, 671
major superiors, See subhead major superiors mission and apostolate, accommodation by necessary means, 677
obedience owed to, 678
partiality, avoidance of, 626 qualifications and prerequisites for office of, 623
removal of, 624
residence and domicile requirements, 629
term of office of, 624
visitation by, 628
works entrusted to religious by diocesan bishops, 681; 682
suppression of, 616; 772
novitiate houses, 647
sui iuris monasteries, 616
temporal goods, administration of, 797-798
alienation of goods, 634; 638 appearance of excess, immoderate wealth, or accumulation of goods, avoidance of, 634 autonomous houses' accounting responsibilities, 637 capacity to acquire, possess, administer, and alienate, 634 debts and obligations, responsibility for, 639 diocesan institutes' accounting responsibilities, 637 finance officer, 636 novices with debts, admission of, 644 officials, designation of, 638 ordinary and extraordinary administration, 638
personal property of members, 668
regulation by Book V, 635
statutes, 635
temporary profession, 655
dispensation from, indult of departure as, 692
exclusion from further profession, 689
extension of, 657
insanity or ill health during, 689 novitiate, at end of, 653

perpetual profession, as requirement for, 658 separation of members in, 688; 689
termination of, 657
validity of, 656
theology of, 607
third orders, 303; 311; 567
transfer to another institute, 684; 851 consent required for, 684
probationary period, 684 process of transfer, 684
secular institute or society of apostolic life, transfer to or from, 684 status of transferring member, 685
tribunals, 1427; 1651
union activities or membership, 672
visitations
diocesan bishop, 397,683
superiors, 628
vows
authority of religious superior to grant dispensation from, 1196 religious, vows made by, 607; 654
suspension of vows made prior to religious profession, 1198 works proper to institute, right to exercise, 611 Relocation, See headings at Transfer Remedies
juridic acts, repair of damage inflicted by, 128 penal, See Penal remedies
singular administrative acts, remedy for errors in execution of, 45
Remission of penalties, 1566-1567 absent persons, to, 1361
censures, 1357; 1358
coerced remissions, 1360
conditional, 1361
confessors' power to remit, 1357
divulgence of remission or petition for remission, 1361
excommunication, 1357
executive power, viewed as act of, 1354; 1361
expiatory penalties, 1566-1567 external forum, in, 1361
ferendae sententiae
law, penalties established by, 1355
obligatory penalties, 1356
interdict, 1357
internal forum remissions, 1357; 1566-1567
latae sententiae, See Latae sententiae
law, penalties established by, 1355
multiple penalties, 1349
obligatory penalties, 1356
power to remit, 1354
confessors, 1357
law, penalties established by, 1355
obligatory penalties, 1356
reservation of power to remit to Apostolic See, 1354
writing, in, 1361
Removal from ecclesiastical office, 184; 225 clerical state, loss of, 194 communion with Church, defection from, 194 competent authority, by, 192; 193 discretion, offices conferred at, 193 law, removal by, 194 married clerics, 194
pastors, See Removal of pastors
reasons for, 193
stable offices conferred for indefinite periods of time, 193
written requirement, 193
Removal of pastors, 538; 1740
apostolic life, members of societies of, 1742
appeal or recourse, 1745; 1747
assignment of removed pastor to other office, 1746 checklist of steps to be followed in, 1848-1849 communion (communio), detriment or disturbance to, 1741 decree of removal, 1744; 1745 diocesan bishop, role of, 1742 effect of removal, 1747 harmfulness of ministry, 1740 ineffectiveness of ministry, 1740
insanity, incapacity, or incompetency, 1741 neglect or violation of parochial duties, 1741 opposition to removal by pastor, 1745 pension for removed pastor, 1746
procedure for removal, 1742
proofs, 1745
reasons for, 1740; 1741
reassignment of removed pastors, 1746 refusal to resign or respond to allegations, 1744
religious, 1742
reputation, loss of, 1741 resignation of pastor, 1743; 1744
Review Panel, 1742
sexual abuse of minors, 1840-1841 temporal affairs, poor administration of, 1741 Remuneration
clerics, 281
deacons, 281
lay people employed by church, 231
pastors, 531
removal from ecclesiastical office, following, 195
sacraments, administration of, 848
secular institutes, members working for, 718
social justice, 1286
stole fees, See Offerings transfer of office and, 191 transferred bishops, 418
voluntary offerings, See Offerings Renovationis causam
formation of religious, 806
novitiate, admission to, 642
readmission to religious institute without burden of repeating novitiate, 690
Renunciation
ecclesiastical offices
elected person, by, 177
presentation of alternative candidate following, 161
time to decline office, 159
privileges, 80
Reprobation of custom, 5; 24
Reputation
exercise of orders to protect, 1048 false denunciators, damage caused by calumnious denunciations involving delicts other than sexual solicitation, 1390
reparation, need for, 1390
solicitation of sexual sins in confession, accusation of, 982; 1387; 1390 penal preliminary investigations, protection of reputations and, 1717 remittance or petition for remittance of penalty, divulgence of, 1361 removal of pastors due to loss of, 1741
rights and obligations regarding, 220
secret marriages to avoid public scandal, 1130; 1352 sexual sins, punishment of, 1395 suspension of censure or prohibition for purposes of, 220; 1335; 1338; 1352
Res integra, 1512; 1655
Res iudicata, 1641; 1740
appeal of decisions, 1629; 1642
concordant judgments, effect of, 1644
defined, 1740
effect of, 1642
execution of sentence, 1650; 1655
marriage nullity, 1643
ordination, nullity of, 1643; 1712
penal process, 1731
prescription of penal actions, 1363 proposal and adjudication, 1462 religious orders, validity of, 1643 rights flowing from, 1642
Roman Rota, 1444
situations leading to, 1641 stability of law, possessing, 1642
status-of-persons cases, 1643; 1644
Rescripts, 59; 116
Apostolic See, granted by extension by diocesan bishop, 72 loss of clerical state via, 290 return to clerical state via, 293
contrary laws, 73
contrary rescripts, 67
defined, 59
denial of
executor, by, 70
petition of denied favor to other authorities, 64; 65 diocesan bishop, extension of rescript granted by Apostolic See, 72 dispensations, containing, 75 eligibility to request, 60

error or mistake, 66
executors
judgment of, 70
lack of, 62; 63
presentation of rescript to, 69
extension of, 72
external forum, proof in, 74 false statements, 63
governing canons, 75
granting of favor by executor, 70 in forma commissoria, 62; 69
in forma gratiosa, 62; 69 internal forum, use of oral favor in, 74 liberty of recipient in use of, 71 loss of clerical state via rescript of Apostolic See petition for laicization, 290
return to clerical state, 293 notification requirements, 68
obreption, 63
oral granting of, 59; 74
other persons, requesting rescripts for, 61 priority of contrary rescripts, 67 privileges, containing, 75
revocation, 73
Roman Curia, favors denied by, 64
subreption, 63
time of effect of, 62
time of presentation to executor, 69 truth, concealment of, 63 type of singular administrative act, defined as, 35
validity, 63-66
written form, preference for, 74
Reservation of Eucharist, 1122-1123
accessibility of place of reservation, 937 celebration of Mass in place of reservation, 934
exposition of reserved sacrament, 941 lengthy expositions, 942
ministers of, 943
perpetual adoration, 942
processions, 944
rites governing, 941
historical background, 1122
lamp to shine before, 940
obligatory, 934
optional, 934
personal retention or carrying about of reserved hosts, 935 place of reservation, 936 presence of responsible person, 934
processions, 944
quantity of reserved hosts, 939
religious houses and other pious houses, 936
renewal of reserved hosts, 939 secure place, removal to, 938 storage place, 939
tabernacles, 938
veneration of reserved species, See Veneration of Eucharist vessel used for, 939
Reservation of matters to Apostolic See, 135-136
Residence and domicile, 100
abandoned children, 101
acquisition of domicile, 102 clerics, See Residence of clerics diocesan domicile or quasi-domicile, 102
loss of domicile, 106 marriage partners, 104; 1115; 1340
minor children, 101
neophytes, 101
ordinary acquired through, 107 parochial domicile or quasi-domicile, 102
pastors
acquired through residence, 107
requirements regarding, 533
quasi-domicile, See Quasi-domicile religious, See Residence of religious spouses, 104
temporary residents, 100
transients, See Transients travelers, See Travelers tribunal of domicile, 1408; 1673 witnesses, of, 1552
Residence of clerics
coadjutor and auxiliary bishops, 410
confessors
cessation of confessional faculty on loss of domicile, 975
externs, 971
grant of faculty from competent superior, 967 dean and assistant dean of cardinals required to reside in Rome, 352
diocesan administrators, 429
diocesan bishops, 394
expiatory penalties involving territorial restrictions, 1337 obligations regarding, penalties for violations of, 1396
parochial vicars, 550
pastors, 533
presbyteral councils of particular churches, membership of, 498
rights and obligations, 283
suspensions not affecting right of, 1333 Residence of religious, 103; 665
absence from religious house, 665
canonically erected houses, 609
constituted houses, 608
erection of houses of, See Religious, subhead erection of houses novitiate houses, 647
prohibition from presiding in diocese for grave cause, 679 religious superiors, 629
Resignation, 184; 221
authority to accept, 189
cardinals, 354
defined, 221
diocesan administrators, 430
diocesan bishops, 401 eligibility to resign, 187 emeritus title, retention of, 184 error or mistake, by, 188 fear, out of, 188
juridic act, as, 187
malice, due to, 188
papal legates, 367
pastors, 538; 1743; 1744
pope, 332
procedures for, 189
revocation, 189
Roman Curia, role in, 354
simony, due to, 188
validity, 187-189
Respondents, 1476, See also Parties at trial absent respondents citation, reception of, 1592 consequences of absence, 1592 declaration of absence, 1592 expenses occasioned by, 1595 inability to locate respondent, 1592 subsequent participation of, 1593 appeals made by petitioners, benefiting from, 1637
citations
absent respondents' reception of, 1592 immediate and simultaneous communication of, 1508
forum, 1407; 1409
guardians and curators, See Guardians and curators
insanity, incapacity, or incompetency, 1478
minor children as, 1478
oral contentious process, 1659; 1660
presence of, 1477
protection of, 1499 Restitutio in integrum, 1645; 1744 appellate tribunal, issues adjudicated before, 1646 contrary judgments, 1645
defined, 1744
denial of petition for, 1648 documents establishing new facts, 1645 false proofs or deceit of parties, 1645 grant of petition for, 1648 manifest injustices, what counts as, 1645
minor children, 1646
neglect of provision of law, due to, 1645 original judge, issues adjudicated before, 1646 petitions for, 1647; 1648
reasons for granting, 1645
time limits, 1646
Restrictive interpretation of law, 16
Retirement
clerics, support for, 281
coadjutor and auxiliary bishops, 411
diocesan bishops
age or ill health, 401
coadjutor and auxiliary bishops, 411
religious, 707
status of retired bishops, 402
support for, 402

titular bishops, retired diocesan bishops regarded as, 376
pastors, 538
religious bishops, 707
removed pastors, pensions for, 1746
Retreats
clerics, obligations of, 276 ordination, prior to, 1039
pastors, 533
religious, obligations of, 663
secular institutes, 719
seminaries, 246
Retroactivity
marriage resulting from deceit, canon invalidating, 1098 non-retroactivity of canon law generally, 9 Revocation
canon law, 20; 21
custom, 28
general executory decrees, 33
rescripts, 73
resignations, 189
singular administrative acts, 47
Rights and obligations of Christian faithful, 254-258
1983 Code, 1818
absence of or impediment to ministers, exercise of ministry by lay people in cases of, 230 acolytes, right of lay people to be, 230
acquired rights and privileges, 4
administrative recourse, 1818-1819; 1836-1837 anointing of the sick, responsibility for, 1001 apostolate, right to exercise, 216
apostolic life, societies of clerical obligations, 739
members, 737
assembly, right of, 215; 278 association, freedom of, 215; 278
associations
private associations, 310
right to form, 215; 278
authority to regulate exercise of rights, 223 bishops' private chapels, 1227 cantors, right of lay people to be, 230 church buildings, right to hold divine worship in, 1219 Church, obligation to provide support for, 222
civil liberties, rights of lay faithful regarding, 227
clerics, 343-344
1917 Code as source for rights and obligations of, 343 acceptance of assignments, 274 associations, restrictions and freedoms regarding, See Clerics, subhead association and assembly bishop, duty of obedience and reverence to, 273 celibacy, obligation of, 277 civil authority, involvement with exemptions from exercising public functions foreign to clerical state, required to exercise, 289
military service, 289
public or political office, prohibited from, 285; 287 commercial activities by, See Commercial activities, clerics engaging in common life, 280
continuing education, 279
cooperation required between, 275
dress, 284
Eucharist, celebration of, 276
financial aid and support, 281
financial obligations, permission required to undertake, 285
formation of, See Formation
holy life, duty to lead, 276
inappropriate activities, 285-289; 373
lay people, requirement to acknowledge and promote mission of, 275 liturgy of the hours, observance of, 276 local ordinary, duty of obedience and reverence to, 273 Marian devotions, 276
military service, 289 negative obligations, 285-289; 373 obedience, duty of, 273 offices restricted to, 274
pastoral duties, required to fulfill, 276
peace and harmony, as fosterers of, 287
penance, 276
pope, duty of obedience and reverence to, 273
prayer, 276
preaching obligations, 276; 762
public or political office, 285; 287
remuneration, 281
residence and domicile requirements, 283
retreats, obligation to make time for, 276
reverence, duty of, 273
simplicity of life, 282
spiritual life, duty to nurture, 276
vacations, 283
vanity, duty to refrain from, 282
Vatican Council II, interpretation in light of, 344
coadjutor and auxiliary bishops diocesan bishop not to entrust rights habitually to another, 408 outline of rights and obligations, 405
residence, 410
commentators, right of lay people to be, 230 common good in exercise of rights, need to be mindful of, 223 communion (communio), See Communion (communio)
confessors, See Confessors
confirmation, See Confirmation
defenders of the bond, 1434
defense, right of complaint of nullity against the sentence based on denial of, 1620 review of acts prior to publication in marriage nullity cases, 1710-1711
diocesan administrators, 427 diocesan archival documents, right to obtain copies and photocopies of, 487 direction of exercise of rights, 223 due process, right to, 221; 231; 1818-1819; 1837
Eastern code, 31-32
ecclesiastical offices, 145
ecclesiastical offices, right of lay people to hold, 228 education, right to, See Education equality of all peoples, 208; 255
Eucharist, See Eucharist
evangelization, 211
experts and advisors, lay people functioning as, 228 family life, duties associated with, 226 financial support for Church, obligation to provide, 222 gospel, proclamation of, 211; 225 growth and sanctification of Church, obligation to promote, 210 holy life, obligation to lead, 210; 276 impeded diocesan sees, interim leaders of, 414 innate rights, 4
interrelationship of rights and duties, 1819-1820 judges, See Tribunals, subhead rights and duties of judges and ministers of
lay people, 224; 291-292 absence of or impediment to ministers, exercise of ministry in cases of, 230
acolytes, as, 230
cantors, as, 230
civil liberties, possession of, 227
commentators, as, 230
ecclesiastical offices, right to hold, 228; 274 experts and advisors, functioning as, 228
extraordinary ministries, 230
formation for service to Church, 230; 231 gospel, right and duty to proclaim, 225
installed ministries, 230
lectors, as, 230
liturgical functions performed by, 230; 274 mandated teachers of theology, right to be, 229 marriage, duties associated with, 226 remuneration for service to Church, 230; 231
social order, duty to perfect, 225 theological education and knowledge, right to obtain, 229 lectors, right of lay people to be, 230 legal rights, 4

limitations on rights, 223 liturgical functions performed by lay people, 230; 274 majority, on reaching age of, 98 mandated teachers of theology, right of lay people to be, 229
marriage
ability to fulfill obligations of, 1095
authorized witness, responsibilities of, 1114
common life, practice of, 1151 duties associated with, 226 impediments, obligation to reveal, 1069
minor children, See Minor children mutual obligations arising from marriage bond, 1135 nullity of, See Marriage nullity parental duties arising from, 1136
polygamous situations and dismissed wives, 1148
preparation for, local ordinary's obligation to provide, 1064 prior marriages, obligations from, 1071; 1154 right to, 1058
separation, right of, 1155 meetings, right to hold, 215; 278
metropolitans, 436
minor children, 97
needs and desires, right to express, 212 oaths, obligations incurred by, 1200
obedience, 212; 273
opinions, right to express, 212; 218 oratories, right to hold divine worship in, 1225
ordination, See Ordination
parents, See Parents and parental surrogates parochial administrators, 540
parochial vicars, 548
particular councils, participants in, 444 particular spiritual life or rite of worship, right to follow, 214
penalties
Church's right to impose penalties, 1311 protection of rights in imposing, 221
penance, See Penance
poor, obligation to assist, 222
preaching
all Christian faithful's duty and right to proclaim gospel, 211; 225
apostolate, right to exercise, 216
Church's duty and right regarding, 747 principal duty of sacred ministers, as, 762
prescription, See Prescription privacy, 220
private associations, 310
privileges, See Privileges profession of faith, obligation to make, 833
promoters of justice, 1434
protection of rights, 221; 257-258; 1818-1819
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions
Apostolic See's sole right of adjudicating and deciding, 1698
Church's right to judge cases of, 1671
petition, right of, 1697
rectors of non-parochial churches, 558; 562
regulation of exercise of rights, 223
religious, See Religious remuneration of lay people for service to Church, 230; 231
reputation, 220
res iudicata, rights flowing from, 1642
sacraments, 843
sacred sciences, freedom of inquiry and expression of opinion in pursuit of, 218 sacred times, obligations regarding, See Sacred times
secular institutes
financial support for members working for institute, 718
moderators, 717
spiritual duties, 719
service to Church, formation and remuneration for, 230; 231
several priests in solidum, parishes entrusted to, 543
sinners in Church, recognition of presence of, 257 social justice, obligation to support, 222 social order, duty and right of Church to preach gospel regarding, 747 spiritual nurture from sacred pastors, right to receive, 213 support for Church, obligation to provide, 222; 1260-1262
teaching function of Church, 218; 747
temporal goods, See Temporal goods of Church theological education and knowledge, right of lay people to obtain, 229 theology, freedom of inquiry and expression of opinion in pursuit of, 218
trials, See Trials
tribunals, judges and ministers of, See Tribunals truth, obligation and right to search for, 218; 748 truthful testimony at trial, obligation regarding, 1531; 1548; 1562
vicars forane, 555
vindication of rights, 221; 257-258
vocations, right to pursue, 219 vows place obligation only on person making vows, 1193
Rites, 1; 2
changing affinity, 112
choice of, 111
Eastern code, 32
relationship or affinity with, 111; 112
right of Christian faithful to follow particular spiritual life or rite of worship, 214 sacraments received in, significance of, 112 Roberti (Cardinal), 1428
Robert's Rules of Order, 138
Robleda, O., 177
Roman Church, bishop of, See also Apostolic See pope defined as, 331
Roman Curia, 475-476
1917 Code, 475
Academy of Sciences, 489
Administration of the Patrimony of the Apostolic See, 489
affairs of Apostolic See conducted through, 360
Apostolic Camera, 489
Apostolic Penitentiary, 486
general confession, instruction issued during World War II on, 961 indulgences, concession and use of, 1173
Apostolic See
affairs of Apostolic See conducted through Curia, 360 use of term Apostolic See to include Curia, 361 appeal or recourse against administrative acts, 480
archives, 489
authority of pope over, 480 books and written publications, oversight of, 481
canon law
juridical principles, 477-479 reform of Curia and, 12-13
cardinals
council to advise pope of organizational and economic problems, 481
link to, 466
meetings of cardinal dicastery heads, 480-481
commissions, 488
Congregations, 481-486, See also individual Congregations
defined, 479
dicasteries
commissions, 488
competencies of, 479
complex of dicasteries, defined as, 479 Congregations, 481-486, See also individual Congregations equal dignity of, 479
list of, 480-489
meetings of cardinal heads of, 480-481
offices, 489
ordinary structure of, 479
pontifical councils, 486-488, See also specific pontifical councils Secretariat of State, See Secretariat of State structure of, 479
tribunals, 486
executive power, 480
Fabric of St. Peter's Basilica, 489
historical background, 476-477
interpretation of law according to jurisprudence and practice of, 18

John Paul II's changes to, 477 judicial power, 480
juridical principles, 477-479; 479-480
legislative powers, 480
meetings of cardinal heads of dicasteries, 480-481 Office for the Liturgical Celebrations of the Supreme Pontiff, 489
offices, 489
"other institutes of the Roman Curia," 489
Pastor bonus, See Pastor bonus
Paul VI's reform of, 477
Pius X's reorganization of, 477
plenary assemblies, 480 pontifical councils, 486-488, See also specific pontifical councils
powers of, 480
Prefecture for Economic Affairs of the Holy See, 489
Prefecture of the Papal Household, 489
purpose of, 475-476
reforms of, 11; 12-13; 466; 476-477; 478-479; 1373 Regolamento, See Regolamento Generale della Curia Romana rescripts denied by, 64 resignation of curial offices by cardinals after seventy-five years of age, 354 retired diocesan bishops, 402
Sixtus V (Pope), reform by, 466 Sixtus V's systematization of, 476 term "Apostolic See" meant to include, 361 theological principles, 477-479
titular bishops, 376
tribunals, 486
Vatican Library, 489
vicarious papal power, exercise of, 478
Roman law
Anglo-American law on presumption of innocence compared to, 1321
dispensations, 126
historical reasons for basis of canon law in, 8-9 ownership of temporal goods, 1256 prescription derived from, 230 Roman pontiff, See Apostolic See Roman Ritual
revision of, 1400; 1424
Roman Rota, 486
complaint of nullity against the sentence, 1624
delegated tribunal, as, 1444
historical background, 1444
interpretation of law according to jurisprudence and practice of, 18 judicial declarations of parties in marriage nullity cases, 1671 ordinary appellate tribunal, role as, 1443 reservation of cases to, 1405; 1444
Roman School
ecclesiastical governance, eligibility of persons to exercise, 129 Roman tribunals, See Tribunals, subhead Apostolic See, tribunals of Romani Pontificis
polygamy, 1370
Romanian metropolitan church
Byzantine rite, observing, 1
Eastern code, following, 33
metropolitan structure of, 437
Romanos Pontifices
missionary territories, relationship between religious and diocesan bishops in, 790
Rome
dean and assistant dean of cardinals required to reside in, 352 Rosary
seminaries, 246
Rota, See Roman Rota
Rotary Clubs
clerics' membership in, 278
Rules of order, 95; 138
Rumor
witnesses and witness testimony, 1572
Russia
Eucharist, lay persons as extraordinary ministers of, 910
Russian Catholic church
Byzantine rite, observing, 1
Eastern code, under "other churches" category of, 32-33
Ruthenian metropolitan church
Byzantine rite, observing, 1
Eastern code, following, 33
metropolitan structure of, 437

Sacrae disciplinae leges canon law, reason for existence of, 209
ecumenism, references to, 16
hierarchical authority as service, 212 munera or threefold functions of Jesus, participation of all People of God in, 207; 254
particular churches, 501 promulgation of 1983 Code in, 12 Sacramentalem indolem lay persons delegated as authorized witness to marriage, 1112 Sacramentals, 1166; 1401
authority, 1167
blessings, See Blessings clerics as ministers of, 1168
consecrations
defined, 1169
ministers of, 1169
dedications, See Dedications
defined, 1166
ministers of, 1168
Vatican Council II, 1167
Sacraments, 840; 1017-1019 addition, omission, or alteration of celebration of, 846 administration, licit, 844
anointing of sick, See Anointing of the sick
Apostolic See, 841; 1018-1019 authority to define validity of, 841
baptism, See Baptism
bishops, 841
catechetical needs, 777; 843
chrism/oils used in administration of, 847
communicatio in sacris (indiscriminate sacramental sharing), 1365
Communion, See Eucharist conditional conferral of nonrepetitive sacraments, 845; 869
conferences of bishops, 841
confession, See Penance
confessors, See Confessors
confirmation, See Confirmation Congregation for Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments
celibacy, dispensation from, 291
rescript of Apostolic See (laicization), competence for, 290
consecrated species, violations of, 1367
defined, 840
delicts involving, 1585-1586
diocesan bishops, 841
ecclesiastical discipline, role in fostering, 392
eucharistic presider, as, 389
liturgy, celebration of, 388
sanctifiers, as, 387
Eastern code, 36-39
ecumenical sharing in, 844; 1023-1024
Eucharist, See Eucharist excommunication and, 1331; 1357
extreme unction, See Anointing of the sick form and matter, Scholastic doctrine of, See Matter and form, Scholastic doctrine of formation of clerics in celebration of, 256 full communion, as bond of, 205
holy orders, See Orders, sacrament of indiscriminate sacramental sharing (communicatio in sacris), 1365 initiation, sacraments of, 842; 851; 866, See also Baptism; Confirmation; Eucharist initiatory sacraments, interrelationship between, 1066; 1068-1069 interdict and reception of, 1357
licit administration, 844
liturgical books, use of, 846 liturgical laws, observance of, 846 loss of clerical state leading to ban on exercise of, 292
marriage, See Marriage matter and form, Scholastic doctrine of, See Matter and form, Scholastic doctrine of metropolitans, performance of sacred functions by, 436 ministers of, See Ministers
non-Catholic ministers, reception by Catholics of sacraments from, 844

non-Catholics receiving sacraments from Catholic ministers, 844 nonrepeatability of baptism, confirmation, and orders, 845
offerings, 848
offerings for administration of, 848 oils/chrism used in administration of, 847 olive oil used in administration of, substitutes for, 847
order of reception of sacraments, 1068; 1070
orders, See Ordination pastor's role in administering, 530
penance, See Penance
poor and needy not to be deprived of, 848 prohibited participation in sacred rites, 1365 reconciliation, See Penance remission of penalties involving, 1357 remuneration for administration of, 848 repetition of, 845
rights and obligations regarding, 843 rite of celebrating minister, according to, 846 rites other than one's own, significance of reception in, 112 Scholastic doctrine of form and matter, See Matter and form, Scholastic doctrine of sharing, ecumenical, 844; 1023-1024 sick, anointing of, See Anointing of the sick simony, 1380
simulation of, 1378; 1379
simulation or abuse of administration of, 1041
spiritual nurture from sacred pastors, right to receive, 213
sui juris church members receiving sacraments from Catholic ministers, 844 suspension of censure or prohibition regarding, 1335; 1352
validity of, 841
Sacred ministers, See Clerics
Sacred missions
missionary activities, See Missionary activities preaching, as type of, 770
religious mission and apostolate, See Religious, subhead mission and apostolate Sacred objects, 1171 acquisition, prescription, and use of, 1269
alienation of, 1190
altars, See Altars
blessing of, 1171
dedication of, 1171
profanation of, 1171; 1376
relics
alienation of, 1190
altars, placed in, 1237
repair and restoration of sacred images, 1188; 1189 veneration of sacred images in churches, 1188 Sacred places, 1424; 1425
altars, See Altars authority exercised in, 1213 blessing of, See Blessings certificate of blessing or dedication, 1208
church buildings, See Church buildings dedication of, See Dedications
defined, 1205
desecration of, 1211
Eastern code, 1424
oratories, See Oratories
private chapels, See Private chapels
profanation of, 1210; 1211
shrines, See Shrines
use of, 1210
Sacred rites prohibited participation in, 1365
Sacred sciences, See Theology
Sacred times, 1424; 1442 authority regarding, 1244; 1246 commutation of obligations regarding, 1245
diocesan bishops, 1244
dispensations from obligations regarding, 1245
Easter, See Easter
Eastern code, 1424; 1442
Eucharist, fasting prior to reception of, 919
Fridays as days of penance and fasting, 1250
holy days of obligation, 1246
Lent, 1250
obligations regarding, 1244; 1442 commutations and dispensations, 1245 evening prior to feast day or feast day proper, satisfaction during, 1248 penance and fasting, days of, 1249
Sundays and holy days of obligation, 1247 penance and fasting, days of, 1446
age restrictions, 1252
Ash Wednesday, 1251 conferences of bishops setting abstinence and fasting requirements, 1251; 1253 Eucharist, fasting prior to reception of, 919
Fridays, 1250
Good Friday, 1251
Lent, 1250
obligations regarding, 1249
persons bound to abstain and fast, 1252
Sundays, 1246
Sacrilegious or obscene purposes
consecrated species, violation of, 1367
Sacrosanctum Concilium addition, omission, or alteration of celebration of sacraments, 846
anointing of the sick, 1180 authority over direction of sacred liturgy, 838 catechists as baptismal ministers, 861
church buildings, construction of, 1216 communal celebration of Eucharist preferred to individual or quasi-private celebrations, 276
decrees and constitutions, teaching by, 754
definition of liturgy, 834 diocesan bishops as eucharistic presiders, 389 diocesan bishop's power to issue liturgical norms, 838
divine worship other than sacraments, 1400
eucharistic canons, 902
homily, 767
initiatory sacraments, 842
liturgical books, preparation and publication of, 838
liturgy, celebration of, 1000 liturgy of the hours, restoration of traditional sequence of, 276 outreach efforts, importance of, 771
parishes, 515
penance, reform of, 1138; 1167 purpose of sacraments, 840
sacred places and times, 1424
sacred times, 1442
Sacrum diaconatus ordinem formation of permanent deacons, 236
Saepe
oral contentious process introduced, 1754 Sailors
chaplains for persons deprived of ordinary pastoral care, 568 Saints, See also under specific saints' names canonization process
Congregation for the Causes of Saints, 483-484; 1403
tribunals, 1403
veneration of, 1186; 1187
St. Columban Missionary Society, 784; 893
St. Patrick Missionary Society, 784
Salaries, See Remuneration
Sale of goods, See Alienation of temporal goods of Church Sanation or healing convalidation of marriage, See Convalidation of marriage null acts, 1619
Sanctifiers
diocesan bishops as, 387
Sanctifying functions of Church, 997-1005 liturgy, celebration of, See Liturgy, celebration of prayers and spiritual exercises other than liturgy, 839
sacraments, See Sacraments
Title of Book IV, reasons for use as, 1000 Sanctions, See Penalties
Sapienti consilio reform of Roman Curia, 12 reorganization of Roman Curia by Pius X, 477 Sapientia christiana canonical mission (missio canonica) of Catholic universities and colleges, 253; 812
ecclesiastical universities and faculties, 14; 972

Satanic possession
exorcism from, See Exorcism Satanic ritual
consecrated species, violation of, 1367 Satis vobis
secret marriage, 1352
Scarboro Missionary Society
founding of, 784
Schism, See Heresy, apostasy, and schism Scholasticism
marriage and, 1296; 1306 matter and form of sacraments, See Matter and form, Scholastic doctrine of Schools, 796
1917 Code, 14
academic distinction, importance of, 806 all faithful, responsibilities of, 800
authority
establishment or recognition of school as Catholic, 803 prescripts, issuance of, 806 religious instruction and education provided, control over, 804 teachers of religious instruction, right to appoint, approve, or remove, 805 visitations, 806
bishops
authority to establish or recognize schools, 803 prescripts issued by, 806 responsibility to establish schools, 802
teachers of religious instruction, right to appoint, approve, or remove, 805 visitations by, 806
Catholic education outside Catholic schools, parental obligation to ensure, 798 civil society, parental obligations regarding laws regulating, 799 competent ecclesiastical authority, establishment or recognition by, 803 consent to identify school as Catholic, 803 definition of Catholic school, 803 diocesan schools, 803
Eastern code's criteria for recognition of catholicity, 803
establishment of bishop, by, 802
catholicity, recognition of, 803 Church, by, 800
competent ecclesiastical authority, establishment or recognition by, 803 freedom of parents to choose, 797
importance of, 796
juridic relationship to competent ecclesiastical authority, 803
minor seminaries, 234
parents
Catholic education outside Catholic schools, parental obligation to ensure, 798 civil society, obligations regarding laws regulating, 799 cooperation with schools, 796 freedom to choose schools, 797 inalienable rights over moral and religious education of children, 799 parish schools, 803 prescripts issued by bishops, 806 professional schools, 802
religious institutes, 801
role of, 796
special needs schools, 802
teachers of religious instruction quality of, 804
right to appoint, approve, or remove, 805 technical schools, 802 unavailability of Catholic schools, 798 visitations by bishop, 806
Scripture discussion groups
preaching, as type of, 770
Scriptures, See Bible
Seal, parochial, 535
Second baptism profession of evangelical counsels as type of, 743 Second instance, tribunals of, 1630
competency or incompetency, 1440
constitution of, 1441
designation of tribunal as appellate tribunal for metropolitan tribunal, 1438 diocesan tribunals, appeal to metropolitan tribunal by, 1438 marriage nullity, documentary process, 1688 regional tribunals, 1439
religious tribunals, 1438
Second Lateran Council
marriage and sacred orders, 1087
Second Vatican Council, See Vatican Council II Secrecy, See Confidentiality and secrecy
Secret marriages, 1352
1917 Code, 1130; 1352
cessation of need for secrecy, 1132 clandestine marriages and, 1237; 1326; 1327; 1352 concubinage, couples long living in, 1130; 1352
documentation of, 1133
government entitlements, avoidance of loss of, 1354
investigations into freedom to marry, 1131
morganatie marriage, not type of, 1130
proofs, 1130
public scandal, avoidance of, 1130; 1352
reasons for, 1130; 1352
registration of, 1133
reputation, to preserve, 1130; 1352 witnesses and celebrants, secrecy observed by, 1131
Secretariat of State, 481
Apostolic See, included in references to, 361
books and written publications, oversight of, 481 general ecclesiastical business, division of, 481 governmental affairs, division of, 481
particular churches, 368
Secretaries of diocesan curias chancellor and vice-chancellor automatically regarded as, 482 Secular authority, See Civil authority Secular clerics, See Clerics Secular congregations clerical societies of apostolic life prior to 1917 Code referred to as, 893 Secular institutes, 710; 878-879
admission to
impediments to, 721
incorporation, 723
initial probation period, 722
requirements for, 720
age requirements for admission, 721
apostolate, 713
apostolic life, society of, transfer to or from, 684; 730; 744
Apostolic See
dimissorial letters of ordination, power to issue, 1019
permission to depart sought from, 727
religious institute or society of apostolic life, transfer to or from, 684; 730; 744 associates of, 724
authority
Apostolic See, See subhead Apostolic See
diocesan bishop
clerical members subject to, 713
permission to separate from institute, 726; 727
ecclesiastical governance, 717
moderators, See subhead moderators
statutes
ecclesiastical governance, 717
evangelical counsels, required to address, 712
initial probation period, 722 clerical members and clerical institutes
apostolate, 713
dimissorial letters of ordination, power to issue, 1019 diocesan bishop, subject to, 713 incardination in diocese or institute, 715
separation from institute, 727
status not affected by consecration into, 711
commercial activities, not subject to prohibitions on, 1392
common life, practice of, 714
communion (communio), preserving, 716 consecrated life, institute of, or apostolic life, society of, membership in, 721
defined, 710
definitive incorporation, 723
diocesan bishop
clerical members subject to, 713
permission to separate from institute, 726; 727

diocesan synods, membership in, 463 dismissal from, See Dismissal from secular institutes or societies of apostolic life
Eastern code, 878-879
ecclesiastical governance, 717
Eucharist, celebration of, 719
evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty, and obedience incorporation into institute, 723
statutes required to address, 712
temporal goods, administration of, 718 financial support for members working for, 718
formation of members
continuing, 724
initial, 722
houses, 714
impediments to admission, 721
incardination of clerical members in diocese or institute, 715
incardination of clerics, 266
incorporation, 723
initial probation period, 722; 723
juridic effects
perpetual versus definitive incorporation, 723
separation from institute, 728
juridic personality, 718
lay members and lay institutes
apostolate, 713
status not affected by consecration into, 711
liturgy of the hours, 719
living situations, 714
marriage
associates, married persons as, 725 impediment to admission, as, 721 maturity required for admission to, 721 members' canonical condition not changed by consecration into, 711
missionary activities, 784
moderators
admission to institute, control over, 720 duties and obligations of, 717 exclusion of temporarily incorporated members for grave cause, 726
permission to separate from institute, 726; 727
requirements for, 717
spiritual advice, providing, 719 statutes to define terms and methods of designation, 717 neither clerical not lay nature of state of consecrated life, 711
papal legates, role of, 364 participation in life of, 716
particular councils, participants in, 443
pastors, clerical institutes as, 520; 538 penance, fiequent use of, 719
People of God, as part of, 207
perpetual incorporation, 723; 727; 729
pontifical right institutes, 727; 1019
prayer, 719
presbyteral councils of particular churches, membership of, 498
religious institute or society of apostolic life, transfer to or from, 684; 730; 744 remuneration of members working for, 718
retreats, 719
rights and obligations
financial support for members working for institute, 718
moderators, 717
spiritual duties, 719
separation from dismissal of perpetually incorporated members, 729 initial probation period, following, 723
juridic effect of, 728
perpetually incorporated members, 727 temporarily incorporated members, 726
spiritual duties, 719
statutes
ecclesiastical governance, 717
evangelical counsels, required to address, 712
initial probation period, 722
temporal goods, administration of, 718
temporary incorporation, 723; 726 transfer to or from another institute or a society of apostolic life, 730 Self-defense
diminishment of imputability for actions due to, 1324 exemptions from imputability for actions due to, 1323 Self-mutilation
ordination, irregularities for reception of, 1041
Seminaries
academic instruction, 248; 254 administration, 259
admission to, 241
bishops
administration of seminaries, 259 diocesan and interdiocesan seminaries, 237 financial aid, provision of, 263; 264 representatives of seminaries, as, 238
visitations, 259
celibacy, instruction regarding, 247
collaborative, 237
confessors of students, 985
dean or director of studies, 261
diocesan, 237
duties and difficulties of priesthood, information regarding, 247
Eucharist, regular celebration of, 246
field education programs, 258
financial aid, 263; 264
foreign language instruction, 249
freestanding, 237
integration of academic work and spirituality, 254
interdiocesan, 237
juridic personality of, 238
language programs, 249
Latin, instruction in, 249 liturgy of the hours, regular celebration of, 246 major, 235; 237; 295
mandate to teach theology, 253
Marian devotions, 246
marriage, not exempt from parochial authority over, 262
methods of instruction, 254
minor, 234; 295
parochial governance, exemption from, 262 particular rule for program of priestly formation, 243 pastoral instruction, 255
penance
confessors, availability of, 240 frequent practice of, 246
students and novices, 985
personal prelatures, 295
personnel requirements, 239
philosophical instruction, 251
practical experience, programs providing, 258
rectors, See Rectors
retreats, 246
rosary, 246
sacred ministry, instruction pertaining to exercise of, 255
spiritual directors, 239 spiritual exercises performed in, 246 spiritual formation in, 244; 245
statutes of, 239
tax on diocese for needs of, 264
teachers
duties of, 261
mandate to teach theology, 253
qualifications of, 253
removal of, 253
requirements regarding, 239
teaching methods, 254
theological instruction and study, 252; 253
time requirements, 250
university-related, 237
vice-rectors, 239
visitations, 259
Sensus fidei, 212
Sentencing at trial, See Trials, subhead pronouncement and sentencing Separation of members from secular institutes, See Secular institutes Separation of religious from institute, See Religious Separation of spouses, 1359; 1790
1917 Code, 1790
1983 Code, 1790
administrative process, use of, 1692 adultery as grounds for, 1152 appeal or recourse, ordinary contentious process used for, 1693 baptized spouses, applicable to, 1692; 1790 bond remaining, separation with, 1151-1155

captivity or persecution, separation of non-baptized partners due to, 1149
civil forum, 1692
common life, inability to maintain, 1151
competency or incompetency, 1694
danger mental or physical as grounds for, 1153
Eastern code, 1790
ecclesiastical forum, 1692 forgiveness by innocent spouse, effects of, 1152; 1155
forum, 1692
grounds for, 1152; 1153
historical background, 1359-1362 innocent spouse, 1152; 1153; 1155 minor children, care and education of, 1154
oral contentious process, 1693
ordinary contentious process, request for, 1693
persecution or captivity, separation of non-baptized partners due to, 1149 promoters of justice, 1696
public good, 1696
reconciliation, 1155
reconciliation, duty to attempt, 1695 right to separate, 1155
tribunals, 1694

Sequestration extraordinary procedure, as, 1498
object sequestration, 1496 respondent, protection of, 1499 security sequestration, 1497

Settlements
alternative dispute resolution/arbitration, use of, 1713-1716
closed case exceptions, 1462
judge's duty to urge, 1462 marriage nullity cases, duty of judge to urge reconciliation in, 1676 oral contentious process, failure to achieve in, 1659
separation of spouses, 1695

Seven years of age, 11; 97, See also Reason, age of Sex and gender, See also Women consecrated life, equality of sexes as to institutes of, 606

marriage
between man and woman, defined as, 1057 equality of obligations of partners, 1135 ordination restricted to men, 1024

Sexual abuse of minors
clerics' association with minor children, 277
dismissal from clerical state for, 1317; 1395 penal code's importance and necessity, highlighting, 1529 penal process necessitated by, 1806
penalties for, 1395
removal of pastors, 1840-1841 reputation, protection of, 220

Sexual disorders
marriage, 1095

Sexual relations in marriage, 1084; 1236; 1238-1240; 1243-1246

Sexual sins
absolution of accomplice in sins against sixth commandment, 977 continence and celibacy of religious and clerics, violations of, See Continence and celibacy of religious and clerics marriage, within, 1236
married clerics and religious, See Married clerics and religious minors, involving, See Sexual abuse of minors penal process necessitated by, 1806 penance and, See Penance religious institutes, mandatory dismissal from, 695
solicitation in confession, 1387
expiatory penalties for, 1387
false denunciators of, 982; 1387; 1390
threats or violence, involving, 1395

Shakespeare, William, 1752

Sharing the Light of Faith, 933

Shortage of priests
candidates for ordination, 1025
ways of handling, 517

Shrines, 1230; 1436
defined, 1230
international, 1231
liturgical services at, 1234 national, 1231
pilgrimages to, 1230
privileges, 1233
statutes for, 1232
votive offerings at, 1234

Si, nisi, or dummodo (if, unless, or provided that)
Singular administrative acts, 39

Sick
anointing of, See Anointing of the sick Viaticum, See Viaticum

Simony
ecclesiastical offices, invalidating, 149
resignation due to, 188
sacraments received through, 1380

Simple vows, 1192

Simplicity of life
clerics required to pursue, 282

Simulation of sacraments, 1378; 1379

Sin and sinners
accomplices in sin
names of, confessor to refrain from asking, 979
sins against sixth commandment, absolution of accomplice in, 977; 1378
Eucharist
public sinners, participation in and reception of, 915 serious sins, obligation to confess before taking Communion, 916
kind of sins, confession of, 988
knowledge of sins confessed, use of, 983; 984
number of sins, confession of, 988 obligation to confess, 988 recognition of presence of sinners in the Church, 257 sexual sins, See Sexual sins trials regarding questions of sin, 1401

Single judges, 1424
oral contentious process before, 1657
pronouncement and sentencing by, 1610

Singular administrative acts, 35
anticipation of act, invalid, 40
authority to issue, 35
continuity of executive power establishing, 46
defined, 35
execution of act invalid executions, 42 remedy for errors in, 45
executive power
continuation of, 46
issuance of act, 35
executors
limitations on activity of, 41 refusal to execute act by, 41
substitutions, 43
succession in office of, 44
expiration of authority granting privilege, 46 extensive interpretations, avoidance of, 36
if, unless, or provided that (si, nisi, or dummodo), 39
interpretation of, 36
invalid acts, See subhead validity limitations on activity of executor, 41
effect of act, 38
privileges usually granted by, 76 refusal of executor to execute act, 41 remedy for errors in execution of act, 45
rescripts, See Rescripts
revocation, 47
si, nisi, or dummodo (if, unless, or provided that), 39
types of, 35; 108
validity of, 39
anticipation of act, invalid, 40
continuity of executive power establishing, 46 execution of act, invalid, 42
remedy for errors in execution of act, 45 si, nisi, or dummodo (if, unless, or provided that), 39
written requirements, 37

Singular decrees and precepts, 108 applicability of, 52
cessation of, 58
communication of oral communication of decree, circumstances allowing, 55
presumptive communication, 56
written requirement, 51

conflicting decrees, 53
consultations made prior to issuing, 50
defined singular decrees, 35; 48
singular precepts, 35; 49 types of singular administrative act, as, 35; 108 elements of singular decrees, 48 information sought out prior to issuing, 50 limitations on applicability of, 52 operative force of decrees, 54
oral communication of decree, circumstances allowing, 55 petition for, failure to respond to, 57
presumptive communication of, 56
presumptive negative response of authority as to issuance of, 57 priority of conflicting decrees, 53 refusal to appear at summons or refusal to sign, 56 singular administrative acts, defined as types of, 35; 108 time period for authorities to issue, 57 written requirement for decisory decree, 51
Singular forum, See Forum, subhead extraordinary or singular forum Sixtus V (Pope)
college of cardinals, reform of, 350; 465-466 Roman Curia, systematization of, 476 Sixtus VI (Pope)
impotence as marital impediment, 1084
Slovak church
Byzantine rite, observing, 1
Eastern code, under "other churches" category of, 32-33
Social communications, See Media communications Social justice
administrators of temporal goods, 1285; 1286
duty and right of Church to preach gospel regarding, 747 employees of church, remuneration of, 1286
formation of clerics, 256
human life, integrity, and freedom, delicts and penalties involving, 1397; 1398
lay people's duty to perfect and imbue social order with spirit of gospel, 225 obligation of faithful to promote, 222 Societies of apostolic life, See Apostolic life, societies of Society of African Missions, 892 Society of the Catholic Apostolate, 893 Sohm, Rudolph, 3
"Soldiers of Christ"
confirmation viewed as creating, 879; 1067 Solemn blessings outside church
pastors' duties regarding, 530
Solemn vows, 1192
Solicitation of sexual sins in confession, 1387
expiatory penalties for, 1387
false denunciators of, 982; 1387; 1390
Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum papal legates, 362-367; 490 Spain
presbyteral confirming, 1067
Special session
synod of bishops assembled in, 345
Spiritual elements
consecrated life, statutes of institutes of, 587
Spiritual exercises
eucharistic veneration, See Veneration of Eucharist Marian devotions, See Marian devotions norms of Church, in keeping with, 839
prayer, See Prayer
preaching, as type of, 770
religious, obligations of, 663
retreats, See Retreats sanctifying function of Church carried out by, 839
secular institutes, 719
Spiritual nurture right of Christian faithful to receive, 213 Spiritual purpose of ecclesiastical offices, 145 Spiritual qualities ecclesiastical offices, qualifications for, 149
ordination, candidates for, 1025; 1029; 1032
Spirituali militum curae military chaplains, 518
military ordinariate, 368
Spirituality
prescription, exemption from, 199
right of Christian faithful to follow particular spiritual life or rite of worship, 214
Sponsors
baptismal, See Baptism confirmation, See Confirmation
Spouses
death of, See Death
marriage, See Marriage nullity of marriage, See Marriage nullity presumed death of, 1707; 1798
residence and domicile, 104
separation of, See Separation of spouses Stability
ecclesiastical offices, 145
papal legates as stable representatives of pope (nuncios and pro-nuncios), 363 pastoral office, 521
res iudicata possessing stability of law, 1642 trials, stable or established location of place of, 1468
Staffa, Dino (Cardinal), 1821
Standing to bring an action at trial, 1476
State authority, See Civil authority State, secretariat of, See Secretariat of State Status-of-persons cases
res iudicata, 1643; 1644; 1712
Statute of limitations, See Prescription
Statutes, 94; 138
associations, 304; 309
private associations, 321
public associations, 314
cathedral chapters, 505; 506
collegiate chapters, 505; 506
conferences of bishops, 451
consecrated life, institutes of, See Consecrated life, institutes of ecclesiastical universities and faculties, 816
juridic personality, 117
personal prelatures, 295
presbyteral councils of particular churches, 496
religious conferences of major superiors, approval at, 709
temporal goods, administration of, 635
secular institutes
ecclesiastical governance, 717
evangelical counsels, required to address, 712
initial probation period, 722
seminaries, 239
shrines, 1232
Sterility or sterilization
marriage, 1084
Stickler, Alphonsus, 274
Stoic philosophy, 1235
Stole fees, See Offerings Strict interpretation
canon law, 18
dispensations, 92
oaths, 1204
Subdiaconate
elimination of, 230
Subreption
rescripts, 63
Subrogation
administrative recourse, 1739
Substance abuse
diminishing imputability, 1324
exempting from imputability, 1323
not mitigating imputability, 1325
Suburbicarian sees college of cardinals, 350; 357
Suffragan bishops diocesan administrator, designation of, 425 impeded diocesan sees, duty to inform Apostolic See in cases of penalties leading to, 415 metropolitan's authority in suffragan dioceses, 436 particular councils, elected to preside over, 442 Sui iuris churches, See Churches sui iuris Sui iuris monasteries
accounting responsibilities regarding temporal goods, 637
alienation of regarding temporal goods, 638
autonomy of, 615
canons regular, religious houses of, 613
decision on dismissal, making, 699
defined, 615
moderators of autonomous houses as major superiors, 613

monks, religious houses of, 613; 615 nuns, monasteries of, See Nuns, monasteries of readmission without burden of repeating novitiate, 690
suppression of, 616
Sulpicians, 892
Sundays, 1246
Superiors
consecrated life, institutes of, See Consecrated life, institutes of religious, See Religious Suppression
conferences of bishops, 449
consecrated life, institutes of, 584; 747 Apostolic See, reserved to, 584
parts of institute, 585
ecclesiastical offices, 148; 184
ecclesiastical provinces, 431
parishes, 515
public associations, 320
religious, 616; 772
novitiate houses, 647
sui iuris monasteries, 616
Supreme pontiff, See Apostolic See Surety
clerics must have permission to give, 285 Suspension as penalty
adaptation of potential effects to fit situation, 1331; 1333; 1334 clerics only affected by, 1333
concubinage, 1395
Eastern code, different rules for, 1333
effects of, 1333
false denunciators of solicitation of sexual sins in confession, 1390
ordinations, illicit, 1383
partial, 1333
particular law suspensions, 1333
simony, sacraments received through, 1380
simulation of sacraments, 1378
solicitation of sexual sins in confession, 1387
total, 1333
vicars general and episcopal vicars, suspension of powers when function of diocesan bishop is suspended, 481 Suspension of penalties
administrative recourse, 1734; 1736
effect of execution of petition, as, 1736
hierarchic recourse, 1737
petition assumed to request, 1734 appeal or recourse, during, 1353
censures, 1335
danger of death, 1335; 1352
expiatory penalties, 1338
ferendae sententiae, 1333
latae sententiae, 1333; 1334; 1335; 1338; 1352 married clerics and religious, suspension of censure or prohibition on, 1335
obligatory penalties, 1344
reputation, to maintain, 220; 1335; 1338; 1352 residence and domicile, effect on right of, 1333 sacraments, suspension of censure or prohibition regarding, 1335; 1352 scopc of, 1334
trials
suspension of execution of sentence, 1638; 1644; 1650 suspension of trial, See Trials Suspensions
ecclesiastical benefits, 1333
ecumenical councils, 338; 340
oaths, 1203
synod of bishops, assembly of, 347
vows, 1195; 1198
Syncellus
Eastern code, similar to episcopal vicar in, 628 Synods
bishops, See Synods of bishops diocesan, See Diocesan synods participation of faithful in, 212
Synods of bishops, 454-455
Apostolic See
decision-making power granted by, 343
relationship with, 344
assembly, 345
conclusion of, 347
extraordinary general session, 346
general session, 345; 346
geographically-based special session, 346 ordinary general scssion, 346
special session, 345; 346
suspension of, 347
authority of, 343
decision-making powers of, 343
defined, 342
extraordinary general session, assembly in, 346 general session, assembly in, 345; 346 geographically-based special sessions, 346
membership in, 342; 346
ordinary general session, assembly in, 346 purpose and intent of, 342; 343; 454-455
retired diocesan bishops as members of, 402 secretariat, 348
sources of law regarding, 455 special session, assembly in, 345; 346
Vatican Council II, 454
Syrian patriarchate, 1; 32

Tabernacles
Eucharist, reserved, 938
Tacit revocation of law, 20
Taking possession of office
coadjutor and auxiliary bishops, 404
diocesan bishops, 382; 418
pastors taking possession of parish, 527; 534 several priests in solidum, parishes entrusted to, 534; 542 Tametsi
clandestine marriages, 1326; 1352
mixed marriages, 1342
simple convalidation, 1380-1381
Tape-recorders witness testimony, recording, 1567
Teachers
ecclesiastical universities and faculties
loss of clerical state, effects of, 292
mutual assistance and cooperation between, 820
profession of faith, persons obliged to make, 833
lay people as mandated teachers of theology, 229
loss of clerical state, effects of, 292
methods of instruction, 254
profession of faith, persons obliged to make, 833 schools, teachers of religious instruction in quality of, 804
right to appoint, approve, or remove, 805
seminaries, See Seminaries theological studies, mandate to teach, 15-16; 229; 253; 812
universities and colleges, Catholic, See Universities and colleges, Catholic Teaching function of Church, 911
avoidance of contrary teachings, 750 beliefs of faithful, requirements regarding, See Profession of faith catechesis, See Catechesis
coercion, prohibition on use of, 748
constitutions and decrees, obedience to, 754 core doctrines, requirements regarding, 750 decrees and constitutions, obedicnce to, 754 definitive teachings, See Definitive teachings diocesan bishops, teaching function of, 386 divine word, ministry of, See Divine word, ministry of doctrinal requirements, 750
duty of Church to preach gospel, 747
Eastern code, 911
ecumenism, role of pope and bishops in fostering, 755
education, See Education force, prohibition on use of, 748
infallibility, 749
interdependence with sanctifying and pastoring functions, 911 juridicization of, 754
media communications, See Media communications
missionary activities, See Missionary activities participation of all Church members in, 911 pope and bishops authority of bishops, 749; 753 constitutions and decrees put forth by, 754
divine word, role in ministry of, 756 ecumenism, rolc in fostering, 755
infallibility, 749

nondefinitive and uninfallible nature of most teachings of, 749; 752 religious submission of intellect to declared doctrines of, 752
preaching, See Preaching profession of faith, See Profession of faith prophetic function, as, 911 right of Church to preach gospel, 747
rights and obligations of Christian faithful, 218
truth, obligation and right to search for, 218; 748
types of, 911
Telephone
witness testimony via, 1528
Television, See Media communications
Temporal goods of Church, 1254; 1451-1452
1917 Code, 1260; 1454
accountability of administrators, 1287
acquisition of, 1459
collections in churches and oratories, 1266 fees, prescription of, 1264
freedom of Christian faithful to give goods for benefit of Church, 1261
fund-raising, 1262
conference of bishops, norms issued by, 1262
duty of faithful to give support to Church in response to, 1262
juridic persons acquiring goods ownership belonging to, 1256 right to acquire goods, 1259
offerings, See Offerings prescription as means of, 1268, See also subhead prescription of goods
sacred objects, 1269
support from Christian faithful, Church's right to, 1260-1262
taxation of public juridic persons, 1263
administration of, 1474
abandonment of duty by administrators, 1289 accountability, 1287
administrators other than ordinaries, 1279
charitable donations of goods by administrators, 1285
civil suits, 1288
conflict of interest, avoiding, 1298
diocesan bishops, 1276; 1277
duties of administrators, 1282-1289 extraordinary administration, 1277; 1281
finance council, role of, 1280 finance officer, role of, 1278
inventories, 1283
non-autonomous pious foundations, 1305
oaths by administrators, 1283
ordinaries, 1276
ordinary administration, 1277
Roman Pontiff as supreme administrator, 1273
social justice, 1285; 1286
support of clerics, institutes for, 1274
Administration of the Patrimony of the Apostolic See, 489 alienation, See Alienation of goods
alms, begging for, 1265
alternative dispute resolution/arbitration in cases involving, 1715
apostolic life, societies of, 741
Apostolic See
administration of goods, 1273
alienation, permission regarding, 1292 capacity to own goods, 1255
diocesan support for, 1271
juridic person acquiring goods, ownership belonging to, 1256 meaning of "Church" as including, 1258
prescription of goods belonging to, 1270 archive, inventory placed in, 1283
associations, See Associations
begging for alms, 1265
benefices, reform of, 1272
charitable donations of goods by administrators, 1285 Church, meaning of, 1252
civil authority
administrators bringing suit before, 1288
alienations that are civilly valid but canonically invalid, 1296
contract law, limited canonization of, 1290 independence of Church from, 1254
clerical support, institute for, 1274; 1275
collections in churches and oratories, 1266
communion (communio), 1451
conferences of bishops
alienation, permission regarding, 1292
alms, begging for, 1265
clerical support, institute for, 1274
fees and offerings, prescribing, 1264 fund-raising norms, establishment of, 1262
conflict of interest, avoiding, 1298
contracts, See Contracts
death
mortis causa dispositions, 1299
pious wills, See Pious wills
definitions
Church, meaning of, 1252
ecclesiastical goods, 1257
prescription of goods, 1268
private juridic persons, temporal goods of, 1257
delicts
free exercise of ecclesiastical function, interference with, 1375
profanation of sacred objects, 1376
unlawful alienation of church property, 1377
diocesan bishops
administrative role of, 1276; 1277
alienation, permission regarding, 1292
Apostolic See, diocesan support for, 1271
clerical support, institute for, 1274
duty to admonish faithful to support Church, 1261 pious wills, executor of, 1301
pious wills, modification of, 1310
taxation of public juridic persons, 1263
Eastern code, 40
purposes of Church ownership, 1254
taxation, 1263
ecclesiastical goods defined, 1257
extraordinary administration, 1277; 1281
finance council, administrative role of, 1280 finance officer, administrative role of, 1278
foundations, pious, See Pious foundations
free exercise of ecclesiastical function, interference with, 1375
fund-raising, 1262
conference of bishops, norms issued by, 1262
duty of faithful to give support to Church in response to, 1262
inter vivos gifts, 1299
interdiocesan and supradiocesan funds for clerical support, 1274; 1275
inventories, 1283
juridic personality
ownership belonging to juridic person acquiring goods, 1256 private juridic persons, temporal goods of, See subhead private juridic persons, temporal goods of ownership, 1257
sacred objects, acquisition of, 1269
public juridic persons, See subhead public juridic persons right of juridic persons to acquire goods, 1259 unsolicited offerings presumed to be given to, 1267
leasing, 1297; 1298
local ordinaries
administration of goods, 1276 executors of pious wills, as, 1301 modification of pious wills by, 1310
mortgages, 1295
mortis causa dispositions, 1299
oaths by administrators, 1283
obligation of Christian faithful to support Church, 222
offerings, See Offerings
ordinary administration, 1277
ownership
Anglo-American law versus Roman law understanding of, 1256 capacity of Church for, 1255
elements of, 1254
juridic person acquiring goods, belonging to, 1256 multiplicity of ownership of ecclesiastical goods, 1452 purposes of, 1254

scriptural precepts and ownership of goods, 1451
parishes
finance councils, parochial, 537
pastor responsible for administering, 532
pious foundations, See Pious foundations
pious trusts, 1302
pious wills, See Pious wills poverty, scriptural exhortation to, 1451
prescription of goods
acquisition of goods, as legitimate means of, 1268 Apostolic See, goods belonging to, 1270
defined, 1268
fees and offerings, 1264 losing goods via, 1268 public juridic persons, goods belonging to, 1269; 1270
sacred objects, 1269
private associations, private nature of goods of, 310; 325 private juridic persons, temporal goods of ownership, 1257
sacred objects, acquisition of, 1269
public associations, ecclesiastical nature of goods of, 319
public juridic persons
administrators other than ordinaries, 1279
alienation, restrictions on, 1291
"Church" used to mean, 1258 civil suits in name of, 1288
prescription of goods belonging to, 1269; 1270
sacred objects, acquisition of, 1269
taxation of, 1263
transactions worsening patrimonial condition of, 1295 religious orders, See Religious removal of pastors due to poor administration, 1741
rights and obligations
administrators, duties of, 1282-1289 conferences of bishops, See subhead conferences of bishops diocesan bishops, See subhead diocesan bishops freedom of Christian faithful to give goods for benefit of Church, 1261; 1299 juridic persons' right to acquire goods, 1259
support from Christian faithful, Church's right to, 1260-1262
sacred objects, See Sacred objects scriptural precepts and ownership of goods, 129; 1451
secular institutes, 718
social justice in administration of, 1285; 1286 specific purpose, offerings given for, 1267 stipulations in pious wills as to executor, 1301
taxation of public juridic persons, 1263
theology of, 1451-1452
transactions worsening patrimonial condition of public juridic persons, 1295
trusts, pious, 1302
Vatican Council II, 1254; 1451
wills, pious, See Pious wills Temporary profession of religious, See Religious Temporary residents
juridic personality, 100
Temporary service of clerics incardination rules, exemptions to, 271
Tempus, See Computation of time; Time and timing Termination of juridic personality, 120 Terminus a quo
initial day, what constitutes, 203
Terminus ad quem
final day, what constitutes, 203
Territorial abbacies, 370
defined, 370
particular churches, as, 368
titular bishops, territorial abbots as, 376 Territorial prelatures, 370; 394
defined, 370
particular churches, as, 368
Territorial restrictions baptism, ordinary ministers of, 862
conferences of bishops, 448
confessors, See Confessors
confirmation, ministers of
diocesan bishops, 886
exempt places, 888
priests, 887
executive power, 136
expiatory penalties involving, 1337
marriage, authorized witness at, 1109
ordination, 1017
pallium, use of, 437
Territoriality
judges outside own territory, 1469
mission territories, See Missionary activities
parishes, 515; 518
particular churches, 372
particular laws, 12; 13
penalties, scope of, 1351
prescription, exemption from, 199
travelers and particular laws, 13
Tertullian
Apology and Didascalia, judicial procedure described in, 1609-1610 Testimony, See Witnesses and witness testimony
Textbooks
publication of, 827
Theologians
disagreement versus dissent, 205; 218
Eastern code, 36
freedom of inquiry and expression of opinion, 218 Instruction on the Ecclesial Vocation of the Theologian (CDF), 205
lay people as, 228
Theological writings
abuse of Church or religion in, 1369
regulations for review of errors in, 1364
Theology
alternative dispute resolution, 1733
anointing of the sick, 998
baptism, 849
bishops as papal delegates or vicars, 184; 566-567
canon law
branch of theology, viewed as, 4-5 relationship to, 1-9
Church
both generator and receiver of theology, 7-9 nature of, See Ecclesiology conferences of bishops, theological status of, 589
confirmation, 879; 880; 1066-1067
consecrated life, institutes of, 573
consummation of marriage, 1364
defined, 6
definition of sacred sciences, 218 diocesan synods, purpose of, 460
dioceses, 566-567
Eastern code, 218
Eastern code on instruction in, 252 ecclesiastical offices, spiritual purpose of, 145
ecclesiology, See Ecclesiology
Eucharist, 897; 899
evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty, and obedience, 575 form and matter, Scholastic doctrine of, 1018-1019
formation of clerics, 252; 253
freedom of inquiry and expression of opinion regarding, 218
funerals, 1176
indulgences, 992
judicial procedure, 1803-1804
juridic personality, 154 lay ecclesial involvement described in Collaboration of the Non-ordained, theological principles of, 17-18; 292 lay people's right to obtain knowledge of, 229
liturgy of the hours, 1173
marriage, 1234-1240; 1246-1247; 1325; 1327; 1364
Mass offerings, 1129-1130
matter and form, Scholastic doctrine of, 1018-1019
ordination, 1008; 1193
parishes, 515; 673-674
particular churches, 566-567
penance, 959

reconciliation, importance of, 1733; 1803-1804 religious life, 607
Roman Curia, 477-479
teachers, mandate for, 15-16; 229; 253; 812
temporal goods of Church, 1451-1452 transfer of pastors, salvation of souls as supreme goal of, 1748; 1752 translation of theological insights into canonical norms as task of canon law, 184 universities and colleges, Catholic; theological disciplines taught at, See Universities and colleges, Catholic Thérèse of Lisieux (Saint) patron saint of missions, 783
Third orders, 303; 311; 567
Third parties intervention by, See Intervention by third parties in trials Thomas Aquinas (Saint), 90; 96; 252; 906; 1253; 1299; 1305; 1752
Threats
sexual sins by clerics or religious involving, 1395
Time and timing
1917 Code, 233-234
action to repair damages, time of intervention to bring, 1729 administrative procedure, appeal or recourse from decision on petition, 1735
hierarchic recourse, 1737
submission of petition, 1734
baptism, time of celebration of, 856 computation of time, See Computation of time consecration of bishops, time requirements regarding, 379
continuous time, 201
custom, length of time of observance of, 26
day, what constitutes, 201
dispensations, lapse of time period for, 93
ecclesiastical offices, See Ecclesiastical offices effective date of laws, 8 episcopal vicars, time limits on appointment of, 477
Eucharist
time of celebration of, 931 trination (Eucharist celebrated three times in one day by single priest), 905 final day (ad quem), 203
formation of clerics, 250
hierarchic recourse, time period for proposing, 1737 incidental cases, time period on decision regarding, 1589 initial day (a quo), 203
judges
time limits of trial defined by, 1466 time of appointment of, 1422 judicial vicars, time of appointment of, 1422 laws, effective date of, 8 liturgy of the hours, time of celebration of, 1175 liturgy, time of celebration of, 931
Mass offerings, satisfaction of, 953; 954 month, what constitutes, 201 ordination, time of, 1010 pastors, time period appointed for, 519; 520; 538
petition or libellus, See Petition or libellus privileges, cessation of, 83 proofs, commencement of time period for gathering, 1516
rescripts
time of effect of, 62
time of presentation to executor, 69
restitutio in integrum, time limits on, 1646 sacred times, See Sacred times
seminaries, 250
singular decrees and precepts, time period for authorities to issue, 57
trials, See Trials
trination (Eucharist celebrated three times in one day by single priest), 905
useful time, 201
witnesses, time period for examining, 1552
year, what constitutes, 201
Titles
"Catholic," use of, See "Catholic" in name or title, permission to use
church building, 1218
Titular bishops, 376
conferences of bishops, as members of, 450
particular councils, participants in, 443
Titular sees, 376
Titulars
cardinalate, development of, 464 Toledo
particular council held at, influence of, 577
Total reinstatement, See Restitutio in integrum Totes quoties plenary indulgences
suppression of, 1172-1173
Trade or business, clerics engaging in, See Commercial activities, clerics engaging in Transactio, See Settlements
Transfer of goods, See Alienation of temporal goods of Church Transfer of Mass obligations
pious wills, 1309
Transfer of office, 190; 223 bishops, powers of, 418
incardination following, See Incardination of clerics loss of ecclesiastical office by, 184 metropolitans, new pallium needed on transfer of, 437 negative connotations, 223
pastors, 538
pastors, transfer of, See Transfer of pastors penal transfers, See Penal transfers penalty, as, 223
remuneration and, 191
right to make transfer, 190 unwillingness to accept transfer, 190 vacancy of office caused by, 191
written requirements, 190
Transfer of pastors, 1748
checklist of steps to be followed in, 1850
decree of transfer, 1751
diocesan bishop, role of, 1748-1751
incardination following, See Incardination of clerics opposition of pastor to transfer, 1749 persuasion of pastor to undertake, 1748; 1750
reasons for, 1748
Review Panel, 1750
salvation of souls as supreme goal of, 1748; 1752
Transfer to another institute
religious, See Religious secular institute members, 730 Transfers, penal
expiatory penalties involving, 1336
physical violence, acts of, 1395
Transients
defined, 67
juridic personality, 100
marriage, 1071; 1115
minor children of, 105
particular laws, 13
pastor or ordinary of, 107
quasi-domicile, See Quasi-domicile
tribunals, 1409
Translations
Bible, 825
liturgical books, 838
Translators
knowledge of sins confessed, use of, 983; 984
use of, in confession, 990
Travelers
executive power over, 136
juridic personality, 100
particular laws, not bound by, 12; 13
pastor or ordinary of, 107
quasi-domicile, See Quasi-domicile
Trent, Council of Application of Mass, 1130
books, prohibition of, 977
convalidation of marriage, 1380
division of powers of governance, 135
Eucharist, 1097
marriage, 1237-1238; 1246; 1247; 1326-1327; 1342 papal delegates, bishops as, 428
preaching role of religious, 758
presbyteral confirming, condemnation of, 1067 priesthood, ministry of penance restricted to, 966
profession of faith, 19
reservation of Eucharist, 1122

- significance of, 337
- trafficking or trading in Mass offerings, 947

Trials, 1613
- abatement or preemption, 1520
  - expenses of abated trials, 1523
  - extinguishment effected by, 1522
  - negligence, due to, 1521
  - particular law establishing terms of, 1520
- actio reconventionalis (counterclaims), 1462; 1495
- actions, 1649
  - counterclaims, 1462; 1495
  - defined, 1649
  - exceptions to, 1462
  - extinction of, 1492
  - injunctions, 1496; 1498
  - multiple, 1493
  - possessory, 1500
  - rights protected by, 1491
  - sequestration, See Sequestration
  - temporary nature of, 1492
- active subject, 1401; 1613
- acts
  - authentication of pages, 1472
  - copies, 1475
  - drafting, 1472
  - information given to judge not allowed to remain outside, 1604
  - numbering of pages, 1472
  - objections against judges, validity of acts placed by judge prior to, 1451
  - publication of, See Publication of acts at trial
  - review prior to publication, 1708
  - signatures, 1473
  - transmission to higher tribunal, 1474
  - written requirement, 1472
- administrative tribunals, before, 1400
- admission to courtrooms, 1470; 1471
- advocates, See Advocates and procurators
- affidavits, use of, 1687-1688
- Apostolic See, role of, See Forum, subhead extraordinary or singular forum
- Apostolic Signatura, 1445
- appeal or recourse, 1628; 1726; 1733
  - abandonment of appeal, 1635
  - Apostolic See, tribunals of, See Tribunals
  - complaint of nullity against the sentence, See Complaint of nullity against the sentence
  - concordant judgments, following, 1644; 1684
  - correction of sentence, 1616
  - decisions not subject to, 1629
  - defenders of the bond, 1628; 1636
  - defined, 1726; 1733
  - distinguished from nullity complaint, 1726; 1733
  - effect of appeal on parties, 1637
  - focus, specifying, 1637
  - incidental appeals against other grounds by parties, 1637
  - incidental questions about right of, 1631
  - interlocutory sentences, 1630
  - introduction of, 1630
  - judicial expenses, 1649
  - judicial procedure, 1640
  - marriage nullity, See Marriage nullity
  - new proofs or new grounds for petition, admissibility of, 1639
  - nullity complaint, See Complaint of nullity against the sentence
  - oral appeals, 1630
  - oral contentious process, 1669
  - parties
    - effect of appeal on, 1637
    - incidental appeals against other grounds by, 1637
    - right of appeal, 1628
  - penal process, 1727
  - petition or libellus, rejection of, 1505
  - petitioners benefiting from appeals made by respondents, 1637
  - promoters of justice, 1628; 1636
  - publication of sentence, information on challenging sentence included in, 1614
  - pursuing appeal
    - procedure for, 1634
    - time limits, 1633
  - renunciation of appeal, 1636
  - res iudicata, 1629; 1642
  - respondents benefiting from appeals made by petitioners, 1637
  - right of appeal, 1628
  - second instance, tribunals of, See Second instance, tribunals of
  - suspensive effect on execution of sentence, 1638; 1644; 1650
  - third instance, tribunals of, 1444
  - time limits
    - lodging appeal, 1630
    - pursuing appeal, 1633
  - transmission of acts to higher court, 1474
  - tribunals, See Tribunals
  - types of, 1726
  - written appeals, 1630
- avoiding, 1803-1804
  - alternative dispute resolution, 1713-1716
  - penal trials, 1718
  - settlements, via, See Settlements
- baptism and standing to bring an action, 1476
- beginning of, 1517
- burden of proof, 1526
  - judicial confessions, effect of, 1536
  - who bears, 1526
- challenging the sentence, See subhead appeal or recourse
- citations, See Citations
- civil law, deference to, 1803
- closed case exceptions, 1462
- collegiate tribunals, See Collegiate tribunals
- common uses of, 1656
- competency or incompetency
  - complaint of nullity against the sentence based on, 1620
  - declaration by judge of own incompetence, 1461
  - exceptions against competence of judge, 1460
  - forum
    - extraordinary or singular forum, incompetency of lower courts over cases involving, 1406
    - ordinary forum requirements, 1407
  - marriage nullity, See Marriage nullity
  - ordination, nullity of, 1709
  - ratum et non consummatum dissolutions, 1699
  - second instance, tribunals of, 1440
  - separation of spouses, 1694
- competent forum, See Forum
- complaint of nullity against the sentence, See Complaint of nullity against the sentence
- conclusion of case
  - oral contentious process, 1666; 1667
  - ordinary process, 1599; 1600
- concordant or conforming judgments, 1644; 1684
- confessions, See Confessions
- contentious trials, 1655-1656, See also more specific subjects and procedures
- conventional time limits, 1465; 1640-1641
- counterclaims (actio reconventionalis or reconventio), 1462; 1495
- curators, appointment of, See Guardians and curators
- damages, 1649
- decisions, See subhead pronouncement and sentencing
- declarations
  - parties, 1530-1538; 1671
  - witnesses, 1528
- defenders of the bond, See Defenders of the bond
- defenses, See Defenses
- defined, 1400; 1613
- definition of the issue, See Joinder of the issue
- delays and time limits, 1465-1467; 1640-1641
- delicts, for, 1400; 1401
- dilatory exceptions, adjudication of, 1459
- discussion phase, 1601-1606
- disputed forum, 1416
- disputed object, tribunal of, 1410
- documentation, See Documents and documentation
- Eastern code, 1655-1656
- elements of, 1613; 1649
- end of, 1517
- ending of trial, definitive force of interlocutory sentences and decrees leading to, 1618
- evidence at contentious trials, See Proofs
- exceptions, 1649

action, to, 1462
closed case, 1462
competency of judge, against, 1460 counterclaims (actio reconventionalis or reconventio) vs., 1462
defined, 1649
dilatory, 1459
injunctions, 1496; 1498
litis finitae, 1462
peremptory, 1462
perpetual nature of, 1492
res iudicata, See Res iudicata
rights protected by, 1491
sequestration, See Sequestration
execution of sentence, 1650; 1749
appeal, suspensive effect of, 1638; 1644; 1650
concordant judgments, effect of, 1644 decree, executory, 1651 discretion of executor, 1654
executors, 1653; 1654
failure to execute, remedies for, 1653 immediate effect of, 1655 obvious sense of words, execution according to, 1654 personal execution by diocesan bishop, 1653
religious tribunals, 1653
rendering of accounts prior to, 1652
res iudicata, 1650
suspension of execution, 1638; 1644; 1650 expenses, See Judicial expenses extinction of actions, 1492
extrajudicial confessions, 1537
extraordinary procedures, 1498
final argument, 1603; 1606 fiscally incompetent persons, 1478 form, 1402; 1613
formal object, 1491; 1613
forum, See Forum
fumus boni iuris, presence of, 1505
gratuitous grant of legal assistance, 1464 guardians or curators of respondents and petitioners at, See Guardians or curators historical background, 1803-1804
holidays, 1467
immunity of pontiff, 1404
incidental cases, See Incidental cases
injunctions, 1496; 1497
insanity, incapacity, or incompetency of plaintiffs and defendants, 1478 inspections by judges, 1582; 1583
instruction of the case, 1516; 1655
interested third parties, 1596
interlocutory issues, See Incidental cases interpreters at, 1471 intervention by third parties, See Intervention by third parties in trials introductory phase, 1501-1512 joinder of the issue, See Joinder of the issue judges, See Judges judgments, See subhead pronouncement and sentencing judicial decrees, 1617; 1618
judicial expenses, See Judicial expenses judicial time limits, 1465; 1640-1641
juridic personality, 1400; 1476; 1480
last response, right of, 1603
legal time limits, 1465; 1640-1641
libellus, See Petition or libellus mandates for advocates and procurators, 1484-1486
marriage nullity, See Marriage nullity material object, 1400; 1613
minor children, 1478; 1646
moral certitude in pronouncement and sentencing, 1608; 1783-1784
multiple actions, 1493
necessary persons admitted to courtrooms, 1470
necessary third parties, 1597
negligence, abatement or preemption due to, 1521 non-Catholics' standing to bring an action at, 1476 non-peremptory time limits, 1465
notaries, 1437
nullity of sentence, See Complaint of nullity against the sentence
oaths
judges' oaths, 1454
publication of the acts, oath not to misuse information contained in, 1711 truthful testimony, oath to provide, 1532; 1562
object of disputed object, tribunal of, 1410
formal object, 1491; 1613
material object, 1400; 1613
object sequestration, 1496
oral contentious process, See Oral contentious process
oral discussion
documentation of, 1605
norms governing, 1604
order of adjudication of cases, 1458-1464 ordinary contentious process, 1655 et seq.
incidental cases, use in, 1590 marriage nullity, norms applicable in, 1691
ordination, nullity of, 1710
penal trials, applicable to, 1728 separation of spouses, requested for, 1693
ordinary forum, 1407-1415
ordination, nullity of, See Ordination, nullity of,
out-of-court settlements, See Settlements parents or parental surrogates of minor children involved in, 1478 parties, See Parties at trial passive subject, 1476; 1613
penal, See Penal trials
penalties
imposition or declaration of, purpose of trial for, 1400
reprehensible actions by advocates and procurators, 1488
respect and obedience, penalties for lack of, 1470 pending litigation, communication of citation triggering, 1512
peremptory exceptions, 1462
peremptory time limits, 1465; 1640-1641 persons, juridic or actual, 1400
petition or libellus, See Petition or libellus petitioners, See Petitioners at trial place or location of judges outside territory, 1469
stable or established place, 1468
pleadings, 1602
possessory actions, 1500
preemption, See subhead abatement or preemption presumed death of spouse, 1707; 1798
presumptions, See Presumptions prevention of trial, definitive force of interlocutory sentences and decrees leading to, 1618 procurators, See Advocates and procurators promoters of justice, See Promoters of justice pronouncement and sentencing, 1715-1716
absence of moral certitude, 1608; 1783-1784 amendment of sentence by judge, 1626 challenging, See subhead appeal or recourse collegial decisions, 1609
complaint of nullity against the sentence, See Complaint of nullity against the sentence contents of sentence, 1611; 1612
contrary judgments, 1645
correction of sentence, 1616
deferral of decision in collegial tribunals, 1609 definitive force of interlocutory sentences and decrees, 1618 definitive sentences, 1607 execution of sentence, See subhead execution of sentence function of sentence, 1611
interlocutory sentences, 1607; 1613; 1618
judicial decrees, 1617; 1618
marriage nullity, 1681-1685
moral certitude in, 1608; 1783-1784 non-unanimous collegial decisions, 1609
nullity of sentence, See Complaint of nullity against the sentence
oral contentious process, 1668
parties, publication of sentence to, 1614; 1615
penal trials, 1726; 1731

publication of sentence, 1614; 1615 restoration following manifestly unjust sentence, See Restitutio in integrum retraction of initial conclusions in collegial decisions, 1609 retraction of sentence by judge, 1626 single judge, sentence by, 1610 suspensive effect of appeal on execution of sentence, 1638 time limits for issuing, 1610
types of, 1715-1716
waiver of final argument prior to, 1606 writing or drafting of sentence, 1610 proofs at contentious trials, See Proofs publication of acts, See Publication of acts at trial publication of sentence, 1614; 1615 quod non est in actis non est in mundo, principle of, 1604 ratio peccati, 1401
rebuttal, 1603
reconventio (counterclaims), 1462; 1495
relative rarity of contentious trial process except for marriage nullity, 1803 renunciation of contentious trials, 1524; 1525
res integra, 1512; 1655
res iudicata, See Res iudicata
respect and obedience, penalties for lack of, 1470
respondents, See Respondents response to petition or libellus, 1505 restitutio in integrum, See Restitutio in integrum
rights and obligations appeal, right of, 1628
defense, right of complaint of nullity against the sentence based on denial of, 1620 marriage nullity cases and right to review acts, 1710-1711
last response, right of, 1603 protection by actions and exceptions, 1491
res iudicata, rights flowing from, 1642
truthful testimony at trial, obligation regarding, 1531; 1548; 1562
vindication of, 1400
security sequestration, 1497
sentencing, See subhead pronouncement and sentencing separation of spouses, See Separation of spouses sequestration, See Sequestration settlements, out-of-court, See Settlements sin, questions of, 1401 spiritual matters, cases involving, 1401
stages of, 1655
standing to bring an action at, 1476 subject of active subject, 1401; 1613
passive subject, 1476; 1613
subordinate issues, adjudication of, 1459-1464; 1638 suspension of execution of sentence, 1638; 1644; 1650 suspension of trial, 1665 change in status of party, due to, 1518 death of party, due to, 1518 guardian or curator, due to change in status of, 1519 party, due to change in status of, 1518 procurator, due to change in status of, 1519 representative of party, due to change in status of, 1519
testimony, See Witnesses and witness testimony third parties, intervention by, See Intervention by third parties in trials time limits, 1465-1467; 1640
appeal
lodging, 1630
pursuing, 1633
citation's immediate and simultaneous communication to parties, 1508
conventional time limits, 1465; 1640-1641 delays, 1465-1467; 1640 petition or libellus, response to, 1505; 1506 proofs, gathering, 1516
publication of sentence, 1723
restitutio in integrum, 1646
sentences, issuing, 1610
tribunals, See Tribunals violations of ecclesiastical laws as active subject of, 1401 visits by judges, 1582; 1583 waiver of final argument, 1606
witnesses, See Witnesses and witness testimony
written requirement, See Written requirement Trias politica, 135
Tribunals, 486
administrative defined for purposes of administrative recourse, 1824-1826
trials before, 1400
Apostolic See, tribunals of, 1402; 1632, See also Forum, subhead extraordinary or singular forum
Apostolic Signatura, 1445
applicability of canons, 1402 delegated tribunal, Roman Rota as, 1444 ordinary appellate tribunal, Roman Rota as, 1443 petitioning, 1417
Pontiff as supreme judge, 1442
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions, See Ratum et non consummatum dissolutions Roman Rota, See Roman Rota appellate, 1632
Apostolic See, tribunals of, See subhead Apostolic See, tribunals of
oral contentious process, 1668
restitutio in integrum issues adjudicated before, 1646
second instance, tribunals of, See Second instance, tribunals of third instance, tribunals of, 1444
auditors (judge instructors), 1428
canonization process, 1403
collegiate, See Collegiate tribunals competency or incompetency, See Trials contract, of, 1411; 1673
cooperation between, 1418
defenders of the bond, See Defenders of the bond diocesan, 1421; 1422; 1438
disputed forum, 1416
disputed object, tribunal of, 1410 domicile, of, 1408; 1673 duties of judges and ministers of, See subhead rights and duties of judges and ministers of election of, 1411
examination of witnesses at place of, 1558 first instance, tribunals of, 1419-1437; 1623
gifts, duty not to accept, 1456
governing canons, 1402
grades of, 1441; 1450; 1622
holidays, 1467
judge instructors (auditors), 1428
judges, See Judges
marriage nullity, 1673
metropolitan tribunals, 1438
notaries, 1437
oath, duty to take, 1454
objections against judges on, See Judges ordinary forum, 1407-1415
ordination, nullity of, 1709
penalties for abuse of office, 1457
ponens or relators, 1429; 1610
promoters of justice, See Promoters of justice quasi-contract, tribunal of, 1411
quasi-domicile, of, 1408; 1673
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions, 1698; 1700
regional, 1423; 1439
relators or ponens, 1429; 1610
religious, 1427; 1651
rights and duties of judges and ministers of, 1634-1635 defenders of the bond, rights of, 1434
gifts, duty not to accept, 1456
oath, duty to take, 1454
objections against judges, See Judges promoters of justice, rights of, 1434
same case, duty to avoid serving in another instance on, 1447
secrecy, duty to maintain, 1455
settlement, duty to urge, 1446
withdrawal, duty of, 1448

Roman tribunals, See subhead Apostolic See, tribunals of same case, duty to avoid serving in another instance on, 1447
second instance, tribunals of, See Second instance, tribunals of secrecy, duty to maintain, 1455
separation of spouses, 1694
settlement, duty to urge, 1446
subordination of, 1622
third instance, tribunals of, 1444
transients, 1409
types of, 1622
unlocatables, 1409
withdrawal, duty of, 1448
Trination
Eucharist celebrated three times in one day by single priest, 905 Trullo, Council of impediments to marriage, 1272; 1342
Trusts, pious, 1302
Truth
hierarchy of truths, 205
obligation and right to search for, 218; 748
Tudor, Henry (King of England), 1387
Tudor, Mary (Queen of England), 1165
Twinning projects
missionary activities, 782

Ukrainian archiepiscopal church
Byzantine rite, observing, 1
Eastern code, 33
Unconsummated marriages, See Consummation; Ratum et non consummatum dissolutions Undeclared latae sententiae, See Latae sententiae Unions, labor
clerics' membership in, 278; 285; 287
deacons' membership in, 278; 288
religious' membership in, 672
Unions, pious, See Associations Unitatis redintegratio ecumenism, 16; 1024
heresy, apostasy, and schism, 750
sacramental sharing, 1024
Unity of Church
delicts against, 1364-1969
Universal Church
bishops' right and duty to be solicitous toward, 567 pope as pastor of, 331
Universal law, 12; 20
delicts and penalties, 1315; 1532
imputability, See Imputability revocation of customs, 28
Universi Dominici gregis
age restrictions for cardinals, 354
election of pope, 332
privileges of cardinals, 355 vacancy or impediment of papacy college of cardinals' powers during, 359
exercise of primacy during, 335
Universitates personarum, 115; 158
Universitates rerum, 115; 158
Universities and colleges
Catholic, See Universities and colleges, Catholic chaplains, 568
ecclesiastical universities and faculties, See Ecclesiastical universities and faculties Universities and colleges, Catholic, 15-16; 960-962
applicability of canons all institutes of higher learning, applicable to, 814 ecclesiastical universities and faculties, applicable to, 818
authority
appointment of teachers, 810
"Catholic" in title or name, establishment or recognition of, 804
doctrinal rectitude, ensuring, 810
episcopal conference's right to establish and govern Catholic universities, 809 mandate required for teachers of theological studies, 15-16; 812
bishops
appointment of teachers, 810
doctrinal rectitude, ensuring, 810
episcopal conference's right to establish and govern Catholic universities, 809; 821 mandate for teachers of theological disciplines, providing, 812 students, duties regarding pastoral care of, 813
canonical mission (missio canonica), 812
"Catholic" in title or name, establishment or recognition of, 804
doctrinal rectitude, ensuring, 810
documents issued on, 960-962
Eastern code, 808
ecclesiastical universities and faculties, See Ecclesiastical universities and faculties
loss of clerical state, effects of, 292 mandate for teachers of theological disciplines, 15-16; 812
missio canonica (canonical mission), 812
profession of faith, persons obliged to make, 833
promulgation of Ex corde Ecclesiae, 14; 961-962 students, pastoral care of, 813
teachers
appointment of, 810
loss of clerical state, effects of, 292
profession of faith, persons obliged to make, 833
theological studies, mandate to teach, 15-16; 812
theological disciplines academic disciplines, connection to, 811 definition of, 812
provision for, 811
teachers of, mandate required for, 15-16; 812 Unlocatable persons forum for, 1409
Unwed mothers
children of, See Legitimacy or illegitimacy of children pregnancy out of wedlock, marriage due to, 1320 Urrutia, F. J., 129
U.S. bishops' conference
Economic Justice for All: Catholic Social Teaching and the U.S. Economy, 231 Fulfilled in Your Hearing: The Homily in the Sunday Assembly, 767 media communications, participation in, 831
U.S. church-related institutions
canonical status of, 172-176
Useful time, 201
Usurpation of ecclesiastical office
penalties for, 1381
Ut notum est
"in favor of the faith" marriage dissolutions, 1372-1373 Ut unum sint
ecumenism, references to, 16
significance of, 25

Vacancy of Apostolic See, See Apostolic See
Vacant diocesan sees, 546; 549
Apostolic See, notification of, 422
apostolic vicariate or prefecture, vacancy in, 420
coadjutor and auxiliary bishops
notification of Apostolic See, 422
successors of or temporary substitutes for diocesan bishop, as, 403; 409; 416; 419
validity of actions until certain notice of vacancy is received, 417
college of consultors, See College of consultors death of bishop, on, 416
defined, 416
diocesan synods, effect on, 468
documents of diocesan curia, ban on removal of, 428 finance officer, diocesan administrator required to be separate from, 423 innovations, ban on, 428 interim government
apostolic vicariate or prefecture, vacancy in, 420
coadjutor and auxiliary bishops, 403; 409; 416; 419
college of consultors, 419
diocesan administrator, prior to delegation of, 419; 426 mission territories, in, 420

status of person designated as interim governor prior to appointment of diocesan administrator, 426
judicial vicars, 1420
mission territories, 420
parochial appointments during vacancy, 525 presbyteral councils of particular churches, 501 privation of office, due to, 416 prohibition of certain actions during, 428 resignation of bishop, on acceptance of, 416 transfer of bishop, 416; 418
validity of actions until certain notice of vacancy is received, 417
vicars general and episcopal vicars, 481
force of actions prior to notice of vacancy, 417
status of person designated as interim governor prior to appointment of diocesan administrator, 426 Vacant ecclesiastical offices expiration of office, conferral prior to, 153 fact, vacant by, 209
illegitimately possessed offices vacant by law, 154 law, vacant by, 209
nonvacant offices, conferral of, 153
transfer, caused by, 191
what constitutes, 209
Vacant metropolitan see provincial councils not to be convoked during vacancy, 440 Vacant parishes communication of vacancy to local ordinary, 541 interim governance, 541
parochial administrators, 539; 540
suitability of pastor for, 524 Vacant pastorates, 524
Vacatio, 8; 31
Vacations
clerics' right to, 282
parochial vicars, 550
pastors, 533
Vagus, See Transients
Validity
delegate, acts placed by, 133
ecclesiastical offices, See Ecclesiastical offices laws, 10
marriage, See Marriage ordination, See Ordination, subhead requirements for licit and valid ordination Vanity
clerics required to avoid, 282
Vatican City State
Code of Civil Procedure for, 1754
Vatican Council I
clarity of language of, 429 collegial constitution, rejection of, 423-424 decrees and constitutions, obedience owed to, 754
dispensations, 127
duty and right of Church to preach gospel, 747 Eastern code, need for, 27 juridical relationship of bishops to pope, failure to address, 423 primacy of papacy arising out of, 333
profession of faith, 19
significance of, 337
Vatican Council II, 11-12
1983 Code, 11-12; 24-26 anticipation of themes by Pius XII in Provida Mater, 878 canon law and, 11-12
catechumenates, 788
celibacy of priesthood, affirmation of, 277
civil liberties, rights of lay faithful regarding, 227 clerics' rights and obligations to be interpreted in light of, 344 coercion or force in conversion efforts, prohibition on use of, 748
collegiality between bishops and pope, 330; 334; 423; 428 common life of clergy, 280
conferences of bishops, 22; 23 conferences of bishops, formal status given to, 589
consummation of marriage, 1364
continuing education of clergy, 279
Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity, 17; 812
decrees and constitutions, obedience owed to, 754
dispensations, 126; 127
divine word, role in of pope and bishops in ministry of, 756
divine worship other than sacraments, 1400
duty and right of Church to preach gospel, 747
ecclesiastical governance, 183-184
ecclesiastical offices, 195
ecclesiastical universities and faculties, 972-973 ecumenical councils, importance of, 427-428 ecumenism, weight given to, 16; 755
eucharistic canons, sources for, 1097
formula of promulgation for acts of, 341
immediacy of papal power, 428
incardination of clerics, 329
Index of prohibited books, abandonment of, 977
indulgences, 1172
initiatory sacraments, 842; 851
juridical relationship of bishops to pope, 330; 334; 423; 428 lay ecclesial involvement, impetus provided to, 17; 812
liturgy, celebration of, 999-1000
marriage, 1055; 1063; 1234; 1239-1240
missionary activities, See Missionary activities
neophytes, 789
open-ended nature of, 26
ordination, 1193
pallia, reform of laws regarding bestowal of, 437
parishes, 675
particular councils, 577-578
pastoral councils of particular churches, 666-667
penance, reform of, 1138; 1167
personal prelatures, 394-395
positive nature of, 12
prayers and spiritual exercises other than liturgy, sanctifying function of, 839
preaching
importance of, 762
role of presbyters, deacons, and bishops in, 764
presbyteral councils, 652-653
primacy of papacy, language describing, 429 problems and inconsistencies of, 428-429 religious institutes, education provided by, 801
remuneration of clerics, 281
Roman Curia, criticism of, 12
sacramental sharing, 844; 1024
sacramentals, 1167
significance of, 337
synod of bishops, 454,
temporal goods of Church, 1254; 1451
unifying function of papacy, 425-426
western countries, Eastern Catholic churches in, 33 young churches, role of, 786
Vatican Library, 489
Vatican Press
publication of laws by, 8 Veneration, 1413
the blessed, 1187
Eucharist, See Veneration of Eucharist
Mary, See Marian devotions sacred images in churches, 1188 saints, 1186; 1187
Veneration of Eucharist, 1122-1123
accessibility of place of reservation, 937
doctrinal foundation for, 1123 exposition of reserved sacrament, See Reservation of Eucharist, subhead exposition of reserved sacrament
historical background, 1122 perpetual adoration, 942
processions, 944
Venezuela
women religious, pastoral roles of, 517 Venite seorsum
enclosed or cloistered nuns, observance of papal cloister by, 606; 667
Vernay, J., 128
Verona, Council of
marriage, 1237
Vestments
Eucharist, celebration of, 929

Vetitum
marriage nullity sentences, attached to, 1684
Viaticum
anointing prior to, 1179-1180 delay in administering, avoidance of, 922 dying, sacrament for, 1179; 1180-1181 Easter triduum, reception of Eucharist during, 931 frequent administration of, 921
ministers of, 911
more than once in same day, 921
personal retention or carrying about of reserved hosts, 935
reception of, 921; 922
reservation of Eucharist originally for purposes of, 1122 Vicar of Christ, See also Apostolic See pope described as, 331
Vicariates, apostolic, See Apostolic vicariates Vicariates forane, 729-730 parishes grouped into, 374
Vicars forane, 729-730
1917 Code, 729-730
administrative duties, 555 alternative names for, 553 appointment by diocesan bishop, 553 archpriests, 729
authority, 555
clergy, duties regarding, 555 continuing education of clerics, duties regarding, 555
diocesan bishops appointment of vicars, 553 removal of vicars, 554
diocesan synods, 463
Eastern code, 729-730
functions, 555
illness of clergy, duties regarding, 555
liturgy, celebration of, 555
pastoral councils, members of, 555
pastoral duties, 555
pastors, consulted regarding suitability of, 524 powers, 555
presbyteral councils, members of, 555
qualifications of, 554 removal by diocesan bishops, 554
rights and obligations of, 555 supervision of clergy by, 555
term of office of, 554
visitations, 555
Vicars
apostolic vicariates, See Apostolic vicariates episcopal vicars, See Vicars general and episcopal vicars judicial vicars, See Judicial vicars papal vicars, bishops as
theology combating, 184; 566-567
Vatican Council II on, 183-184
viewed as, 428
parochial vicars, See Parochial vicars vicars forane, See Vicars forane
vicars general, See Vicars general and episcopal vicars Vicars general and episcopal vicars, 628 actions contrary to intentions of diocesan bishops, prohibition on, 480
appointment of diocesan bishop's power of, 477
episcopal vicars, 476
time limits on, 477
vicar general, 475
authority of, 479
cessation from office, 481 coadjutor and auxiliary bishops appointed as, 406
definitions
episcopal vicars, 476
vicar general, 475
diocesan bishops
actions contrary to intentions of, prohibition on, 480 appointment, power of, 477
reports to, 480
suspension of, 481
vacancy of see, 481
diocesan synods
delegated to preside over, 462
membership in, 463
Eastern code, 628
episcopal councils, as members of, 473
impeded diocesan sees, interim leaders of, 413
impediment or absence, 477 moderators of curia, as, 473
number of
episcopal vicars, 476
vicars general, 475
ordinary power, 479
particular councils, participants in, 443 pastoral actions, diocesan bishop's responsibility for, 473 power exercised by diocesan bishops through, 391
powers of, 479
protosyncellus, similarity of vicar general to, 628
purpose of
episcopal vicars, 476
vicars general, 475
qualifications of, 478
removal from office, 481
reports to diocesan bishop, 480 suspension of diocesan bishops, effect of, 481 syncellus, similarity of episcopal vicar to, 628 time limits on appointment of episcopal vicars, 477
vacant diocesan sees, 481
force of actions prior to notice of vacancy, 417
status of person designated as interim governor prior to appointment of diocesan administrator, 426
Vice-chancellors, See Chancellors and vice-chancellors
Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, 362
Vincent de Paul (Saint)
Congregation of the Mission founded by, 892
Vinculum
marriage, 1085
Vindictive penalties, See Expiatory penalties Violence, See Physical violence Virginity
marriage, preferred to, 1236 Virgins
individuals consecrated as, 604
orders of, 604
Visitations
ad limina visits, 400
papal legates, role of, 364
stages of, 400
diocesan bishops, See Diocesan bishops
metropolitans, 436
prescription, exemption from, 199
religious
diocesan bishop, 397,683
superiors, 628
schools, 806
seminaries, 259
vicariates forane, 555
Visits by judges at trial, 1582; 1583
Vita consecrata
consecrated life, institutes of, 742-743
secular institutes, 710; 713; 724; 725; 878
social justice, obligation of faithful to support, 222
Vocations, 233
canon lawyers, ecclesial vocation of, 9
consecrated life, institutes of, 574 diocesan bishops' duty to foster, 385 duty to foster, 233
Eastern code, 233
general vocation to proclaim gospel, 216 instruction in promoting, 256 marriage as, 1063
minor seminaries, role of, 234 missionary vocations, diocesan support for, 791 right to pursue, 219
Voluntary offerings, See Offerings Votive offerings
shrines, at, 1234
Votum or opinion
ratum et non consummatum dissolutions
preparation of opinion or votum, 1704
transfer of marriage nullity cases, 1681 Vows, 1416, See also Oaths capacity to make, 1191
cessation of, 1194
commutation of, 1197
consecrated life, institutes of assumption of consecrated life through vows, 573
religious, 607
defined, 1191

dispensation from, 129; 1196
Eastern code, 1416
fear, made out of, 1191 malice, made out of, 1191
marriage impediment, perpetual vows of chastity as, 1088
mixed, 1192
nullity, 1191
oaths differentiated from, 1416 obligation placed only on person making vows, 1193 personal, 1192
poverty, vow of, See Poverty, vow of private, 1192; 1416 public, 1192; 1416
real, 1192
reason, use of, 1191
religious authority of religious superior to grant dispensation from, 1196
religious, vows made by, 607; 654
suspension of vows made prior to religious profession, 1198 simple, 1192
solemn, 1192
suspension of, 1195; 1198
Vulnus legis or wounding of the law dispensation referred to as, 85

Wages, See Remuneration
Waivers
final argument at trial, 1606 penalty, 1345
Warnings
censures, 1347
concubinage, 1395
contumacy, warning to cease, 1347
discretion of ordinary or superior in imposing, 1348
disobedience, 1372
doctrinal violations, 1371
extraordinary circumstances for which no explicit canon exists, 1399 ferendae sententiae, formal warning required for, 1347; 1549 latae sententiae warning provided by law itself, 1347; 1549
penal remedies as, 1339
Wax candles
reserved Eucharist, lamp burned before, 940
Websites, See Media communications Weddings, See Marriage
White Fathers, 892
Wills, pious, See Pious wills Withdrawal from contumacy penalty, effect on, 1347; 1358
Witnesses and witness testimony, 1678 absence of cited witnesses, 1557 addition, suppression, correction, or change to testimony, 1569 admissibility of proofs through, 1547 advance notice of questions, 1565
affidavits, use of, 1687-1688 blessing of sacred place, proof of, 1209 character and reputation of witness, 1572 citation of, 1556; 1557
clerics, 1548; 1550
conclusion of examination, 1569
confessors, 1548; 1550
confidentiality and secrecy, obligations of, 1548; 1550 confrontation between witnesses, 1560 consistency or inconsistency of testimony, 1572 creative approaches, 1528 declarations or depositions by witnesses, 1528 dedication of sacred place, proof of, 1209 disqualified witnesses, 1550 documentation of testimony, 1567; 1568 eligibility to be a witness, 1549; 1550 evaluating trustworthiness of testimony, 1572; 1573; 1690 examination of witnesses, 1558-1571
exclusion of witnesses, 1555; 1576 exemption from testifying, 1548
expenses, 1571; 1580
experts, 1574; 1692
admissibility, 1575
appointment of, 1575
clarifications required of, 1578
defined, 1692
documentation turned over to, 1577
exclusion of, 1576
expenses, 1580
marriage nullity, 1680
objections to, 1576
oral contentious process, 1661-1663
private experts engaged by parties, 1581 reports, See subhead reports by experts required use of, 1574
scope of expertise, determination of, 1577
hearsay, 1572
identity of witness, establishing, 1563 ineligible witnesses, 1550
insanity, incapacity, or incompetency, 1550 introduction of witnesses, 1551; 1552 knowledge, sources of, 1563; 1572
marriage, See Marriage mentally disabled persons, 1550
minor children, 1550
names notification of parties regarding, 1554 submission of, 1552
notaries
declarations before, 1528 oaths, notes taken on, 1568 presence of parties and other persons, notes taken on, 1568 questions asked, notes taken on, 1568 recording testimony, 1567; 1568
signatures, 1569
number of witnesses, 1553
oaths, 1532; 1562
objections to witnesses, 1555; 1576
oral contentious process, 1661-1663
oral testimony requirement, 1566
parties
testimony of, 1530-1538; 1671 witnesses, incapacity as, 1550 persons present at examination of witness, 1559 place of examination of witness, 1558
priests, 1548; 1550
publication of the acts, 1709; 1711
questions advance notice of, 1565
nature of, 1564
persons able to put, 1561 presenting to judge, 1533 refusal to respond to, 1531 responses to, 1566
written materials used in response to, 1565; 1566 refusal to appear to testify, 1528 refusal to respond to question, 1531
rehearings, 1570
relationship of witness to parties, establishing, 1563
renunciation of witnesses, 1551 reports by experts acceptance by judge, 1575
clarification of, 1578 evaluating, 1579
preparation of, 1578
residence and domicile of witnesses, submission of, 1552
rumor, 1572
separate examination of each witness, 1560 signing of acts, 1569
single witness testimony, proof value of, 1572; 1573 supporting evidence, 1572; 1573 tape-recorders, use of, 1567 telephone, via, 1528
third parties, through, 1528 time period for examining witnesses, 1552 trustworthiness of testimony, evaluating, 1572; 1573; 1690 truthful testimony, obligation regarding, 1531; 1548; 1562
written materials used in response to questions, 1565; 1566
Women
clerics' association with, 277
consecrated life, equality of men's and women's institutes of, 606
divine word, role in ministry of
lay women, 759
religious women, 758
Eucharist, servers at, 906 liturgical functions open to lay women, 230 marriage as between man and woman, 1057
married clerics and religious, See Married clerics and religious nuns, See Religious, subhead nuns, monasteries of ordination restricted to men, 1024 particular councils, participation in, 443

pastoral care of parish, role in, 517
preaching, 766
Worker Priests, 285
Worship, See Divine worship Wounding of the law (vulnus legis)
dispensation referred to as, 85
Wrenn, Lawrence, 1253; 1518; 1613; 1692; 1744; 1749
Writings
religious, writings by, 832
theological writings
abuse of Church or religion in, 1369
regulations for review of errors in, 1364
Written materials
witness testimony in form of, 1565; 1566
Written publications, See Books and written publications Written requirement
confessors' faculty from concession, 973
ecclesiastical offices
loss of, 186
provision or conferral of, 156
removal from, 193
transfer of office, 190
incidental cases, written proposal of, 1588 petition or libellus for administrative recourse, 1734
pious foundations, 1306
remission of penalties, 1361
rescripts, 74
singular administrative acts, 37
singular decrees and precepts, 51
transfer of office, 190
trials
acts, 1472
appeal or recourse, 1630
incidental cases, written proposal of, 1588
petition or libellus for administrative recourse, 1734

Young churches, 786
Yugoslavian church
Byzantine rite, observing, 1
Yves of Chartres
Prologus, dispensations discussed in, 126

MARYGROVE COLLEGE
3 1927 00094340 4

"No group has worked harder at putting to work the principles of the Second Vatican Council than scholars of the canon law. Led off by two brilliant essays on the analogous sense of law in the Church (by Les Örsy), and on developments, positive and regressive, since the council (by Fred McManus), this encyclopedic work of interpretation explores the often-surprising strengths and weaknesses of church law put in place in 1983. I may mention two sections of special relevance: the treatment of the Pauline and Petrine privileges permitting the dissolution of marriages of the unbaptized, a topic of immense relevance in an interconnected globe, and the treatment of the Roman curia, twice reformed since the council and already the focus of further thoughtful proposals for reform. To know the Church as it lives is to know how the canons are interpreted and are applied and are susceptible of improvement."

–John T. Noonan
United States Court of Appeals
San Francisco

"This new commentary constitutes a landmark contribution to the Church as a whole. Its historical depth and interpretive balance render the meaning of the canons accessible not only to canon lawyers but to all those in the Church and beyond it who want to understand canon law. Church leaders, laypersons and clergy, and in particular theologians and ethicists will be in debt for a long time to the scholars who made this volume possible."

—Margaret A. Farley
Stark Professor of Christian Ethics
Yale University Divinity School

"Why would a parish spend money on the Code of Canon Law? Because this volume isn't just about Church law. It's an invaluable pastoral aid to understanding any number of Church issues....This volume is an essential reference work!"

—Liturgical Ministry

"The commentary has a comprehensive index of more than ninety pages. It is well bound, beautifully produced, and easy to consult. The Canon Law Society of America is to be congratulated."

—Theological Studies

First Place, Reference Books, 2001 Catholic Book Awards

PAULIST PRESS
www.paulistpress.com
$64.95

ISBN 0-8091-4066-7

